A primary function of the pontifical legate is transmitting and proposing the names of those to be considered as candidates for the episcopacy, and the instruction of the informative process concerning the individual candidates (4°). The process is governed by universal law (c. 377) and by particular law.[18] The pontifical legate submits the ternus with a personal evaluation and informs the Holy See concerning the local conditions and the needs of the particular church, the actual state of the diocese or territory, and the qualities of the person to be considered. In this matter, the pontifical legate is to respect the discipline of the Eastern churches and the praxis regarding the designation of candidates for ecclesiastical circumscriptions entrusted to religious communities and under the jurisdiction of the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples. In addition, several circumscriptions in Europe have acquired rights regarding the selection of bishops.[19] The process of selecting bishops has experienced continual developments throughout the history of the Church and, despite occasional criticism,[20] the pontifical legates carry out fairly wide consultation in order to avoid partial views and to have as complete information as possible to send to the Apostolic See.

[16] As indicated in PB 41, §1, the First Section of the Secretariat of State, for General Affairs, is responsible for the ordering of the functions and activities of the representatives of the Holy See, especially regarding the particular churches. AAS 80 (1988) 870. For other specific details on such representatives see also the "Regolamento per le Rappresentanze Pontificie," published by the Secretariat of State, Vatican City, February 22, 1994.

[17] See Appendix I of PB, n. 7, regarding the pastoral significance of the ad limina visit (PB 28–32). AAS 80 (1988) 917.

[18] Council for the Public Affairs of the Church, Normae de promovendis ad Episcopale Ministerium in Ecclesia Latina, AAS 64 (1972) 386–391.

The pontifical legate has responsibilities as well in other areas of the Church's life.

In recent decades the popes have taken a much more active role regarding the sphere of human development, the moral dimensions of economic and social problems faced especially by developing nations, the peaceful resolution of conflicts, and international relations in general. The pontifical legate therefore has an increasingly visible role in promoting the teaching of the Catholic Church and the moral leadership of the Roman Pontiff, often involving active participation in public forums dealing with such issues (5°).

Similarly, recent decades have seen an increase in initiatives and documents on the part of the Apostolic See regarding ecumenism and the relationship of the Catholic Church to non-Christian religious communities and to the different cultures existing in the world (6°). In cooperation with the bishops of the particular churches, the pontifical legate has a role in fostering such relations. Concrete examples include personal participation in ecumenical dialogue and in ceremonial and liturgical occasions, as well as contacts of a more private and personal nature, afforded often by the presentation of pontifical messages and the publication of Holy See documents.

The pontifical legate, in concerted action with the local bishops, seeks to protect that which pertains to the mission of the Church and the Apostolic See, especially regarding the preaching of the gospel and the exercise of the apostolate, in relations with the political and social leaders of the State (7°).

Lastly, the pontifical legate may be given other mandates and faculties, some of which relate to the liturgy, such as the imparting of the apostolic blessing, the administration of the sacraments, and various dispensations.[21] Under certain circumstances, the pontifical legate can also be entrusted with the care of a particular church.[22]

The canon does not mention the role of the pontifical legate regarding institutes of consecrated life and societies of apostolic life. The norms contained in Sollicitudo IX, which remain valid, indicate that the pontifical legate has the responsibility to help promote and consolidate the conferences of major superiors and to assist in coordinating their apostolic activity. He should be invited to take part in the opening sessions of the plenary assemblies of the conferences of major superiors of men and women religious, and he is to receive a copy of the acts, in order to transmit them to the competent dicastery. In addition, his counsel is to be sought regarding the granting of pontifical status to an institute of consecrated life which has its principal house in his territory.

The pontifical legate can also assist in fostering good relations between the episcopal conference and the conferences of major superiors.[23]

[19] R. Metz, "Papal Legates and the Appointment of Bishops," J 52 (1992) 272–275.

[20] Ibid., 259–284. See also C. Corral, "Response to Rene Metz," J 52 (1992) 285–293.

[21] See the Index facultatum legatis pontificiis tributarum (1986) and the Facultates Legatis Romani Pontificis concessae (1992) published, respectively, by the Congregation for Bishops and the Congregation for Eastern Churches, as well as the earlier Facultates nuntiorum, internuntiorum et delegatorum apostolicorum (1968) and Index facultatum nuntiis, pro-nuntiis et delegatis apostolicis in territoriis missionum tributarum (1971), published, respectively, by the Sacred Congregation for Bishops and the Sacred Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples.

[22] The appointment of pontifical legates as apostolic administrators of Estonia, Southern Albania, and Transcarpathia for the Latin rite were recent examples.

[23] An example would be to encourage the establishment of the mixed commission, consisting of bishops and major superiors, men and women, as indicated in MR 63.

Diplomatic Responsibilities

Canon 365 — §1. It is also the special function of a pontifical legate who at the same time acts as a legate to states according to the norms of international law:

1° to promote and foster relations between the Apostolic See and the authorities of the state;

2° to deal with questions which pertain to relations between Church and state and in a special way to deal with the drafting and implementation of concordats and other agreements of this type.

§2. In conducting the affairs mentioned in §1, a pontifical legate, as circumstances suggest, is not to neglect to seek the opinion and counsel of the bishops of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction and is to inform them of the course of affairs.

This canon, in rephrasing somewhat Sollicitudo X, indicates that, as the representative of the Roman Pontiff to the State and to public authorities, the pontifical legate has a particular responsibility to promote and foster relations between them and the Apostolic See.[24] The exercise of this function reflects as well the specific character of the Church and the Holy See, which, far from trying to gain any political advantage, seek rather to promote the common good and the resolution of conflicts in a peaceful manner, by negotiation and dialogue. This particular philosophy is reflected in the fact that pontifical legates are sent to nations with a great diversity of cultures and political systems, and exercise their functions even when the states to which they are sent are engaged in armed conflict.

In those countries where the pontifical legate is also the dean of the diplomatic corps, there are additional duties regarding the relations between the members of the diplomatic corps and the receiving state. As dean, the pontifical legate has the duty of representing the whole diplomatic corps to the government and receives the ambassadors and other heads of diplomatic missions at the beginning and the end of their term of service.

The responsibilities of the pontifical legate in maintaining good relations between the state and the particular churches often involve such fields as education, health care, and other social programs in which both the particular churches and the public authorities are involved. Such responsibilities may be exercised in concert with or supervised by government departments or ministries. These relations may also involve issues concerning the temporal goods of the Church, such as incorporation, registration and taxation, and, in some areas, restitution of goods and properties confiscated by past governments. The activity and the personal commitment of the pontifical legate aim to guarantee the rights of the Church, and to propose and promote the values it upholds for the common good of all.

The rights of the Church concerning the free exercise of its mission are sometimes guaranteed by a written agreement, such as a concordat or a modus vivendi, between the Holy See and the state, whether in whole or in part (e.g., the states of the Federal Republic of Germany). Agreements of this kind usually deal with issues such as access to places of worship, the establishment of religious schools and the teaching of religion in state or public schools, and the provision of religious services to prisoners and military personnel. The pontifical legate has particular responsibilities in the negotiations with the state and in drafting and signing the document on behalf of the Holy See.

The pontifical legate exercises these functions in concrete situations and profits from the advice and counsel of the bishops of the particular church, who have first-hand knowledge of local conditions and are directly affected by government policies. Moreover, in virtue of their status as members of the diplomatic corps, the pontifical legates must be attentive regarding their involvement in the political or internal affairs of the state to which they are accredited. Hence, close cooperation between the pontifical legate and the local bishops is essential, since the latter, as citizens, have the right to be involved in the affairs of their own country, in conformity with the prescriptions of canon 287, §2. In addition, some concordats stipulate that further details or accords regarding their implementation are to be worked out with the local episcopal conferences.

[24] In conformity with PB 46, 3°, the Second Section of the Secretariat of State, for Relations with States, is responsible for dealing with the pontifical representatives in the specific area of its activities. AAS 80 (1988) 872.

Privileges of Legates

Canon 366 — In view of the particular character of the function of a legate:

1° the seat of a pontifical legation is exempt from the power of governance of the local ordinary unless it is a question of celebrating marriages;

2° after he has notified in advance the local ordinaries insofar as possible, a pontifical legate is permitted to perform liturgical celebrations in all churches of his legation, even in pontificals.

In order to safeguard the legitimate autonomy of the pontifical legate, this canon, which is based on Sollicitudo XII, indicates that he is exempted from the governing power of the local ordinary, except for the celebration of marriage, for which delegation is needed, in conformity with the law.

The pontifical representation has a chapel in which the pontifical legate celebrates the sacred liturgy and administers other sacraments, often for members of the diplomatic corps, for the families of the personnel of the mission, and for others who have some relationship with the pontifical legation.[25]

Frequently, the pontifical legate is invited to celebrate public liturgical functions during visits to the particular churches of the territory in which he exercises his mission and, more commonly, in the place of his residence. The law points out what would appear to be common courtesy, that the pontifical legate inform the local ordinaries with regard to such liturgical activities. Such apostolic activity, in fact, serves to demonstrate the unity that exists between the universal Church and the particular church, which is keenly felt by the participants, and to sustain the particular churches in times of difficulty.

The pontifical legates enjoy the privilege, in procedural law, of being judged by the Roman Pontiff alone (c. 1405, §1, 3°).

Duration in Office

Canon 367 — The function of a pontifical legate does not cease when the Apostolic See becomes vacant unless the pontifical letter establishes otherwise; it does cease, however, when the mandate has been fulfilled, when the legate has been notified of recall, or when the Roman Pontiff accepts the legate's resignation.

The last canon of this chapter, similar to Sollicitudo III, 2 and 3, is rather straightforward. Unlike the norms regarding the dicasteries of the Roman Curia, which stipulate that, during the vacancy of the Apostolic See, the mandate of those who preside over them expires, the same rule does not normally apply to the pontifical legate, ostensibly to safeguard the important principles of permanence and stability.[26]

Normally, during the course of the years of papal service, a pontifical legate will be assigned to more than one representation. In conformity with the norms of international law, when a pontifical legate who is also accredited to a state ceases from office, letters of recall are drawn up. These are usually presented to the government when the legate's successor presents the new letters of credence. Apostolic delegates would simply take leave of the particular church.

[25] In some circumstances, e.g., where the mission may be located in a diplomatic enclave or there is little access to a local parish, the chapel of the pontifical legation functions as an oratory.

[26] John Paul II, Universi Dominici gregis, AAS 88 (1996) 305–343. Article 21 reiterates what is contained in the code, namely, that the munus and potestas of the pontifical legates do not cease with the vacancy of the Apostolic See.

Cessation from office also occurs as a result of transfer to a different mission, such as the appointment as a residential bishop in the pontifical legate's country of origin or as head of a dicastery of the Roman Curia.

The retirement of the pontifical legate is governed according to principles contained in particular law, which are similar to those which govern superior prelates of the Roman Curia. Namely, the pontifical legate, upon reaching the completion of his seventy-fifth year, ceases from his functions.

Provision is also made for resignation or retirement prior to the aforesaid age limit in circumstances similar to those for bishops (c. 401, §2); such a resignation must be accepted by the Roman Pontiff to be effective.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Studies Prior to Vatican II

Graham, R. J. Vatican Diplomacy: A Study of Church and State on the International Plane. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University, 1959.

Paro, G. The Right of Papal Legation. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1947.

Staffa, D. Le Delegazioni Apostoliche. Rome/New York: Desclée, 1959.

Commentaries on the 1983 Code of Canon Law

Chiappetta, L. Il Codice di Diritto Canonico: Commento Giuridico Pastorale. Naples: Dehoniane, 1988.

"De Romani Pontificis Legatis." In Pamplona ComEng, 239–244.

"Les Légats du Pontife Romain." In Code de Droit Canonique Annoté, ed. A. Soria-Vasco, H. Laplane, and M.-A. Chueca, 252–256. Paris: Cerf, 1989.

McGrath, A. "Papal Legates." In CLSGBI Com, 206–209.

Petroncelli-Hübler, F. "De Romani Pontificis Legatis." In Com Ex, 656–674.

Provost, J. "The Legates of the Roman Pontiff." In CLSA Com, 300–305.

Official Documents

CFB. Index facultatum legatis pontificiis tributarum. Typis Polyglottis Vaticanis, 1986.

CEC. Facultates Legatis Romani Pontificis concessae. Typis Polyglottis Vaticanis, 1992.

Ciprotti, P., and Talamanca, A., eds. I concordati di Pio XII (1939–1958). Milan: Giuffré, 1976.

———. I concordati di Giovanni XXIII e dei primi anni di Paolo VI (1958–1974). Milan: Giuffré, 1976.

Mercati, A. Raccolta di Concordati su materie ecclesiastiche tra la Santa Sede e le Autorità Civili. Vol. 1 (1908–1914); vol. 2 (1915–1954). Rome: Tipografia Polyglotta Vaticana, 1919 and 1954.

Paul VI. Mp Sollicitudo omnium Ecclesiarum, June 24, 1969. AAS 61 (1969) 473–484; CLD 7, 277–284.

SCB. "Facultates nuntiorum, internuntiorum et delegatorum apostolicorum." EnchVat, 13th ed. Vol. 3, 26–45. Bologna: Dehoniane, 1985. CLD 5, 293–306.

Schoppe, L. Konkordate seit 1800: Originaltext und deutsche Übersetzung der geltenden Konkordate. Frankfurt: Metzner, 1964.

———. Neue Konkordate und konkordatare Vereinbarung: Abschlüsse in den Jahren 1964 bis 1969. Hamburg, 1970.

SCProp. "Index facultatum nuntiis, pro-nuntiis et delegatis apostolicis in territoriis missionum tributarum." EnchVat, 13th ed. Vol. 4, 34–43. Bologna: Dehoniane, 1985. CLD 7, 285–289.

Studies

Arrieta, J. Diritto dell'Organizzazione Ecclesiastica. Milan: Giuffré, 1997.

Bassett, W., ed. The Choosing of Bishops. Hartford, Conn.: CLSA, 1971.

Bertagna, B. "Santa Sede ed Organizzazioni Internazionali." ME 107 (1982) 102–159, 284–306, 383–428.

Blet, P. Histoire de la représentation diplomatique du Saint-Siège: Des origines à l'aube du XIXe siècle. Vatican City: Archivio Vaticano, 1982.

Braida, P. V. A. "L'ufficio dei rappresentanti del Romano Pontefice." Apol 52 (1979) 175–199.

Cardinale, H. The Holy See and the International Order. Gerrards Cross, England: Colin Smythe, 1976.

Castro, R. La Misión del Representante Pontifico, Modelos Históricos y Orientaciones del Magisterio. Rome: Typis Pontificae Universitatis Gregorianae, 1989.

Cavalli, F. "Il Motu proprio Sollicitudo omnium Ecclesiarum sull'ufficio dei rappresentanti pontifici." La Civiltà Cattolica 120 (1969) 34–43.

Ciprotti, P. "Note sparse sulla precedenza dei rappresentanti diplomatici della Santa Sede." Il Diritto Ecclesiastico (1987) 1:240–249.

Coriden, J. "Diplomatic Recognition of the Holy See." J 48 (1988) 483–498.

Corral, C. "Response to René Metz." J 52 (1992) 285–293.

deEcheverria, L. "Funciones de los legados del Romano Pontífice." REDC 25 (1969) 581–636.

———. "The Pope's Representatives." In The Roman Curia and the Communion of Churches, ed. P. Huizing and K Walf, 56–63. Con 127. New York: Seabury, 1979.

D'Onorio, J.-B. La Nomination des Evêques: Procédures Canoniques et Conventions Diplomatiques. Paris: Tardy, 1986.

Dupuy, A. La Diplomatie du Saint-Siège après le IIe Concile du Vatican. Paris: Téqui, 1980.

Granfield, P. "The Church Local and Universal: Realization of Communion." J 49 (1989) 449–471.

Hennesey, J. "Papal Diplomacy and the Contemporary Church." In The Once and Future Church, ed. J. Coriden, 179–204. New York: Alba House, 1971.

Huizing, P., and K. Walf, eds. Electing Our Own Bishops. New York: Seabury, 1980.

Jiménez-Urresti, T., ed. Structures of the Church. Con 58. New York: Herder & Herder, 1970.

Köck, H. F. "Die multilaterale Diplomatie des Heiligen Stuhls." OAKR 32 (1981) 204–226.

Krämer, P. "Episcopal Conferences and the Apostolic See." J 48 (1988) 134–145.

Laghi, P. "The Role of the Apostolic Pro-Nuncio." Origins 14 (1984) 390–391.

Lallou, W. The Fifty Years of the Apostolic Delegation: Washington. D.C. 1893–1943. Jersey City, N.J.: St. Anthony Guild, 1943.

Le Tourneau, D. "Les légats pontificaux dans le Code de 1983, vingt ans après la constitution apostolique 'Sollicitudo omnium Ecclesiarum.'" AC 32 (1989) 229–260.

Marini, L. "The Apostolic Delegate: His Role in Ecclesiastical Law." JCL dissertation. Catholic University of America, 1983.

Metz, R. "Le désignation des évêques dans le droit actuel: Étude comparative entre le Code latin de 1983 et le Code oriental de 1990." Stud Can 27 (1993) 321–334.

———. "L'indépendence de l'Église dans le choix des évêques à Vatican II et dans le Code de 1983, aboutissement d'un demi-siècle d'effort diplomatique." RDC 37 (1987) 143–170.

———. "Papal Legates and the Appointment of Bishops." J 52 (1992) 259–284.

Minnerath, R. L'Église et les états concordataires (1846–1981): La souveraineté spirituelle. Paris: Cerf, 1983.

Oliveri, M. The Representatives: The Real Nature and Function of Papal Legates. Gerrards Cross, England: Van Duren, 1981.

Petroncelli Hübler, F. "De Romani pontificis legatis: Note in margine alla nuova normativa codiciale." In Raccolta di Scritti in onore di Pio Fedele, ed. G. Barberini, 555–590. Perugia: Università degli Studi di Perugia, 1984.

Reese, T. J. Inside the Vatican: The Politics and the Organization of the Catholic Church. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University, 1996.

Robinson, G. J. "Papal Representatives in the Context of Collegiality." In Le Nouveau Code de Droit Canonique—The New Code of Canon Law: Actes du Ve Congrès International du Droit Canonique. Ottawa. 19–24 Août 1984, ed. M. Theriault and J. Thorn, 481–495. Ottawa: St. Paul's University, 1986.

Talamanca, A. "I rappresentanti pontifici nella nuova normativa canonica." In Vitam impendere vero: Scritti in onore di Pio Ciprotti, ed. W. Schulz and G. Feliciani, 277–296. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1986.

Walf, K. "Der Apostolische Pronuntius: Neue Sinngebung für einen alten Terminus technicus." AkK 134 (1965) 376–381.

Wister, R. The Establishment of the Apostolic Delegation in the United States of America: The Satolli Mission. 1892–1896. Rome: Pontificia Universitas Gregoriana, 1981.

John A. Renken

SECTION II
PARTICULAR CHURCHES AND THEIR GROUPINGS
[cc. 368–572]

TITLE I
PARTICULAR CHURCHES AND THE AUTHORITY ESTABLISHED IN THEM
[cc. 368–430]

In Sacrae disciplinae leges, the apostolic constitution whereby he promulgated the 1983 Code of Canon Law, Pope John Paul II says:

> Among the elements which characterize the true and genuine image of the Church we should emphasize especially the following: ... the doctrine in which the Church is seen as a communio and which therefore determines the relations which are to exist between the particular churches and the universal Church, and between collegiality and the primacy.

An appropriate understanding of the particular church is essential for a right understanding of the Church established by Christ, which by its own profession is catholic. Canons 368–430 contain the Latin church's legislation about the particular churches (the most common form of which is the diocese), their bishops (or equivalent leadership figures), and their pastoral governance in extraordinary circumstances when the particular church temporarily is impeded or vacant.

The Church of Christ is a communio of believers. The 1993 Directory for the Application of Principles and Norms on Ecumenism says that the communion in which all Christians believe and for which we hope "is realized concretely in the particular churches, each of which is gathered together around its bishop. In each of these 'the one, holy, catholic and apostolic church of Christ is truly present and alive.' This communion is, by its very nature, universal."[1] The directory continues:

> Thus the bishops guarantee that the churches of which they are the ministers continue the one church of Christ founded on the faith and ministry of the apostles. They coordinate the spiritual energies and the gifts of the faithful and their associates toward the building up of the church and of the full exercise of its mission.
>
> Each particular church, united within itself and in the communion of the one, holy, catholic and apostolic church, is sent forth in the name of Christ and in the power of the Spirit to bring the Gospel of the kingdom to more and more people, offering them this communion with God....
>
> Communion within the particular churches and between them is a gift of God.[2]

This same theme of ecclesial communion is found in the first chapter of the 1984 Ceremonial of Bishops, promulgated soon after the 1983 code had become operative in the Latin church. The ceremonial says:

> Hence the dignity of the Church of Christ is embodied in the particular Churches. Each such Church is not simply a group of people who on their own choose to band together for some common endeavor; rather each Church is a gift that comes down from the Father of lights. Nor are the particular Churches to be regarded merely as administrative divisions of the people of God. In > their own way they contain and manifest the nature of the universal Church, which issued from the side of Christ crucified, which lives and grows through the Eucharist, which is espoused to Christ, and which, as their mother, cares for all the faithful.... Just as the universal Church is present and manifested in the particular Churches, so too each particular Church contributes its own distinctive gifts to the other Churches and to the Church as a whole....

[1] Ecum Dir 13.
[2] Ibid., 14–16.

>
> As Christ's vicar and representative, marked with the fullness of the sacrament of orders, the bishop leads the particular Church in communion with the pope and under his authority.[3]

In this commentary, special consideration is given to the Church's living understanding of these canons since the promulgation of the 1983 code. Particular focus is placed on any post-codal legislation which touches upon the material covered in canons 368–430.

Structure

Book II of the Code of Canon Law, entitled "The People of God," is divided into three parts: the Christian faithful (part one, cc. 208–329), the hierarchical constitution of the Church (part two, cc. 330–572), and institutes of consecrated life and societies of apostolic life (part three, cc. 573–746).

Part two is divided into two sections: the supreme authority of the Church (section one, cc. 330–367) and particular churches and their groupings (section two, cc. 368–572).

Section two has three titles: particular churches and the authority established in them (title I, cc. 368–430), groupings of particular churches (title II, cc. 431–459), and the internal organization of particular churches (title III, cc. 460–572).[4]

Title I, considered here, is divided into three chapters (two of which are subdivided into articles):

Chapter I – Particular churches (cc. 368–374)
Chapter II – Bishops (cc. 375–411)
  Art. 1 – Bishops in general (cc. 375–380)
  Art. 2 – Diocesan bishops (cc. 381–402)
  Art. 3 – Coadjutor and auxiliary bishops (cc. 403–411)
Chapter III – The impeded see and the vacant see (cc. 412–430)
  Art. 1 – The impeded see (cc. 412–415)
  Art. 2 – The vacant see (cc. 416–430)

Historical Context

Most of the content of canons 368–430 reflects similar canons in Book II (De personis) of the 1917 code, which often presents the material differently. The 1917 code contained no canons precisely describing the diocese and other kinds of particular churches, nor were these groupings called particular churches; any understanding of them must be gleaned from the 1917 code's treatment of their leaders. Canons 293–311 treated apostolic vicars and apostolic prefects, and canons 319–328 treated prelates nullius and abbots nullius, called collectively inferior prelates; these canons came at the end of title VII, "The supreme power of the Church and those who participate in it by ecclesiastical law." These church authorities were considered to be exercising vicarious papal power, and so norms about them were contained among the canons on supreme ecclesiastical power.

[3] CB 2, 4–5.

[4] For a discussion of the dialogue in the coetus de sacra hierarchia leading to this sequence of the material in section two, see T. Green, "Persons and Structures in the Church," J 45 (1985) 44–47. The deliberate choice was made to place title I before title II. The pope (treated in section one) and the bishops (treated in section two, title I) are divine law realities, and should be treated together. Groupings of particular churches (provinces, regions, metropolitans, particular councils, and conferences of bishops—treated in section two, title II) are ecclesiastical law realities, and rightly placed after the treatment of the divine law institutes. This is the result of a 47–2 vote of the October 1981 Plenarium.

Title VIII of Book II treated episcopal power and those who share in it. It contained two chapters on bishops: chapter 1 on "bishops" (CIC 329–333 dealing with the appointment of all bishops and CIC 334–349 on the ministry of residential [diocesan] bishops), and chapter 2 on "coadjutor and auxiliary bishops" (CIC 350–355).

The treatment of the impeded and vacant see was combined into chapter 7 of title VIII (CIC 429–444).

The 1967 synod of bishops approved ten principles to guide the revision of the 1917 code,[5] three of which have particular significance in considering canons 368–430. Principle four directed that the office of bishop was to be presented positively in the revised code; in accord with conciliar teaching, especially that of Christus Dominus 8, bishops should be given all the faculties needed to exercise their pastoral ministry—except in cases explicitly reserved to the supreme authority or to some other authority. Principle five called for an application of the principle of subsidiarity in the Church. Like principle four, principle five recognizes the fact that diocesan bishops, as successors to the apostles, possess all the ordinary, proper, and immediate power to perform their pastoral function—unless the Supreme Pontiff has reserved some case to himself or to another authority. Although canon law must remain uniform for the entire Church, there is also place for particular legislation, especially in the matter of administration of temporal goods (which must regard local civil laws and diverse economic variables); while general procedural laws must be uniform throughout the Church, local authorities will enact norms to be observed in local tribunals. Finally, principle eight said that territory should remain the usual determinant of jurisdiction, although serious reasons (e.g., the rite or nationality of the faithful) may require other determinants, at least together with territory.

[5] Comm 1 (1969) 77–85. For more discussion about these principles, see J. Alesandro, "The Revision of the Code of Canon Law: A Background Study," Stud Can 24 (1990) 106–110.

The history of the revision of the 1917 code and the creation of the 1983 code is beyond the scope of this commentary, and is readily available elsewhere.[6] Suffice it to note that the key sources for canons 368–430 are the following: the 1917 code, three conciliar documents (especially Lumen gentium 19–28, Christus Dominus 11–26, and Sacrosanctum Concilium 41), and two post-conciliar documents (especially Ecclesiae sanctae I, 10–13, and the Directory on the Pastoral Ministry of Bishops).

Eastern Code

The Eastern code does not treat particular churches in the same manner as does the Latin law, since the term particular church is understood differently among the Eastern churches than in the Latin church.[7] Material similar to that of canons 368–430 is found in the Eastern code title VII, eparchies and bishops, chapter 1, bishops (CCEO 177–234). After three preliminary canons (CCEO 177–179) the chapter contains the following four articles:

- Art. 1 – The election of bishops (CCEO 180–189)
- Art. 2 – The rights and obligations of eparchial bishops (CCEO 190–211)
- Art. 3 – Coadjutor bishops and auxiliary bishops (CCEO 212–218)
- Art. 4 – The vacant or impeded eparchial see (CCEO 219–233)

The chapter concludes with a single canon (CCEO 234) which treats apostolic administrators, specific norms about which are not found in the 1983 code although such an authority figure does exist in practice in the Latin church.

[6] For a commentary placing more emphasis on the development of the canons of the 1983 code, especially as compared with the 1917 code, see T. Green, "Particular Churches and the Authority Established in Them," in CLSA Com, 311–349. See also appendix I of this commentary, which traces the revision process reported in Comm.

[7] See fn. 10, below.

CHAPTER I PARTICULAR CHURCHES
[cc. 368–374][8]

Chapter 1 identifies the canonical meaning of the particular church (c. 368) and then explains in more detail the six kinds of particular churches: diocese (c. 369), territorial prelature (c. 370), territorial abbacy (c. 370), apostolic vicariate (c. 371, §1), apostolic prefecture (c. 371, §1), and apostolic administration erected in a stable manner (c. 372, §2). As a rule a particular church is defined by territory, though some other criterion of determination may exist (e.g., the rite of the faithful) (c. 372). Only the supreme authority of the Church erects a particular church which, when erected, possesses juridic personality by law (c. 373). Each particular church is to be divided into distinct parts or parishes, neighboring ones of which can be joined into groups such as vicariates forane (c. 374).

These canons expand significantly canons 215–217 of the 1917 code which simply explained that the supreme authority of the Church could erect or modify an ecclesiastical province, diocese, abbey nullius, or vicariate nullius (CIC 215, §1), that the abbey nullius and the vicariate nullius were likened to a diocese (CIC 215, §2), that the territory of a diocese was to be divided into parishes (CIC 216), that several nearby parishes were to be united into regions called vicariates forane, deaneries (decanatus), or archpresbyteries (CIC 217, §1), and that, if such regional grouping seemed impossible or inopportune, the bishop was to consult the Holy See (CIC 217, §2). The canons of the 1917 code did not describe a particular church or the kinds of particular churches. Apostolic vicars and apostolic prefects (CIC 293–311) and prelates nullius and abbots nullius (CIC 319–328), all figures likened to residential bishops, were treated in the section on the supreme authority of the Church since they participated in papal power.

Canon 177, §1 of the Eastern code on the eparchy is similar to canon 369 on the diocese, and canon 177, §2 of the Eastern code is similar to canon 373 on the power competent to modify dioceses. Canon 311 of the Eastern code on the exarchy is similar to the apostolic vicariate in canon 371, §1. Other similar canons about particular churches are not in the Eastern code, and the eparchy and exarchy are not called particular churches, a term avoided in the Eastern code.[9]

Types of Particular Churches

Canon 368 — Particular churches, in which and from which the one and only Catholic Church exists, are first of all dioceses, to which, unless it is otherwise evident, are likened a territorial prelature and territorial abbacy, an apostolic vicariate and an apostolic prefecture, and an apostolic administration erected in a stable manner.

This preliminary canon explains particular church as the term is understood in the code.[10] In [8] For the history of the development of these canons, see Comm 3 (1971) 188; 4 (1972) 39–43; 12 (1980) 275–285; 14 (1982) 201–204; 18 (1986) 54–57, 99–102, 112–114; 24 (1992) 56–57, 309–310. Other commentaries: CLSGBI Com, 209–213; Pamplona ComEng, 292–297.

[9] Nu 9 (1979) 5–6; J. Faris, The Eastern Catholic Churches (New York: St. Maron, 1992) 403–404, 409–410, n. 3.

[10] Particular church is a term applied in a variety of ways in Vatican Council II. In LG it refers to dioceses or their groupings. In AG it refers to all the churches in a given region or social context. In CD it refers to dioceses. In OE it refers to the ritual churches or faithful sui iuris who are identified in CCEO 27 as a church sui iuris. The council also uses the term local church a number of times. The term particular church was abandoned by those drafting the Eastern code since the Latin code uses the term in c. 368 to designate dioceses and structures like dioceses. See Nu 9 (1979) 5–6; also G. Routhier, "'Église locale' ou 'église particulière,'" Stud Can 25 (1991) 277–334. Routhier discusses the terms local church and particular church; he argues in favor of using the former term, even though the Latin code has words reflecting Vatican II, the canon describes particular churches as those in which and from which the one and only Catholic Church exists. Lumen gentium 23 says that in and from the particular churches there comes into being the one and only Catholic Church.[11] Each particular church is constituted after the model of the universal Church. Within each particular church the bishop is the visible source and foundation of unity, and the Roman Pontiff is the perpetual and visible source and foundation of unity both of the bishops and of all the faithful. Each bishop represents his own particular church; all bishops, together with the pope, represent the whole Church in a bond of peace, love, and unity.

In this code, particular church refers first of all to dioceses (described in c. 369).[12] Further, unless the contrary is evident, the term is also understood to describe five other kinds of gatherings of the faithful which are likened to (assimilantur) dioceses: territorial prelatures, territorial abbacies, apostolic vicariates, apostolic prefectures, and apostolic administrations erected in a stable manner.[13] selected the latter. See also P. Granfield, "The Church Local and Universal," J 49 (1989) 453–455.

[11] See also LG 13, 26; CD 11; AG 19–20.

[12] During the process of revising the 1917 code, personal prelatures were initially included among the particular churches. It was decided in time, however, that these are not particular churches, and so treatment of them should be elsewhere in the law. Personal prelatures are discussed in cc. 294–298 in the first part of Book II, located between the treatment of clergy and associations of the Christian faithful. Nonetheless, the Congregation for Bishops is the competent Roman dicastery for everything involving personal prelatures: PB 80. See P. Rodríguez, Particular Churches and Personal Prelatures (Dublin: Four Courts, 1986).

[13] A. Longhitano explains that the first two of these five kinds of particular churches have a definitive form and differ from dioceses only for historical reasons or because of the size of the territory; the last three have an initial form and are on the way to being erected into dioceses when circumstances permit. "Le chiese particolari," in A. Longhitano et al., Chiesa particolare e strutture di communione (Bologna: Dehoniane, 1985) 31.

The persons who head these communities are equivalent in law to a diocesan bishop even if they have not received episcopal ordination, unless the contrary is evident either from the nature of the matter[14] or the prescript of law (c. 381, §2). They are also local ordinaries (c. 134, §2).

Particular churches are commonly limited to a definite territory such that all the faithful living therein form the particular church, though some other criterion of identification can exist (see c. 372). Territoriality is not, however, considered a constitutive element of a particular church; it is a specifying or determining element whereby a particular church is identified.

Pastor bonus explains the competency of the various dicasteries of the Roman Curia in the establishment of particular churches and in the appointment of bishops or other heads of these churches. In the Latin church, the Congregation for Bishops examines what pertains to the establishment and provision of particular churches and to the exercise of the episcopal function therein, without prejudice to the competence of the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples for mission territories of the Latin church. The Congregation for Bishops also deals with everything concerning the constitution, division, union, suppression, and other modifications of particular churches and groups of them (PB 75–76). It proceeds only in consultation with the "Section for Relations with States" of the Secretariat of State when dealing with civil governments in establishing or modifying particular churches or their groups (PB 78; see PB 47, §1). In mission territories, the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples deals with everything pertaining to the establishment and modification of ecclesiastical territories, and carries out the other functions that the Congregation for Bishops fulfills elsewhere (PB 89).

[14] According to the nature of the matter, presbyteral leadership figures cannot place those acts which require episcopal ordination (e.g., the power to ordain). Presbyters who govern particular churches can perform other acts otherwise reserved in law to the diocesan bishop, unless a given law forbids this.

On April 21, 1986, Pope John Paul II issued Spirituali militum curae,[15] the apostolic constitution on the military ordinariate. Military ordinariates are juridically likened to a diocese (dioecesibus iuridice assimilantur); they are special ecclesiastical districts governed by proper statutes issued by the Apostolic See.[16] Their ordinary, normally a bishop, has the rights and duties of a diocesan bishop unless the nature of things or particular statutes determine otherwise.[17] He is freely appointed (or confirmed, if legitimately designated) by the Supreme Pontiff.[18] He is subject to the Congregation for Bishops or the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples,[19] and belongs to the conference of bishops.[20]

The six kinds of particular churches identified in the code (but not the military ordinariate, whose norms were promulgated after the code) are described in detail in the immediately following canons.

Notion of Diocese

Canon 369 — A diocese is a portion of the people of God which is entrusted to a bishop for him to shepherd with the cooperation of the presbyterate, so that, adhering to its pastor and gathered by him in the Holy Spirit through the gospel and the Eucharist, it constitutes a particular church in which the one, holy, catholic, and apostolic Church of Christ is truly present and operative.

The most common form of particular church is the diocese, described in this canon with words taken verbatim from Christus Dominus 11.[21] The diocese is a portion of the people of God; its pastoral care is entrusted to a bishop for him to shepherd with the cooperation of the presbyterate.[22]

[15] This apconst replaces the instruction Sollemne semper of April 23, 1951, AAS 45 (1951) 562–565; CLD 3, 113–117. SMC asked each military ordinariate to present its proposed statutes to the Apostolic See for examination within a year of July 21, 1986, the effective date of this law. The only reference to the military ordinariate in the 1983 code is c. 569, which says that military chaplains are governed by special laws.

[16] SMC I, §1. SMC II, §4 compares the military ordinariate to "other particular churches" (alias ecclesias particulares) which reveals that in the mind of the legislator the military ordinariate is a form of the particular church. J. Beyer agrees, and writes: "Hence the ordinariate to the forces is correctly termed a particular church" ("Commentary on the Apostolic Constitution Spirituali militum curae," CLS-GBIN 76 [December, 1988] 59). D. LeTourneau, however, concludes that the military ordinariate is not a particular church (although it is very much like one) but instead is a personal prelature, in "La nouvelle organisation de l'Ordinariat aux Armées," SC 21 (1987) 37–66. There appears to be no basis for LeTourneau's position.

[17] SMC II, §1.

[18] SMC II, §2.

[19] SMC XI.

[20] SMC III. SMC adds other particulars about the governance of the military ordinariate, among which are the following. The military ordinary is to make a quinquennial report on the affairs of the ordinariate, and is to make the ad limina visit to Rome (XII). The ordinary is normally to be free from other duties involving the care of souls (II, §3). He has jurisdiction which is personal (concerning all who are part of the ordinariate), ordinary (in both the internal and external fora), and proper but cumulative (i.e., simultaneous with that of the diocesan bishop, since those belonging to the ordinariate do not cease to be faithful of the particular church where they have domicile or quasi-domicile) (IV; see also V, VII, X). Clerics may incardinate in the military ordinariate, which may operate its own seminary (VI, §§3–4). There is to be a presbyteral council (VI, §5). Special statutes for each military ordinariate will address various issues: the place of the military ordinary's church and curia; whether he will have a vicar (or vicars) general and other curial officials; details about the clerics of the ordinariate during and after their time of service; provisions for the impeded or vacant see; the existence of a pastoral council for the entire ordinariate or part of it; the maintenance of sacramental records; the status of a tribunal for the ordinariate (XII–XIV).

[21] CCEO 177, §1.

[22] The presbyterate includes all the priests resident in and/or ministering in the diocese: i.e., priests incardinated in the diocese, priests incardinated in another particular church, priests of a personal prelature, and priests who are members of institutes of consecrated life or societies of apostolic life. The diocesan bishop also has a special relationship of collaboration and cooperation with other bishops assigned to serve under his leadership in the diocese: the

The canon reveals the constitutive elements of a diocese: the bishop, his presbyterate, the people of God. The bishop gathers this portion of the people of God in the Holy Spirit through the gospel and the Eucharist. The diocese is a particular church in which the one, holy, catholic, and apostolic Church of Christ is truly present and operative. The diocese is not a mere administrative division of the universal Church. The role of the bishop is presented not in terms of his power but of his shepherding or pastoral ministry.

One observes that the description of a diocese does not mention territoriality. The canon focuses upon the people of God who form the particular church. Nonetheless, according to canon 372 every particular church is generally limited to a definite territory, although some other criterion of determination may exist, such as the rite of the faithful.

The diocese is the particular church to which are likened other forms of particular churches (c. 368). The diocesan bishop is the central figure in the particular church to which the heads of other particular churches are juridically equivalent, unless the nature of the matter or a prescript of law determines otherwise (c. 381, §2).

Notions of Territorial Prelature/ Territorial Abbacy

Canon 370 — A territorial prelature or territorial abbacy is a certain portion of the people of God which is defined territorially and whose care, due to special circumstances, is entrusted to some prelate or abbot who governs it as its proper pastor just like a diocesan bishop.

This canon identifies two other kinds of particular churches: the territorial prelature and the territorial abbacy.[23] These are portions of the people of God with specific territorial boundaries; due to special circumstances their care is entrusted to a prelate or abbot[24] as proper pastor. These authority figures govern their particular churches just like a diocesan bishop unless the nature of the matter or the law specifies otherwise (see c. 381, §2).[25]

The territorial prelature, formerly called a prelature nullius dioeceseos (i.e., attached to no diocese), has its own territory, faithful, and clergy and a prelate (who generally has received episcopal ordination). It is separated from any diocese. The prelate governs the prelature in the manner of a diocesan bishop, and is named by the Supreme Pontiff.[26]

The territorial abbacy, formerly called an abbacy nullius dioeceseos (i.e., attached to no diocese), also has its own territory, faithful, and clergy; the abbot of the nearby monastery governs it in the manner of a diocesan bishop. It is separated from any diocese. The abbot (who generally has not received episcopal ordination) is named by the Supreme Pontiff.[27] coadjutor bishop, the auxiliary with special faculties, and the auxiliary without special faculties (c. 407).

[23] CIC 319–327. In these nine canons, the 1917 code treated the prelate and abbot nullius as "inferior prelates" and in the section dealing with the supreme (papal) power of the church, not in the section dealing with bishops.

[24] On October 23, 1970, Pope Paul VI issued his mp Catholica Ecclesia which decreed that in the future no abbacies nullius were to be erected except under very special circumstances; those currently existing for the most part should be turned over to other ecclesiastical circumscriptions (in accord with the mind of Vatican II in CD 23); those whose territory is turned over totally to another circumscription will be governed by common law, unless special law has been decreed in individual instances by the Apostolic See; and normally the abbot should not possess episcopal orders unless such is demanded by the spiritual authority or special historical status of the abbacy, which embraces a portion of the people of God. AAS 68 (1976) 694–695; CLD 8, 236–238.

[25] CIC 319, §2 had legislated that a prelature or abbacy nullius with fewer than three parishes is governed by particular law and not the code. However, similar legislation does not exist in the 1983 code.

[26] The Annuario Pontificio per l'Anno 1998 identifies 52 territorial prelatures (1029–1042).

[27] The Annuario Pontificio per l'Anno 1998 identifies 15 territorial abbacies (1043–1046).

Notions of Apostolic Vicariate/ Apostolic Prefecture

Canon 371 — §1. An apostolic vicariate or apostolic prefecture is a certain portion of the people of God which has not yet been established as a diocese due to special circumstances and which, to be shepherded, is entrusted to an apostolic vicar or apostolic prefect who governs it in the name of the Supreme Pontiff.

This canon describes two types of particular churches found in missionary lands and not yet established as dioceses: the apostolic prefecture and the apostolic vicariate.[28] Commonly, a mission sui iuris[29] first becomes an apostolic prefecture; this then becomes an apostolic vicariate; finally, it becomes a diocese. The pastoral care of these two kinds of particular churches is entrusted to an apostolic prefect or an apostolic vicar. Normally, the prefect is not a bishop, but the vicar is a bishop.[30] The prefect and the vicar are equivalent to a diocesan bishop, unless the nature of the matter or the law specifies otherwise (see c. 381, §2). They govern their particular churches in the name of the Supreme Pontiff, so their power is called ordinary (attached to their office) and vicarious (not proper) power (see c. 131, §2).

Pastor bonus 89 says that in mission territories the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples deals with the establishment and modification of "ecclesiastical territories" and the appointment of bishops or others to head them. In fact, the congregation carries out in mission territories all the functions that the Congregation for Bishops fulfills elsewhere.

Notion of Apostolic Administration Erected on a Stable Basis

§2. An apostolic administration is a certain portion of the people of God which is not erected as a diocese by the Supreme Pontiff due to special and particularly grave reasons and whose pastoral care is entrusted to an apostolic administrator who governs it in the name of the Supreme Pontiff.

This canon identifies a sixth kind of particular church: the apostolic administration erected in a stable manner.[31] This kind of particular church was not identified in the 1917 code.[32] It is a por-

[28] CIC 293–311. In these nineteen canons, the 1917 code treated the apostolic vicar and the apostolic prefect in the section dealing with the supreme (papal) power of the Church, not in the section dealing with bishops.

The Annuario Pontificio per l'Anno 1998 identifies 75 apostolic vicariates (1060–1076) and 44 apostolic prefectures (1077–1083). It identifies 7 missions sui iuris (1086–1087). In the Eastern churches, the equivalent of an apostolic vicariate is the exarchy, described as a portion of the people of God not erected as an eparchy (diocese) within territorial or other kinds of limits (CCEO 311). See Annuario Pontificio per l'Anno 1998, p. 1820.

The revision commission (during very early meetings occurring on December 4–5, 1967) acknowledged that the apostolic vicariate and apostolic prefecture had merely political origins: they arose to avoid conflict between the Holy See and Spain-Portugal during the days of colonial expansion. Some of these apostolic vicariates and apostolic prefectures became even more developed than dioceses in areas such as organization of the apostolate, numbers of vocations, intensity of the Christian life, etc. The revision commission was also aware that, in today's world, there exist jurisdictional structures (e.g., military ordinariates, ordinariates for migrants, sailors, etc.) which did not exist at the time when the 1917 code was promulgated. It was felt that the revised code should provide structures accommodated to concrete social circumstances and pastoral needs. See Comm 18 (1986) 59–60.

[29] The term mission sui iuris is the name given to a mission territory not yet part of an apostolic vicariate or an apostolic prefecture. It is governed by an ecclesiastical superior who provides the personnel and other resources for it. This kind of ecclesiastical jurisdiction came into being with the decree Excelsum of September 12, 1896. See Annuario Pontificio per l'Anno 1998, p. 1823.

[30] If they are bishops, they are titular bishops, not diocesan ones (see c. 376).

[31] The Annuario Pontificio per l'Anno 1998 identifies 10 apostolic administrations stably erected (1084–1085).

[32] The 1917 code did, however, make reference to the figure of an apostolic administrator, a prelate whom the Supreme Pontiff, for grave and special reasons, appointed tion of the people of God which for special and particularly grave reasons is not established as a diocese by the Supreme Pontiff. Its pastoral care is entrusted to an apostolic administrator who governs in the name of the Supreme Pontiff, and who is the legal equivalent of a diocesan bishop unless the nature of the matter or the law specifies otherwise (see c. 381, §2). Like the apostolic vicar or apostolic prefect, the apostolic administrator also governs with ordinary (attached to his office) and vicarious (not proper) power.

Pastor bonus 47, §1 explains that the provision of particular churches in special situations and by mandate of the Supreme Pontiff, in consultation with the competent dicasteries of the Roman Curia, is handled by the second section of the Secretariat of State, the "Section for Relations with States," which governs relations with states and deals with heads of government. The creation of an apostolic administration permanently established is handled by this second section.[33]

Territoriality of a Particular Church

Canon 372 — §1. As a rule, a portion of the people of God which constitutes a diocese or other particular church is limited to a definite territory so that it includes all the faithful living in the territory.

§2. Nevertheless, where in the judgment of the supreme authority of the Church it seems advantageous after the conferences of bishops concerned have been heard, particular churches distinguished by the rite of the faithful or some other similar reason can be erected in the same territory.

The first paragraph explains that normally a particular church is identified by a specific geographical territory, such that all the faithful who live in the territory belong to it. Territoriality is not a constitutive element of a particular church, but a determining element of the portion of the people of God who are defined as a particular church.[34] Territorial dwelling place (i.e., domicile or quasi-domicile) determines a person's pastor and ordinary (see c. 107).[35]

The second paragraph says that, nonetheless, within the same territory particular churches can be erected which distinguish the faithful by rite or some other factor. These can be established if judged opportune by the supreme authority of the Church after it has heard the concerned episcopal conference. Such a particular church is called either to a vacant or filled see, whether for a time or perpetually (CIC 312). He could be appointed sede plena if the residential bishop was incapacitated by illness, advanced age, etc.; in this instance the jurisdiction of the diocesan bishop and his vicar general was suspended. The apostolic administrator's rights, duties, and privileges were identified in his letter of appointment and in CIC 313–318. The apostolic administrator's role ceased when the new bishop took canonical possession of the diocese (but not if the pope or current bishop should die). Even though the kind of apostolic administrator mentioned in the 1917 code is not referenced in the 1983 law, nothing prevents the Supreme Pontiff from appointing an apostolic administrator as characterized in the 1917 code, and indeed in some places such an apostolic administrator has been appointed in recent years.

The apostolic administrator in CCEO 234 is similar to the figure identified in the 1917 code. The Eastern code says that, for serious and special reasons, the Roman Pontiff sometimes entrusts the government of an eparchy (diocese), whether vacant or not, to an apostolic administrator; his rights, obligations, and privileges are identified in his letter of appointment.

[33] Pope John Paul II established a permanent interdicasterial commission on March 18, 1989 to establish and modify particular churches and to identify their leaders. The commission is headed by the secretary of state and composed also of the prefect of the Congregation for Bishops and the secretaries and under-secretaries of both the Secretariat and the Congregation. AAS 81 (1989) 580–581.

[34] "Guiding Principles," principle eight: Territoriality should be the usual criterion for church governance. There is no reference to territory as determining an eparchy in the Eastern code. See Faris, 403–404.

[35] In a similar fashion, c. 518 lays down the general rule that a parish is territorial, but also states that personal parishes can be erected; these are determined by reason of the rite, language, nationality, or some other factor distinguishing the Christian faithful of some territory (e.g., c. 813 on campus parishes).

"personal" or "ritual."[36] Christus Dominus had called for a review of diocesan boundaries as soon as possible after Vatican II; this paragraph reflects that conciliar vision.[37] Even if a particular church is established on the basis of some criterion other than territoriality, however, territory is still a determining criterion—such that, for example, all the faithful of a given rite within a given territory form a particular church.[38]

The territoriality (or other criterion) is determined by the supreme authority of the Church when it erects the particular church (c. 373).

Competent Authority to Establish/ Juridic Personality

Canon 373 — It is only for the supreme authority to erect particular churches; those legitimately erected possess juridic personality by the law itself.

Only the supreme authority of the Church is competent to erect a particular church of any kind,[39] which necessarily will maintain a certain stability and which will be modified only after serious consideration. The Congregation for Bishops oversees everything concerning the constitution, division, union, suppression, and other modification of particular churches and their groupings for non-missionary territories of the Latin church.[40] In mission territories, the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples deals with these same matters.[41]

When a particular church is legitimately established, it ipso iure acquires juridic personality (see cc. 113–123). The diocesan bishop represents the diocese in all juridic affairs (c. 393), as do those who preside over the other particular churches (see c. 381, §2).

Parishes and Vicariates Forane

Canon 374 — §1. Every diocese or other particular church is to be divided into distinct parts or parishes.

§2. To foster pastoral care through common action, several neighboring parishes can be joined into special groups, such as vicariates forane.

Every particular church is to be divided into distinct parts, known as parishes.[42] The erection of parishes is obligatory, not optional. The code describes the parish in canon 515, §1 as a "certain community of the Christian faithful stably constituted in a particular church, whose pastoral care is entrusted to a pastor (parochus) as its proper pastor (pastor) under the authority of the diocesan bishop."[43] Only the diocesan bishop can erect, suppress, or alter the parish, but first he must hear the presbyteral council (c. 515, §2). Once it is legitimately erected, a parish acquires

[36] Directory 172.

[37] CD 22–24. CD had specifically decreed that if pastoral care cannot be provided adequately for the faithful of a different rite through the ministry of the diocesan bishop, an episcopal vicar, or priests and parishes, then a proper hierarchy for the different rites may be established for them.

[38] See "Guiding Principles," principle eight: Comm 1 (1969) 84.

[39] CIC 215, §1; CCEO 177, §2. SMC I, §2 states that new military ordinariates are erected by the Apostolic See, after it has consulted the conference of bishops.

[40] PB 76; see also PB 78 which says that the Congregation for Bishops must proceed only in consultation with the Section for Relations with States of the Secretariat of State when dealing with civil governments in the matter of establishing or modifying particular churches (and see 47, §1).

[41] PB 89.

[42] CIC 216, §3; Directory 174–177. The 1917 code equivalent of a parish in an apostolic vicariate or apostolic prefecture was called a quasi-parish. The 1983 code says a quasi-parish is the equivalent of a parish but is not yet erected as one because of particular circumstances (c. 516, §1).

[43] If the particular church in which the parish exists is not a diocese, the authority competent to erect, suppress, or otherwise alter it is the head of the community who is the equivalent of the diocesan bishop (see c. 381, §2).

juridic personality (c. 515, §3; see also cc. 516–552 on parishes).

Paragraph two of this canon says that to foster pastoral care through common action, several neighboring parishes can be joined together into specific groups such as vicariates forane, also called deaneries (see cc. 553–555). Their establishment is optional, depending only on the decision of the one who heads the particular church.[44]

The code also provides the possibility of appointing an episcopal vicar to serve as local ordinary in a specific part of the diocese, rather than a vicar forane who is not a local ordinary (see c. 476).

CHAPTER II
BISHOPS
[cc. 375–411][45]

Chapter 2 is divided into three articles. Article 1 (cc. 375–380) is about bishops in general; article 2 (cc. 381–402), the longest one, is about diocesan bishops; and article 3 (cc. 403–411) is about coadjutor and auxiliary bishops.

These canons are similar to canons 329–355 of the 1917 code, two chapters of a title dealing with episcopal power and those who participate in it: chapter 1 (CIC 329–349) concerning "bishops" though diocesan (residential) bishops were the principal focus, and chapter 2 (CIC 350–355) concerning coadjutor and auxiliary bishops. The 1983 code divides all this material into three parts: bishops in general, diocesan bishops, and coadjutor and auxiliary bishops.

The Eastern code treats eparchies (dioceses) and bishops in canons 177–218: two preliminary canons about bishops (CCEO 178–179) are followed by three articles which treat the election of bishops (CCEO 180–189), the rights and obligations of eparchial bishops (CCEO 190–211), and coadjutor and auxiliary bishops (CCEO 212–218).

ARTICLE 1: BISHOPS IN GENERAL
[cc. 375–380][46]

The canons of this article treat bishops in general.[47] The office of bishop originates from divine institution, and confers the powers to sanctify, teach, and govern—powers to be exercised in hierarchical communion with the head and other members of the college of bishops (c. 375). A bishop is either a diocesan or titular one (c. 376). Norms about the process of appointment (c. 377) and qualifications for office (c. 378) are identified, as is the requirement that episcopal consecration normally be received within three months from receiving the apostolic letter of appointment and before taking canonical possession of the specific office (c. 379). Before taking canonical pos-

[44] Canon 217 of the 1917 code required the bishop to divide his territory into regions or districts composed of several parishes; these regions or districts were called vicariates forane, deaneries, archpresbyteries, etc. If this arrangement seemed impossible or inopportune, the bishop was required to consult the Holy See. From very early in the revision process, it was concluded that such consultation with the Holy See was unnecessary and that the diocesan bishop alone should determine whether or not to arrange parishes into such groups. See Comm 17 (1985) 97. Also Directory 184–188.

[45] Other commentaries: CLSGBI Com, 213–234; Pamplona ComEng, 297–319.

[46] For the history of the development of these canons, see Comm 3 (1971) 188; 5 (1973) 217–219; 12 (1980) 285–293; 14 (1982) 204–206; 18 (1986) 94–97, 116–128, 131–133, 157–160; 19 (1987) 106, 107–109, 131–134; 24 (1992) 33–36, 315–316, 340–343.

[47] The 1983 code contains, literally, hundreds of references to bishops, ordinaries, and local ordinaries. X. Ochoa, Index verborum ac locutionum codicis iuris canonici, 2nd ed. (Rome: Libreria Editrice Lateranense, 1984) 166–172, 322–324 identifies the following references: ordinarius (86), ordinarius competens (4), ordinarius loci (128), ordinarius proprius (18), episcopatus (8), episcopi (231), episcopus auxiliaris (33), episcopus coadiutor (26), episcopus dioecesanus (303), episcopus dioecesis (8), episcopus ordinans (3), episcopus proprius (16), episcopus suffraganeus (8), episcopus titularis (5).

session of his office, the one promoted is to make the profession of faith and take the oath of fidelity to the Apostolic See according to the approved formula (c. 380).[48]

Institution and Functions of Bishops

Canon 375 — §1. Bishops, who by divine institution succeed to the place of the Apostles through the Holy Spirit who has been given to them, are constituted pastors in the Church, so that they are teachers of doctrine, priests of sacred worship, and ministers of governance.

§2. Through episcopal consecration itself, bishops receive with the function of sanctifying also the functions of teaching and governing; by their nature, however, these can only be exercised in hierarchical communion with the head and members of the college.

This canon expresses a theological teaching about the institution and functions of the office of bishop.[49] Through the Holy Spirit and by divine institution, bishops are successors to the apostles. Bishops are pastors in the Church so that they are teachers of doctrine, priests of sacred worship, and ministers of governance. They receive through episcopal consecration itself these three munera (sanctifying, teaching, governing) which, by their nature, can be exercised only in hierarchical communion with the head and other members of the episcopal college (see c. 336). This doctrine reflects Lumen gentium 19–21 and Christus Dominus 2.

A priest becomes a member of the episcopal college through episcopal ordination and hierarchical communion with the head of the college and its other members (see c. 336). Two moments must be distinguished: episcopal ordination and canonical mission. By reason of ordination, the bishop receives an ontological share in the sacred functions of Christ (teaching, sanctifying, governing). By canonical mission, given through hierarchical authority and required for such functions to become active, he is appointed to a particular office or assigned to certain persons for whom he performs these functions. Such sacred functions are discharged by different bishops who cooperate hierarchically with each other according to the will of Christ.[50] Thus, transcending the particular canonical mission of individual bishops and considering their episcopal consecration and membership within the college of bishops, there exists a true and basic equality among the bishops, under the primacy of the Supreme Pontiff (see cc. 330, 336). The power of bishops "cannot be exercised in an entirely autonomous or independent manner. Rather they must act in accord with the communio structures given by Christ to the Church: that is, in communion with the whole of the episcopal body, and in submission to the one who is its head."[51]

Diocesan/Titular Bishops

Canon 376 — Bishops to whom the care of some diocese is entrusted are called diocesan; others are called titular.

The code says all bishops belong to one of two categories: diocesan[52] or titular. A diocesan bishop is one to whom is entrusted the care of a [48] Canons 375–380 concern individual bishops; see cc. 336–341 for the code's treatment of the college of bishops, and cc. 431–459 for the code's consideration of the collaboration of bishops in groupings of particular churches (i.e., ecclesiastical provinces, ecclesiastical regions, particular councils, conferences of bishops). See also cc. 705–707 on norms about religious raised to the episcopate. A response from the PCILT promulgated December 4, 1986 indicates that a religious bishop lacks active and passive voice in his own institute: AAS 78 (1986) 1324. L. Wrenn, Authentic Interpretations on the 1983 Code (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1993) 27–28.

[49] CIC 329, §1; Directory 32–38.

[50] LG, Preliminary Explanatory Note 2; CD 11; Directory 39–43.

[51] J. Herranz, "The Personal Power of Governance of the Diocesan Bishop," CLSAP (1987) 20.

[52] Canon 334 of the 1917 code termed them residential bishops.

diocese.[53] Any other bishop is called a titular bishop.[54]

Titular bishops hold a title other than that of diocesan bishop. They comprise the following categories:

(1) coadjutor bishops, with the title of "Coadjutor Bishop of N."[55]
(2) retired diocesan bishops, with the title of "Former Bishop of N."[56]
(3) all other bishops to whom is assigned title of a "titular see," with the title of "Titular Bishop of N."—that is, auxiliary bishops; legates of the Holy See; territorial abbots; apostolic vicars; apostolic administrators; those assigned specialized service in the Church (e.g., in the Roman Curia); and any others who are not coadjutor, diocesan, or retired diocesan bishops.

A titular see is a diocese which no longer has a diocesan bishop. In earlier days the head of these sees was called a "bishop in partibus infidelium (i.e., among the infidels)"; Pope Leo XIII changed the designation to "titular bishop."[57] Titular bishops have no jurisdiction in the titular church but enjoy the privileges and honors of the episcopal order.[58]

Canon 450 provides that the members of the conference of bishops by law are all the diocesan bishops in the territory, their legal equivalents, coadjutor bishops, auxiliary bishops, and other titular bishops who perform in that territory a special function entrusted to them by the Apostolic See or the conference of bishops itself. Ordinaries of another rite may be invited; they have a consultative vote, unless the statutes of the conference decree otherwise. The papal legate and other titular bishops are not by law members of the conference. Canon 454 determines that diocesan bishops, their equivalents in law, and coadjutor bishops have a deliberative vote in plenary meetings of the episcopal conference. The statutes of the conference may give a deliberative or consultative vote to auxiliary bishops and other titular bishops.

The canons of this chapter mention many rights and duties of diocesan and titular bishops;

[53] The head of a territorial prelature, who is the canonical equivalent of a diocesan bishop (cf. c. 381, §2), holds the title of "Bishop-Prelate" of his prelature. On October 17, 1977, the SCB forwarded a letter to the Code Revision Commission indicating that Pope Paul VI had provided that prelates nullius who are bishops will no longer be assigned the title of an extinct episcopal see but will be designated with the title "Bishop-Prelate of N." The letter states: "This provision, which strengthens the real bond which is established between the said prelate and the particular church entrusted to his pastoral care, is intended to bring into reality the wish expressed on various occasions by the episcopate on the equalization of prelates for the dioceses." Comm 9 (1977) 224; CLD 8, 238–239.

[54] Canon 179 of the Eastern code says titular bishops are those to whom an eparchy has not been entrusted for governing in their own name, whatever other function in the Church they exercise or have exercised.

[55] On August 31, 1976, the SCB informed the Sacred Council for the Public Affairs of the Church that Pope Paul VI had provided that henceforth a coadjutor with the right of succession in the Latin church would hold title nunc pro tunc (i.e., "now for then") to the particular church for which he is destined, and no longer to an extinct episcopal see. The congregation also said that further study would be conducted concerning the status of prelates nullius. Comm 9 (1977) 233; CLD 8, 252–253. For the conclusion about prelates nullius, see fn. 53, above.

[56] On November 7, 1970, the prefect of the SCB informed all papal representatives that Pope Paul VI, in an audience of October 31, 1970, decided that henceforth retired diocesan bishops would no longer be transferred to a titular church but would continue to be addressed with the name of the see they had served preceded by the term "former" or its equivalent. Currently resigned bishops were given the option of retaining the name of the titular church to which they had been assigned or being designated as "Former Bishop of N." Comm 10 (1978) 18; CLD 9, 204–205.

[57] Pope Leo XIII made this change in his aplett In Suprema, of June 10, 1882. See Annuario Pontificio per l'Anno 1998, pp. 1818–1819.

[58] The 1917 code said that a titular bishop could not exercise any power in his titular see and did not take possession of it; in charity he could occasionally apply a Mass for the people of the see, though there was no obligation to do so (CIC 348). A parallel canon does not exist in the 1983 code.

other rights and obligations are found elsewhere throughout the code. In addition, all bishops retain their basic rights and obligations as members of the Christian faithful (cc. 208–223) and as clerics (cc. 273–289), as appropriate.

Appointment of Bishops

Canon 377 — §1. The Supreme Pontiff freely appoints bishops or confirms those legitimately elected.

§2. At least every three years, bishops of an ecclesiastical province or, where circumstances suggest it, of a conference of bishops, are in common counsel and in secret to compose a list of presbyters, even including members of institutes of consecrated life, who are more suitable for the episcopate. They are to send it to the Apostolic See, without prejudice to the right of each bishop individually to make known to the Apostolic See the names of presbyters whom he considers worthy of and suited to the episcopal function.

§3. Unless it is legitimately established otherwise, whenever a diocesan or coadjutor bishop must be appointed, as regards what is called the terna to be proposed to the Apostolic See, the pontifical legate is to seek individually and to communicate to the Apostolic See together with his own opinion the suggestions of the metropolitan and suffragans of the province to which the diocese to be provided for belongs or with which it is joined in some grouping, and the suggestions of the president of the conference of bishops. The pontifical legate, moreover, is to hear some members of the college of consultors and cathedral chapter and, if he judges it expedient, is also to seek individually and in secret the opinion of others from both the secular and non-secular clergy and from laity outstanding in wisdom.

§4. Unless other provision has been legitimately made, a diocesan bishop who judges that an auxiliary should be given to his diocese is to propose to the Apostolic See a list of at least three presbyters more suitable for this office.

§5. In the future, no rights and privileges of election, nomination, presentation, or designation of bishops are granted to civil authorities.

The process of the appointment of a bishop involves several distinct steps.[59] First, an individual presbyter is judged to be a potential candidate for the episcopacy; this judgment can take place in various ways. Next, the Supreme Pontiff appoints him to the episcopacy (or confirms a candidate who has been legitimately elected) and confers a canonical mission. Then, the presbyter receives episcopal consecration. Finally, the bishop takes canonical possession of his office as diocesan, coadjutor, or auxiliary bishop. The code contains canons about each of these steps.

Paragraph one of canon 377 underscores the right of the Church to nominate and appoint bishops.[60] Specifically, it identifies the central role of the Supreme Pontiff in their appointment: he freely either (1) appoints bishops or (2) confirms those who have been legitimately elected.[61] Papal [59] F. Sarrazin, "La nomination des évêques dans l'Église latine," Stud Can 20 (1986) 367–407. The author overviews the methods of appointing bishops employed by the Church throughout history, with special emphasis on the procedures listed in the 1917 and 1983 codes. See also T. Reese, Archbishop (New York: Harper and Row, 1989) 1–52. One finds interesting discussions among the bishops on the issue of episcopal selection in Archbishop John Quinn's Oxford lecture, "Concerning the Papacy," Origins 26 (July 18, 1996) 119–128, and responses from Bishop James McHugh, "What Is the 'New Situation'?" Origins 26 (August 29, 1996) 119–128; John Cardinal O'Connor, "Reflections on Church Governance," ibid., 171–175; and Archbishop Rembert Weakland, "The Local Churches and the Church of Rome," ibid., 176–177.

[60] CD 20.

[61] CIC 329, §§2–3; 332, §1; CCEO 181. The 1983 code adds that the pope also confirms those who have been legitimately elected, as takes place in such places as Germany (most dioceses), Austria (Salzburg), and Switzerland (Chur, St. Gall, and Basel) where the chapters of canons (cc. 503–510) elect episcopal candidates; their election is confirmed by the pope. Also, the President of the French Republic has the right to designate the bishops appointment or confirmation safeguards the communio which must exist between the universal Church and the particular church which the new bishop will shepherd. The law clearly states that the Apostolic See[62] makes the definitive judgment on a candidate's suitability for the office of bishop (c. 378, §2), and before his consecration the bishop-elect must take an oath of fidelity to the Apostolic See (c. 380). The Congregation for Bishops handles everything concerning the appointment of diocesan, coadjutor, and auxiliary bishops for non-mission territories of the Latin church;[63] the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples handles their appointment for mission territories.[64]

Paragraph two requires bishops to identify presbyters who are suitable candidates for the episcopacy;[65] this identification is to be renewed (revised) on a regular basis. At least every three years, the bishops of a province (or of an episcopal conference, if circumstances suggest it) are to compose in common and in secret[66] a list of presbyters, including members of institutes of consecrated life, who are suitable to become bishops (without reference to a specific vacancy). This list is to be sent to the Apostolic See. It is useful in the further process for the appointment of bishops outlined in paragraphs three and four of this canon. Moreover, the law expresses the right of each bishop individually to propose to the Apostolic See the names of presbyters whom he judges worthy and suitable to become bishops.

Paragraph three explains the process for the appointment of a diocesan bishop or a coadjutor bishop.[67] The focus is upon the needs of the particular church, and the Holy See guides the process. Unless another provision has been made, the pontifical legate[68] plays a central role. He is to of Strasbourg and Metz. See R. Metz, "Papal Legates and the Appointment of Bishops," J 52 (1992) 272–275.

[62] Canon 361 explains that the term Apostolic See or Holy See refers to the Roman Pontiff and others: the Secretariat of State, the Council for the Public Affairs of the Church, and other institutes of the Roman Curia, unless it is otherwise apparent from the nature of the matter or the context of the words.

[63] PB 77; see also 47, §1.

[64] PB 89.

[65] See also Sacred Council for the Public Affairs of the Church, Episcoporum delectum, March 25, 1972, AAS 64 (1972) 386–391. English translation: "Norms for the Promotion of Candidates to the Episcopal Ministry in the Latin Church," CLD 8, 366–372. These norms explain the process of consultation prior to the appointment of bishops in the Latin church, and are reflected in canon 377. They continue to be applicable unless contradicted by the code, since their subject matter has not been completely revised by the 1983 code (see c. 6, §1, 4°). Note also that ES I, 10 asked episcopal conferences to propose each year the names of suitable candidates for the episcopacy; see CD 20. See CCEO 182, §§2–4: generally the Eastern code tends to provide for somewhat greater input from the particular churches in the selection of bishops. The Roman Pontiff must give assent to each candidate proposed by the synod of bishops. See Faris, 421–422; Pospishil Com, 210.

[66] Even the voting of the bishops gathered is to be done in a secret fashion. See Episcoporum delectum, VII, 2. The secrecy has many values: it permits a candid expression of opinions about the candidate, it respects his good name and reputation, it avoids the hurt which can come when expectations of appointment are not fulfilled, it bypasses publicity and lobbying for or against candidates, etc. See also the instruction on papal secrecy from the Secretariat of State, Secreta continere, February 4, 1974, AAS 66 (1974) 89–92. English translation: CLD 8, 205–210.

[67] Since the code envisions that the coadjutor bishop is to become the diocesan bishop when the see is vacant (c. 403, §3), the process for his appointment is effectively the same as that for the appointment of one who will be the diocesan bishop immediately.

[68] Canon 363, §1 explains that the pontifical legate has the duty to represent the Roman Pontiff in a stable manner to the particular churches, or to the states and public authorities to which the legates are sent. Canon 364 says that the principal function of a legate is daily to make more strong and more effective the bonds of unity existing between the Apostolic See and the particular churches, and then outlines some of the ways in which this principal function is achieved. Canon 364, 4° says that, regarding the nomination of bishops, the pontifical legate is to transmit or propose to the Apostolic See the names of candidates and to instruct the informational process con-

send to the Apostolic See the list or terna of candidates for the office in question, composed after he has sought out individually the suggestions of the metropolitan and suffragans of the province (see cc. 435–436) in which the diocese which will receive the diocesan or coadjutor bishop is located, and the suggestions of the president of the episcopal conference. The legate is to communicate these suggestions to the Apostolic See along with his own opinion. He is also to hear some members of the college of consultors (c. 502) and of the cathedral chapter (cc. 503–510).[69] If he judges it opportune, he may also obtain individually and secretly the opinion of others: secular clergy, religious clergy, and laity outstanding in wisdom.[70] cerning presbyters to be promoted, according to the norms issued by the Apostolic See. For more on the role of the pontifical legate, see cc. 362–367.

Paragraph four explains the process for the appointment of an auxiliary bishop—a process simpler than that for the appointment of a diocesan or coadjutor bishop.[71] Unless some other provision has been made legitimately, when a diocesan bishop judges that his diocese needs an auxiliary (see c. 403, §1), he is to propose to the Apostolic See a list of at least three suitable presbyters. This canon does not identify precisely the role of the pontifical legate in the discernment and appointment process, nor does the law require consultation with other bishops (e.g., those of the province) on either the need of the diocese for an auxiliary or on the suitability of a candidate for the office.

[69] The law does not state that members of the presbyteral council (cc. 495–501) are to be involved in the consultation process since the council does not exist sede vacante (c. 501, §2).

[70] Canon 377, §3 requires that the papal legate consult certain persons who have clear leadership roles in the diocese (e.g., the college of consultors or the cathedral chapter) and gives him free discretion to consult others. See c. 524 on a similar process of consultation before a diocesan bishop appoints a pastor. The bishop is to listen to the vicar forane and may consult some other presbyters and lay persons.

[71] CD 26.

The last paragraph of this canon insists that hereafter civil authorities are to be given no rights and privileges of election, nomination, presentation, or designation of bishops. This provides the Church greater freedom in the selection of its bishops without any intervention of civil government. This norm reiterates Christus Dominus 20, which also invited dialogue between the Holy See and those governments which were able to propose episcopal candidates, with the object of the governments' freely waiving their rights and privileges of election, nomination, or presentation of sees.

Qualifications to Be a Bishop

Canon 378 — §1. In regard to the suitability of a candidate for the episcopacy, it is required that he is:

1° outstanding in solid faith, good morals, piety, zeal for souls, wisdom, prudence, and human virtues, and endowed with other qualities which make him suitable to fulfill the office in question;

2° of good reputation;

3° at least thirty-five years old;

4° ordained to the presbyterate for at least five years;

5° in possession of a doctorate or at least a licentiate in sacred scripture, theology, or canon law from an institute of higher studies approved by the Apostolic See, or at least truly expert in the same disciplines.

§2. The definitive judgment concerning the suitability of the one to be promoted pertains to the Apostolic See.

The code identifies in this canon those qualities which are required for a presbyter to become a bishop.[72] A presbyter must have certain positive human gifts, including talents needed to fulfill the given episcopal office: consideration is given both to the qualifications of the candidate and the requirements of the office for which he is being considered.[73] The candidate must have a good reputation. He must be at least thirty-five years old and ordained a presbyter for at least five years. He must also have a doctorate or licentiate in scripture, theology, or canon law from an institute of higher studies approved by the Apostolic See, or at least be truly expert in these areas.[74]

[72] CIC 331, §§1–2; CCEO 180; Directory 21–31.

Paragraph two explains that the definitive (but not only) judgment on the suitability of a presbyter for the episcopacy rests with the Apostolic See.[75] Others, however, also make a judgment about a candidate's suitability (e.g., the bishops of the ecclesiastical province), though their judgment would not be considered definitive.

Requirement of Episcopal Consecration

Canon 379 — Unless he is prevented by a legitimate impediment, whoever has been promoted to the episcopacy must receive episcopal consecration within three months from the receipt of the apostolic letter and before he takes possession of his office.

A presbyter promoted to the episcopacy must receive episcopal consecration within three months of receiving the apostolic letter and before he takes canonical possession of his office, unless he is held back by a legitimate impediment.[76]

Canon 1014 says that, unless the Apostolic See grants a dispensation, the principal consecrating bishop is to be joined by at least two other consecrating bishops; it is especially appropriate that together with these three all the bishops present also co-consecrate the bishop-elect. This symbolizes clearly the episcopal communio.

Canon 1013 says that no bishop is to consecrate another bishop unless it is first evident that the pontifical mandate exists. Canon 1382 explains that if a bishop consecrates another as bishop without a pontifical mandate, both receive a latae sententiae excommunication whose remission is reserved to the Apostolic See.

Unless he is prevented from doing so by some legitimate impediment (e.g., an illness), a presbyter becoming a diocesan bishop must take canonical possession of the diocese within four months of receipt of the apostolic letter of appointment; if he is already a bishop, within two months of receiving the letter (c. 382, §2).

Profession of Faith/Oath of Fidelity

Canon 380 — Before he takes canonical possession of his office, the one promoted is to make the profession of faith and take the oath of fidelity to the Apostolic See according to the formula approved by the Apostolic See.

In addition to receiving episcopal consecration before taking canonical possession of his office, [73] Presumably, the needs of a diocese will surface during the consultation process led by the pontifical legate (see c. 377, §3) and from the quinquennial report on the state of the diocese (c. 399).

[74] The 1917 code had required that a candidate for the episcopacy be legitimate by birth (not even legitimated by the subsequent marriage of his parents) and be at least thirty years of age (CIC 331, §1, 1°–2°). The 1983 code makes absolutely no reference to legitimacy as a requirement, and raises the minimum age to thirty-five, perhaps because of a clearer sense of the significance and burdens of the office.

[75] CIC 331, §3. PB identifies the dicasteries competent to judge on the suitability of candidates in the Latin church: the Section for Relations with States of the SS (in special circumstances and by mandate of the Supreme Pontiff, and in consultation with the other competent dicasteries, art. 47, §1), the CEP for mission territories (PB 89), the CFB for other particular churches (PB 77; see 78).

[76] CIC 333 had required that a candidate receive episcopal consecration within three months of receiving the apostolic letters, and go to his diocese within four months. See CCEO 188, §1, which gives the eparchial bishop-elect three months to receive episcopal consecration from the day of proclamation or receipt of the apostolic letter of appointment, and four months to take canonical possession of the eparchy from the same day. See CB 1129–1132 on the election of the bishop, 1133–1137 on the ordination of the bishop, 1138–1140 on taking possession of the diocese, and 1141–1148 on reception of the bishop in his cathedral church.

the presbyter promoted is to make a profession of faith (see c. 833, 3°) and take an oath of fidelity to the Apostolic See, in accord with the formula approved by the same Apostolic See.[77]

Article 2: Diocesan Bishops [cc. 381–402][78]

Article 2 is devoted to the office of diocesan bishop. It explains that the diocesan bishop has the ordinary, proper, and immediate power needed to exercise his office, and that some of this power can be reserved only by the Supreme Pontiff (c. 381, §1). Those who lead other particular churches are legally equivalent to him, unless otherwise apparent by the law or the nature of the matter (c. 381, §2). The diocesan bishop may exercise his role only after taking canonical possession of his office (c. 382).

The diocesan bishop is to have special pastoral concern for Catholics, other Christians, and the unbaptized (c. 383), and is to attend to presbyters with special solicitude (c. 384). He is to foster vocations to ministry and consecrated life, with special care for priestly and missionary vocations (c. 385).

He is to preach frequently and to oversee all aspects of the ministry of the word in the diocese (c. 386). He is to be a good example and to promote the holiness of all the faithful, especially through the celebration of the sacraments (c. 387). He must offer the Missa pro populo on the prescribed days (c. 388) and should frequently preside at Masses in the cathedral and other churches, especially on holy days and solemnities (c. 389). He performs pontifical functions throughout the diocese (c. 390).

The diocesan bishop governs the diocese with legislative power (always to be exercised personally), executive power (shared especially with his vicars general and episcopal vicars; it is simply delegated to others, such as chancellors and vice-chancellors), and judicial power (shared with his judicial vicar and judges) (c. 391). He is to promote universal church discipline and to guard against abuses (c. 392). He represents the diocese in all juridic affairs (c. 393).

The diocesan bishop is to foster and coordinate the works of the apostolate, and to urge the faithful to assume their proper roles in it (c. 394).

He is to reside in the diocese and not be absent for lengthy periods of time (c. 395) and to make pastoral visitations throughout the diocese (cc. 396–398). He presents the quinquennial report to the Holy See (c. 399) on the occasion of his ad limina visit (c. 400).

The diocesan bishop is to offer his resignation at age seventy-five, or earlier if he is burdened by ill health or another limiting factor (c. 401). He then becomes bishop emeritus of the diocese and may maintain residence therein; the diocese is responsible to provide for his retirement, under the caring oversight of the episcopal conference (c. 402).

Scope of Power of a Diocesan Bishop

Canon 381 — §1. A diocesan bishop in the diocese entrusted to him has all ordinary, proper, and immediate power which is required for the exercise of his pastoral function except for cases which the law or a decree of the Supreme Pontiff reserves to the supreme authority or to another ecclesiastical authority.

§2. Those who preside over the other communities of the faithful mentioned in can. 368 are [77] CIC 332, §2; CCEO 187, §2. The CDF issued the text of the profession of faith (replacing the profession issued in 1967, AAS 59 [1967] 1058) and the oath of fidelity, both of which became effective on March 1, 1989 (see AAS 81 (1989) 104–106). That oath of fidelity is intended for the persons mentioned in c. 833, 5°–8°, not for bishops. The "oath of fidelity to the Apostolic See" required of bishops seemingly has not been officially published. See H. Schmitz, "'Professio fidei' and 'Iusiurandum fidelitatis,'" AkK 157 (1988) 353–429.

[78] For the history of the development of these canons, see Comm 3 (1971) 188; 5 (1973) 219–224; 12 (1980) 293–308; 14 (1982) 206–208; 18 (1986) 128–130, 134–157, 161–170; 19 (1987) 109–116, 135–142; 24 (1992) 37–39, 316–320, 343–350.

equivalent in law to a diocesan bishop unless it is otherwise apparent from the nature of the matter or from a prescript of law.

A diocesan bishop possesses in his diocese all the ordinary, proper, and immediate power needed to perform his pastoral ministry.[79] This teaching reflects the doctrine in Lumen gentium 27,[80] which explains that bishops are not to be considered vicars of the Roman Pontiff, but that they exercise the power they possess in their own right and are true prelates of the people they govern. They are vicars and legates of Christ, and their power comes from him.[81] This power of governance is a sacred and personal power which is radically conferred by episcopal ordination; it becomes a juridical power by means of canonical mission from supreme authority.[82]

This canon incorporates guiding principles four and five for the revision of the code.[83] Principle four calls for a positive presentation of the powers of the episcopal office and for fewer cases being reserved to the supreme authority or another authority in the church. Bishops should have the legal authority to exercise their pastoral leadership, notwithstanding the power of the Roman Pontiff, given him by office, to reserve cases to himself or to assign them to another authority. Principle five proposes the application of the principle of subsidiarity by which bishops and other infra-universal leaders will be given more discretionary authority. Reserved cases must be clearly delineated, and there should be a greater latitude for particular legislation.

The diocesan bishop's power of governance is distinguished as legislative, executive, and judicial (c. 391, §1). He uses these pastoral powers, which come to him from Christ, to lead the people of his particular church; he also leads and shepherds continually by the model of his own life (see c. 387).

The power of a diocesan bishop is ordinary (related to his office as diocesan bishop), proper (exercised in his own name, not vicariously in the name of another), and immediate (directed toward all in the diocese without the mediation of another).[84] Lumen gentium 27 and Christus Dominus 8 explain that he exercises this power personally in the name of Christ, even though the supreme authority of the Church can control and limit its exercise, whether by the law or by a decree of the Supreme Pontiff.[85] This can be done when it

[79] CIC 334, §1; CCEO 178; Directory 42. See Herranz, 16–34; T. Green, "The Pastoral Governance Role of the Diocesan Bishop: Foundations, Scope and Limitations," J 49 (1989) 472–506.

[80] See also CD 8, 11.

[81] The 1983 code does not explicitly state that bishops are vicars of Christ, though the Roman Pontiff is so described (c. 331). The Eastern code, however, says that the eparchial (diocesan) bishop governs in his own name the eparchy (diocese) entrusted to him as a vicar and legate of Christ (CCEO 178).

[82] Herranz states: "That is to say consecration and canonical mission form a power of governance of a personal nature, whose complete entitlement and juridical and moral responsibility affects only the conscience of the diocesan pastor in an immediate and non-transferable way" (18).

[83] Comm 1 (1969) 80–81.

[84] SMC IV says that military ordinaries, who normally are bishops, have all the rights and duties of diocesan bishops. Their jurisdiction is personal (it can be exercised over those who belong to the ordinariate even if they are beyond national boundaries), ordinary, and proper but cumulative—that is, the jurisdiction of the military ordinary is in addition to that of the diocesan bishop since the faithful of the ordinariate do not cease being part of the particular church of the diocesan bishop where they have a domicile or a quasi-domicile (c. 102).

[85] See Green, "The Pastoral Governance Role of the Diocesan Bishop," 492–503. Green comments that there needs to be a continuing effort to define the episcopal office positively and that each "bishop is situated in a hierarchial framework in relationship to his brother bishops, particularly the pope. The episcopal office necessarily implies an openness to collegial activity in its fullest sense or otherwise, and a solidarity with and a solicitude for the universal Church. . . . The bishop needs to be sensitive to the transdiocesan implications of his governance of the diocese given its links to the other churches in the communio, especially Rome the prima sedes. . . . Papal would be useful for the Church and when the faithful require it. In these cases the exercise of power is reserved either to the supreme authority or to some other authority in the Church (e.g., episcopal conferences, bishops of the province, an auxiliary bishop with special faculties). Certainly fewer powers of the diocesan bishop are reserved to another ecclesiastical authority in the 1983 code than in former legislation.[86]

Equivalent in law to a diocesan bishop are the heads of those other particular churches mentioned in canon 368, unless the contrary is evident either from the nature of the matter (e.g., an act requiring episcopal orders as regards a presbyter head of such a church) or a prescript of the law, even if they exercise power vicariously in the name of the Supreme Pontiff rather than properly.[87] All of these must make the profession of faith and take the oath of fidelity, even if they are not ordained as bishops (see c. 833, 3°).

Taking Possession of a Diocese

Canon 382 — §1. One promoted as bishop cannot assume the exercise of the office entrusted to him before he has taken canonical possession of the diocese. Nevertheless, he is able to exercise offices which he already had in the same diocese at the time of promotion, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 409, §2.

§2. Unless he is prevented by a legitimate impediment, one promoted to the office of diocesan bishop must take canonical possession of his diocese within four months of receipt of the apostolic letter if he has not already been consecrated a bishop; if he has already been consecrated, within two months from receipt of this letter.

§3. A bishop takes canonical possession of a diocese when he personally or through a proxy has shown the apostolic letter in the same diocese to the college of consultors in the presence of the chancellor of the curia, who records the event. In newly erected dioceses, he takes canonical possession when he has seen to the communication of the same letter to the clergy and people present in the cathedral church, with the senior presbyter among those present recording the event.

§4. It is strongly recommended that the taking of canonical possession be done within a liturgical act in the cathedral church with the clergy and people gathered together.

This canon deals with a bishop taking possession of the diocese to which he is appointed.[88] He exercises full governance in his diocese as soon as the canonical possession occurs. Unless he is held back by a legitimate impediment, if he is already a bishop, he must take canonical possession within two months of receiving the apostolic letter of appointment; if he is not yet a bishop, within four months. Canon 379 requires a presbyter named a bishop to receive episcopal consecration within three months from receipt of the apostolic letter of appointment, unless he is prevented by a legitimate impediment; certainly, the consecration must precede taking canonical possession of the diocese.

authority is supreme, full and universal, and thereby differentiated from that of the diocesan bishop; it extends to faith, morals and church governance, and entails a primacy not simply of honor but of real legislative, administrative, and judicial jurisdiction. Accordingly he may reserve certain issues to himself in view of the unity and advantage of the people of God" (492–493).

[86] M. Wijlens comments that "the 1983 code no longer uses the concept of concession, but that of reservation. Accordingly, the pope is not said to 'concede' to the bishops the power to dispense, but a bishop has every power he needs, with the exception of what the Roman Pontiff reserves to himself or to some other authority (c. 87, §1). This not only provides a greater autonomy for the bishop; it implies an increased responsibility as well." "'For You I Am a Bishop, With You I Am a Christian': The Bishop as Legislator," J 56 (1996) 74, n. 22.

[87] CIC 215, §2. SMC II says that military ordinaries, who normally are bishops, enjoy the rights and are bound by the duties of diocesan bishops, unless the nature of the matter or particular statutes say otherwise.

[88] CIC 333; 334, §§2–3; CCEO 188, §2; 189. The Eastern code says the eparchial bishop must take canonical possession of the eparchy within four months from the day of episcopal election or appointment.

Canon 418 says that when a diocesan bishop receives certain notice of his transfer to another diocese and until he takes canonical possession of it, in the diocese from which he is being transferred he obtains the power of a diocesan administrator and continues to receive his full remuneration from that see. The former diocese becomes vacant on the day he takes canonical possession of the new diocese.

The one promoted cannot exercise the office entrusted to him before he has taken canonical possession. He can, however, exercise an office which he already has in the diocese at the time of his promotion, without prejudice to canon 409, §2.

Canonical possession of a diocese takes place when the bishop, personally or through a proxy, shows the apostolic letter to the college of consultors (c. 502); the chancellor (cc. 482–485) is to be present to record the event.[89] If he is being appointed to a newly erected diocese, the bishop shows the apostolic letter to the clergy and people in the cathedral church, and the senior presbyter present records the event.[90]

The canon strongly recommends that taking canonical possession be done in a liturgical act in the cathedral, in the presence of clergy and others.[91]

The Bishop as Pastor

Canon 383 — §1. In exercising the function of a pastor, a diocesan bishop is to show himself concerned for all the Christian faithful entrusted to his care, of whatever age, condition, or nationality they are, whether living in the territory or staying there temporarily; he is also to extend an apostolic spirit to those who are not able to make sufficient use of ordinary pastoral care because of the condition of their life and to those who no longer practice their religion.

§2. If he has faithful of a different rite in his diocese, he is to provide for their spiritual needs either through priests or parishes of the same rite or through an episcopal vicar.

§3. He is to act with humanity and charity toward the brothers and sisters who are not in full communion with the Catholic Church and is to foster ecumenism as it is understood by the Church.

§4. He is to consider the non-baptized as committed to him in the Lord, so that there shines on them the charity of Christ whose witness a bishop must be before all people.

Every bishop is constituted a pastor in the Church (c. 375, §1). The diocesan bishop is pastor of his particular church. This canon identifies some of the specific groups who are subjects of his pastoral care: Catholics (even those of another sui iuris church), baptized non-Catholic Christians, and the non-baptized.

The first paragraph says the diocesan bishop is to be concerned for all the Christian faithful present in the diocese, even if they are there only temporarily. He is to offer special pastoral care to those who cannot make use of ordinary means of such care and those who have ceased religious practice.[92] The exact practical application of this canon will depend upon the unique character of the particular church. The canon reflects Christus Dominus 11, 16, and 18.

The second paragraph says that the diocesan bishop is to provide spiritual care to Catholics of other sui iuris churches.[93] This may be done through priests, parishes, or even an episcopal vicar (c. 476). This corresponds to the right of the Christian faithful "to worship God according to the prescripts of their own rite approved by the legitimate pastors of the Church" (c. 214). It reflects the teaching of Christus Dominus 23 (3).

[89] The chancellor, present to record the event of the bishop taking canonical possession of the diocese, is exercising his or her role as notary of the curia (c. 482, §3; see c. 484).

[90] See c. 404 on the manner in which a coadjutor and an auxiliary bishop take canonical possession of their offices.

[91] SC 41; CB 1138–1148.

[92] CCEO 192, §1; Directory 153–157.

[93] CCEO 193.

The third paragraph tells the diocesan bishop to be humble and charitable toward Christians who are not in full communion with the Catholic Church, and to foster ecumenism according to the mind of the Church. Lumen gentium 27 and Christus Dominus 11 and 16 teach the same.[94]

Finally, the fourth paragraph says the diocesan bishop is to regard the unbaptized also as committed to his care in the Lord, and is to evidence Christ-like charity toward them.[95] Christus Dominus 11 and 16 is reflected in this provision.

Bishop's Relation to Presbyters

Canon 384 — With special solicitude, a diocesan bishop is to attend to presbyters and listen to them as assistants and counselors. He is to protect their rights and take care that they correctly fulfill the obligations proper to their state and that the means and institutions which they need to foster spiritual and intellectual life are available to them. He also is to take care that provision is made for their decent support and social assistance, according to the norm of law.

The diocesan bishop is to attend to his presbyters with special solicitude; he is to regard them as assistants and counselors.[96] He is to protect their rights. He is to see that they fulfill their obligations, and that they have the necessary resources to foster their spiritual and intellectual life. He is to care for their decent support and social assistance. Canon 384 identifies the diocesan bishop as the source of care, challenge, and support of priests in exercising their rights and fulfilling their obligations.[97] This canon reflects the conciliar doctrine of Lumen gentium 28, Christus Dominus 16, and Presbyterorum ordinis 20–21.

The diocesan bishop receives assistance and advice from his presbyters not only as individuals but also in groups, such as the presbyteral council (cc. 495–501) and the college of consultors (c. 502). The diocesan bishop is to hear the presbyteral council, which exists to promote the pastoral good of the diocese (c. 495, §1) in affairs of greater importance (c. 500, §2). The college of consultors assists the diocesan bishop in the several specific areas identified in the law, most of which concern diocesan temporalities.[98] Furthermore, if it exists, the diocesan bishop also receives assistance from the episcopal council (composed of vicars general and episcopal vicars, who must be priests), which serves to foster pastoral action more suitably (c. 473, §4). In addi-

[94] See c. 755 on the duty of bishops to foster ecumenism, in accord with prescripts issued by the supreme authority of the Church; see also cc. 844 (communicatio in sacris), 933 (permission for a priest to celebrate the Eucharist in a non-Catholic place of worship), 1124–1129 (mixed marriages), and 1183, §3 (funeral rites of baptized non-Catholics). See also Directory 48, 158. Ecum Dir 4 says: "The bishops individually for their own dioceses and collegially for the whole church are, under the authority of the Holy See, responsible for ecumenical policy and practice." The Ecum Dir in its comprehensiveness will help clarify the bishop's ecumenical role much more fully than the code. See also B. Griffin, "The Challenge of Ecumenism for Canonists," CLSAP (1993) 17–38.

[95] CCEO 192, §3; Directory 159.

[96] See John Paul II, "Pastores dabo vobis," Origins 21 (April 16, 1992) 717, 719–759; CFC, Directory for the Life and Ministry of Priests (Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1994).

[97] The obligations and rights common to all clerics are identified in cc. 273–289, as well as elsewhere throughout the code. Specific rights and duties are also assigned to clergy with particular offices in the church (e.g., vicars general, episcopal vicars, vicars forane, pastors, rectors, etc.). See CCEO 192, §4. Note that CCEO 192, §5 says the eparchial bishop is to see that the families of married clerics are provided with adequate support, appropriate protection, social assistance, and health insurance. See also Directory 107–117. CCEO 194 says the eparchial bishop can confer certain honorific dignities on clerics; such a canon is not found in the Latin code.

[98] The diocesan bishop needs the consent of the college of consultors to perform acts of extraordinary administration, as defined by the episcopal conference (c. 1277), and to alienate diocesan property whose proposed value is between the minimum and maximum amounts defined by the episcopal conference (c. 1292, §1). He needs the college's advice to appoint and remove the diocesan finance officer (c. 494, §§1–2).

tion, the diocesan bishop receives the assistance of that group of pastors commonly identified as pastor consultors[99] in the processes to remove (cc. 1742, §1; 1745) or transfer (c. 1750) a pastor unwilling to be removed or transferred.

Although canon 384 does not mention deacons, it is reasonable to expect that the diocesan bishop will also care for and nurture them in their ministry.[100] He will also have special concern for their families, if the permanent deacons are married.[101]

Fostering of Vocations

Canon 385 — As much as possible, a diocesan bishop is to foster vocations to different ministries and to consecrated life, with special care shown for priestly and missionary vocations.

The diocesan bishop is to foster vocations to the various ministries and to consecrated life.[102] He is to have special care for priestly and missionary vocations. This canon reflects Christus Dominus 15, which says the bishop should foster vocations to priesthood, religious life, and missionary works; the canon is more broad, since it tells the bishop to foster vocations to various ministries as well.[103] Although the promotion of ecclesial vocations is a concern of the whole Church, canon 233 says that diocesan bishops most especially are to be concerned with promoting vocations to the clerical state, including vocations of men of more mature age. They are also to promote vocations to the missions (c. 791, 1°).

The Bishop as Teacher

Canon 386 — §1. A diocesan bishop, frequently preaching in person, is bound to propose and explain to the faithful the truths of the faith which are to be believed and applied to morals. He is also to take care that the prescripts of the canons on the ministry of the word, especially those on the homily and catechetical instruction, are carefully observed so that the whole Christian doctrine is handed on to all.

§2. Through more suitable means, he is firmly to protect the integrity and unity of the faith to be believed, while nonetheless acknowledging a just freedom in further investigating its truths.

Every bishop is a teacher of doctrine (c. 375, §1).[104] This canon identifies the aspects of the role of the diocesan bishop as a teacher of the faith[105] and reflects the doctrine of Christus Dominus 12–14.

The first paragraph of the canon says that the diocesan bishop teaches in a variety of ways. He is to preach in person frequently. He is bound to propose and explain truths of the faith and morals. He is to make sure that the canons dealing with the ministry of the word are observed carefully—with a special eye on the homily and catechetical formation. Canon 756, §2 says the diocesan bishop is the moderator of the entire ministry of the word within the diocese; he exercises the function of proclaiming the gospel there.[106]

[99] No specific name is given to this group in the code.

[100] The code distinguishes transitional deacons from permanent deacons, who may be married. Canon 288 explains that permanent deacons are not bound by some of the canons which bind other clerics, unless particular law establishes otherwise.

[101] See Bishops' Committee on the Permanent Diaconate, Foundations for the Renewal of the Diaconate (Washington, D.C.: NCCB/USCC, 1993); NCCB, Permanent Deacons, 3rd ed. (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1995).

[102] See CCEO 195, which mentions the eparchial bishop fostering vocations to priestly, diaconal, and monastic life; to institutes of consecrated life; and to the missions. See also Directory 118–119.

[103] See also OT 2; AG 20.

[104] The teaching role of the diocesan bishop is understood properly only by a thorough study of Book III of the code. See also NCCB, The Teaching Ministry of the Diocesan Bishop: A Pastoral Reflection (Washington, D.C.: NCCB, 1992); J. Tobin, "The Diocesan Bishop as Moderator of the Entire Ministry of the Word," CLSANZ Proceedings (1988) 51–84.

[105] CIC 336, §2; CCEO 196, 623, §1; Directory 55–65, 75.

[106] Canons 757–759 explain that the ministry of the word and proclamation of the gospel is also shared by pres-

All sacred ministers are to hold the function of preaching in great esteem (c. 762), and bishops have the right to preach the word of God everywhere, including churches and oratories of religious institutes of pontifical right, unless the local bishop has expressly forbidden it in particular cases (c. 763). Bishops and all pastors of souls are to take care that the word of God is preached to the faithful who have special pastoral needs, and are even to proclaim the gospel to non-believers since they too are subjects of pastoral care (c. 771). All are to observe the norms on preaching issued by the diocesan bishop (c. 772, §1).

The diocesan bishop is to issue norms for catechetics: to make sure that suitable instruments of catechesis are available (perhaps even by preparing a catechism) and to foster and coordinate catechetical endeavors (c. 775, §1). Pastors are to see that all catechetical formation is accomplished in accord with norms established by the diocesan bishop (c. 777).

Canon 823, §2 gives every bishop specific rights and duties regarding social communications: (1) to be watchful that writings and the means of social communication do no harm to the faith and morals of the Christian faithful, (2) to demand that writings about faith and morals be submitted to their judgment before publication, and (3) to condemn writings harmful to correct faith and good morals.[107] These rights and duties rest with a diocesan bishop in a special way within his particular church.

The Christian faithful have the right to instruction in the Catholic faith in order "to know and live the mystery of salvation" (c. 217). As the principal teacher of doctrine in his particular church, the diocesan bishop will also take care that the truths of faith and morals are communicated by those who share his prophetic mission. Canon 253 tells bishops to appoint qualified seminary professors and to remove those gravely deficient. Canon 805 gives the diocesan bishop (and other local ordinaries) the right to appoint or approve religion teachers, and to remove them if necessary. Canon 810, §2 gives diocesan bishops the right and duty to be vigilant that Catholic doctrine is taught faithfully in Catholic universities.

The second paragraph of canon 386 teaches that the diocesan bishop is also to be firm in protecting the integrity and unity of the faith, while at the same time admitting a just freedom in further investigating the truths of the faith. Canon 212, §3 says that knowledgeable and qualified members of the Christian faithful have the right and occasionally even the duty to manifest to the sacred pastors their opinion on what pertains to the good of the Church, but without prejudice to the integrity of faith and morals. Canon 218 gives those engaged in the sacred disciplines "a just freedom of inquiry and of expressing their opinion prudently on those matters in which they possess expertise, while observing the submission due to the magisterium of the Church."[108]

The Bishop as Sanctifier

Canon 387 — Since the diocesan bishop is mindful of his obligation to show an example of holiness in charity, humility, and simplicity of life, he is to strive to promote in every way the holiness of the Christian faithful according to the proper vocation of each. Since he is the principal dispenser of the mysteries of God, he is to endeavor constantly that the Christian faithful entrusted to his care grow in grace through the celebration of the sacraments and that they understand and live the paschal mystery.

byters, deacons, members of institutes of consecrated life, and baptized and confirmed lay persons.

[107] For more specifics about the role of the diocesan bishop in overseeing the instruments of social communication and books, see also cc. 824–827.

[108] See CDF, "Instruction on the Ecclesial Vocation of the Theologian," Origins 20 (July 5, 1990) 117, 119–126; NCCB, "Doctrinal Responsibilities: Approaches to Promoting Cooperation and Resolving Misunderstandings between Bishops and Theologians," Origins 19 (June 29, 1989) 97, 99–110.

Every bishop is a priest of sacred worship (c. 375, §1).[109] This canon considers the sanctifying role of the diocesan bishop.[110] He has a special obligation to promote the holiness of the Christian faithful of his particular church. He is to be a personal model of holiness in charity, humility, and simplicity of life. He is to help every person grow in holiness according to each one's proper vocation.[111]

The diocesan bishop is the principal dispenser of the mysteries of God within his diocese. He is to endeavor constantly that the people in his care grow in grace through the sacraments, and that they understand and live the paschal mystery. These words reflect the teaching of Lumen gentium 26–27 and Christus Dominus 15.

Canon 213 insists that the "Christian faithful have the right to receive assistance from the sacred pastors out of the spiritual goods of the Church, especially the word of God and the sacraments." Canon 387 identifies the bishop's role in assuring this assistance.

Canon 835, §1 says that the sanctifying function of the Church is exercised in the first place by the bishops; it calls bishops "the high priests, the principal dispensers of the mysteries of God, and the directors, promoters, and guardians of the entire liturgical life in the church entrusted to them." Canon 837, §1 says that liturgical actions are "celebrations of the Church itself which is the sacrament of unity, that is, a holy people gathered and ordered under the bishops." The diocesan bishop is to issue liturgical norms, within the scope of his competence, which bind throughout his particular church (c. 838, §4); with other local ordinaries, the diocesan bishop is "to take care that the prayers and pious and sacred exercises of the Christian people are fully in keeping with the norms of the Church" (c. 839, §2).

Mass for the People

Canon 388 — §1. After the diocesan bishop has taken possession of the diocese, he must apply a Mass for the people entrusted to him each Sunday and on the other holy days of obligation in his region.

§2. The bishop himself must personally celebrate and apply a Mass for the people on the days mentioned in §1. If he is legitimately impeded from this celebration, however, he is to apply the Masses either on the same days through another or on other days himself.

§3. A bishop to whom other dioceses besides his own have been entrusted, even under title of administration, satisfies the obligation by applying one Mass for all the people entrusted to him.

§4. A bishop who has not satisfied the obligation mentioned in §§1–3 is to apply as soon as possible as many Masses for the people as he has omitted.

After he has taken canonical possession of the diocese, the diocesan bishop is obliged to offer a Mass for the people of the particular church on each Sunday and holy day of obligation in the region.[112] This is a personal obligation. If he is [109] The sanctifying role of the diocesan bishop is understood properly only by a thorough study of Book IV of the code. See also T. Green, "The Church's Sanctifying Mission: Some Aspects of the Normative Role of the Diocesan Bishop," Stud Can 25 (1991) 245–276. The author discusses the sanctifying mission of the diocesan bishop as the moderator, promoter, and guardian of diocesan liturgical life, especially as this role is presented in Book IV and with particular attention to his liturgical governance function (i.e., his policy-setting or normative role). See also T. Green, "The Church's Sanctifying Mission: Some Aspects of the Role of Episcopal Conferences," in Ius Sequitur Vitam: Law Follows Life, Studies in Canon Law Presented to P. J. M. Huizing (Louvain: University Press, 1991) 57–88.

[110] CCEO 197; Directory 21–23, 28.

[111] Canon 210 says that all the Christian faithful must direct their efforts to lead a holy life and to promote the growth and sanctification of the Church, according to their own condition. The special obligation of clerics to pursue holiness is explained in detail in c. 276.

[112] CIC 339, §§1, 4–6. CCEO 198 says the eparchial bishop is to celebrate the Divine Liturgy frequently for his people, and must celebrate on the days prescribed by the particular law of his church sui iuris. The Eastern code legitimately impeded, however, the diocesan bishop is to apply these Masses on these days through another, or on other days himself. If other dioceses have been entrusted to him (even as administrator only), he may offer one Missa pro populo for all the faithful given to his care. If he has failed in any of this, he is to apply as soon as possible as many Masses that he has omitted.[113]

The Bishop as Eucharistic Presider

Canon 389 — He is frequently to preside at the celebration of the Most Holy Eucharist in the cathedral church or another church of his diocese, especially on holy days of obligation and other solemnities.

Every bishop is a priest of sacred worship (c. 375, §1). The diocesan bishop is to preside frequently at the Eucharist in the cathedral and other churches in the diocese, especially on holy days of obligation and other solemnities.[114] The Ceremonial of Bishops says:

> The cathedral church is the church that is the site of the bishop's cathedra or chair, the sign of his teaching office and pastoral power in the particular Church, and a sign also of the unity of believers in the faith that the bishop proclaims as shepherd of the Lord's flock.
>
> In this church, on the more solemn liturgical days, the bishop presides at the liturgy. There also, unless pastoral considerations suggest otherwise, he consecrates the sacred chrism and confers the sacrament of holy orders....
>
> With good reason, then, the cathedral church should be regarded as the center of the liturgical life of the diocese.[115]

Sacrosanctum Concilium 41 says that the bishop is the high priest of his flock; therefore, all should hold in the greatest esteem liturgical life in the diocese centered around him, especially in the cathedral. It teaches that "the principal manifestation of the Church consists in the full, active participation of all God's holy people in the same liturgical celebrations, especially in the same Eucharist, in one prayer, at one altar, at which the bishop presides, surrounded by his college of priests and by his ministers."

Canon 899, §2 says that in the eucharistic gathering the people of God are called together with the bishop (or, under his authority, a presbyter) presiding and acting in the name of Christ; according to a diversity of orders and functions, all the faithful who are present unite in the one celebration. Canon 837, §1 recalls that all liturgical actions are celebrations of the Church, that is, a holy people gathered and ordered under the bishops; liturgical actions belong to the whole Church, a sacrament of unity, but touch individuals according to the diversity of orders, functions, and actual participation.

Churches are sacred buildings designated for divine worship to which the faithful have the right of entry for divine worship (c. 1214). The law envisions that the diocesan bishop regularly celebrates the Eucharist in them, and presumes that the faithful are present. The law does not state (nor does it exclude) that the diocesan bishop should celebrate the Eucharist regularly in oratories, which are places designated for divine worship for the benefit of some group and to which others may have access with the consent of the competent superior (c. 1223).[116] makes no mention of his celebrating on different days if he is legitimately impeded, or of his designating others to celebrate in his place on the designated days.

[113] Canon 534 explains that the pastor has a similar obligation to offer the Missa pro populo for the people of his parish.

[114] CCEO 199, §3; Directory 81.

[115] CB 42, 44; see also 43–54.

[116] Canon 1227 says bishops (diocesan and titular) can establish a private chapel for themselves with the same rights as an oratory. By definition a "private chapel" is a

Exercise of Pontificals

Canon 390 — A diocesan bishop can perform pontifical functions in his entire diocese but not outside his own diocese without the express, or at least reasonably presumed, consent of the local ordinary.

The diocesan bishop can perform pontifical functions everywhere in his diocese.[117] Outside his diocese, however, the diocesan bishop may perform them only with the express (or at least reasonably presumed) consent of the local ordinary.[118] "The pontifical insignia belonging to a bishop are: the ring, the pastoral staff, and the miter, as well as the pallium, if he is entitled to its use."[119]

Aspects of Bishop's Governmental Role

Canon 391 — §1. It is for the diocesan bishop to govern the particular church entrusted to him with legislative, executive, and judicial power according to the norm of law.

§2. The bishop exercises legislative power himself. He exercises executive power either personally or through vicars general or episcopal vicars according to the norm of law. He exercises judicial power either personally or through the judicial vicar and judges according to the norm of law.

Every bishop is a minister of governance (c. 375, §1).[120] He has all the ordinary, proper, and immediate power he needs for the exercise of his pastoral office, unless some matter is reserved by the Supreme Pontiff to the supreme authority of the Church or to some other authority, such as the episcopal conference (c. 381, §1). He also leads by his own personal example of holiness in charity, humility, and simplicity of life (c. 387).

The first paragraph[121] of canon 391 says the diocesan bishop governs his particular church with legislative, executive, and judicial power.[122] His power of governance, however, is not absolute or arbitrary: he must act "according to the norm of law." He must respect laws stemming from higher authority (c. 135, §2) and can dispense from them only in accord with the laws of the code (see cc. 85–93). This power of governance is given to the diocesan bishop to enable him to serve the faithful in the particular church who are in communion with the universal Church.

The second paragraph explains how the diocesan bishop exercises his governing powers.[123] He is the sole legislator of the diocese; he exercises legislative power alone.[124] His legislative authority cannot be delegated validly to another, and he cannot issue a law contrary to a higher law (c. 135, §2).[125] He may legislate through a diocesan place of divine worship for the benefit of one or more physical persons (c. 1226). Since all sacred functions can be performed by law in an oratory (c. 1225), and since the bishop's chapel has the same rights as an oratory, Mass and other sacred functions can be celebrated within it.

[117] CIC 337; CCEO 200; Directory 81.

[118] For specifics on pontifical functions, see CB, passim.

[119] CB 57, which continues: "The ring is the symbol of the bishop's fidelity to and nuptial bond with the Church, his spouse, and he is to wear it always" (58). The other pontificals are worn during liturgies: 59–62. See CIC 337, §2, which indicates that the pontifical insignia are the staff and miter.

[120] See Herranz, 22–27; Green, "The Pastoral Governance Role of the Diocesan Bishop," 483–490.

[121] See CIC 335, §1, which identifies three kinds of power: legislative, judicial, and coercive. The 1983 code speaks of executive power rather than coercive. See CCEO 191, §1; Directory 32–38.

[122] Canon 135, §1 teaches that the power of governance in the Church is distinguished as legislative, executive, and judicial.

[123] CIC 362; 366, §1; 368; 369; 1572; 1573; CCEO 191, §2.

[124] Wijlens suggests that a coadjutor or auxiliary bishop would be able to exercise legislative power if he had been granted such special faculties, as mentioned in c. 403, §§2–3 (71, n. 11).

[125] Wijlens comments that many canonical institutions exist to assist the bishop not only in his pastoral ministry but also in his legislative task (e.g., the presbyteral council, synod (c. 466)[126] or, outside the diocesan synod, by general decrees (c. 29).[127] As diocesan legislator, he is competent to interpret his diocesan laws (c. 16, §1) which he promulgates in the manner he determines and which bind within one month of promulgation, unless the law specifies another period of time (c. 8, §2). He can abrogate, or derogate from, diocesan laws (see c. 20). He can also issue penal laws and, for serious necessity, can add other penalties in his diocese to the penal laws established in universal law; further, if universal law provides for an indeterminate or facultative penalty, he can establish within his diocese a determinate or obligatory penalty for the delict (c. 1315; see also c. 1316).

The diocesan bishop exercises his executive power either alone or through his vicar(s) general (c. 475) and episcopal vicars (c. 476), according to the norms of law (see also cc. 477–481). By office the vicar(s) general and episcopal vicars are local ordinaries in the diocese along with the diocesan bishop (c. 134, §3).[128] They exercise their executive power according to canons 136–144. However, the bishop occasionally delegates some of his executive power to the chancellor.[129] The code identifies many administrative responsibilities which are to be exercised only by the diocesan bishop (not by the local ordinary); if the diocesan bishop wishes to delegate these to the vicars general and episcopal vicars, he must do so through a specific mandate (c. 134, §3).[130]

The diocesan bishop exercises his judicial power either alone as the judge of first instance in his diocese (c. 1419) or most commonly through others (his judicial vicar, adjutant judicial vicar[s], the diocesan pastoral council, the diocesan synod); though he is the sole legislator of the diocese the bishop may rely on the recommendations of these groups so he does not legislate in a vacuum. Always the bishop is bound to promote the common discipline of the church and to urge the observance of all ecclesiastical laws (c. 392, §1). Moreover, according to c. 135, §2, no laws promulgated by the diocesan bishop are to be contrary to a higher law: "The bishop has responsibility not only for his own local church, but also for the universal Church. This implies that the bishop as legislator must keep in mind the unity of the local church with the universal Church whenever he decides to create a new law. He should never promulgate a law that is harmful to the unity of the Church even if it appears to serve the needs of the local church" (86–87).

[126] Canon 466 teaches that the diocesan bishop is the only legislator in the diocesan synod, and that other members of the synod possess only a consultative vote. This collaboration, though only consultative, can have a very significant impact in shaping diocesan policy and life. Only the diocesan bishop signs the synodal declarations and decrees, and only he can authorize their publication.

[127] Canon 29 says that by general decrees a competent legislator issues common prescripts for a community capable of receiving law; general decrees are laws properly speaking.

[128] The law gives local ordinaries power to dispense from certain merely ecclesiastical laws: e.g., c. 88 (diocesan laws, laws from a plenary or provincial council, laws from the episcopal conference), cc. 1078–1080, 1127, §2 (marriage impediments and canonical form for marriage), cc. 1196, 1°, 1203 (private vows and oaths), etc.

[129] Herranz comments that "delegated power . . . is a delicate juridic instrument decentralizing power." He notes that in some countries the diocesan chancellor has been delegated broad powers of governance and says, "It would be less appropriate to make use of the diocesan chancellor, as used to be done in some countries in the past, when the figure of the episcopal vicar 'for a certain type of business' did not exist in law. In fact the chancellor, whether or not a cleric, does not share in the power of governance 'vi officii': his functions are fundamentally those of a notary or secretary of the curia (cfr. can. 482). And particular law could not change the nature of such an ecclesiastical office." He says that the legislator has introduced the episcopal vicar into the code and that "this figure reduces the need for the bishop to delegate his executive power. . . . There is nothing unusual about the pastoral organization of a diocese, especially the larger and more complex ones, which would include several episcopal vicars" (31–33). See also G. Mesure, The Diocesan Chancellor in Canon Law and Practice in United States' Archdioceses (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1997). He explains that diocesan chancellors in the United States commonly have acted in capacities and with powers as if they were vicars general.

[130] See H. Müller, "De speciali episcopi mandato iuxta CIC/1983," P 79 (1990) 229–235.

and diocesan judges—cc. 1420–1421),[131] according to the norms of law. With the approval of the Apostolic See, several diocesan bishops may establish a single tribunal of first instance for their dioceses in place of individual diocesan tribunals, whether for all cases or certain types of cases; in such a situation, the several diocesan bishops exercise their judicial power together (c. 1423), though one bishop generally functions as moderator of the tribunal.

Fostering Common Discipline

Canon 392 — §1. Since he must protect the unity of the universal Church, a bishop is bound to promote the common discipline of the whole Church and therefore to urge the observance of all ecclesiastical laws.

§2. He is to exercise vigilance so that abuses do not creep into ecclesiastical discipline, especially regarding the ministry of the word, the celebration of the sacraments and sacramentals, the worship of God and the veneration of the saints, and the administration of goods.

Paragraph one expresses the general norm that the diocesan bishop is to protect the unity of the universal Church.[132] Therefore, he is to promote the common discipline of the Church and to urge the observance of all ecclesiastical laws, whatever their origin may be.[133]

Paragraph two specifies the general norm.[134] The diocesan bishop is to have special vigilance that abuses do not enter the ecclesiastical discipline, especially regarding the ministry of the word (cc. 756–780), the celebration of sacraments and sacramentals (cc. 840–1172), divine worship and veneration of the saints (cc. 834–839, 1186–1190), and the administration of goods (cc. 1254–1310). Even this more specific listing, however, cannot be considered an exhaustive litany of the areas of the pastoral oversight of the diocesan bishop.

Problems may arise in the correct exercise of the pastoral function of bishops. In such an instance, the Congregation for Bishops is competent to offer assistance of every kind. If necessary, the congregation may initiate a general apostolic visitation, perhaps in agreement with other concerned dicasteries of the Roman Curia. After the visitation, the congregation evaluates its results and proposes to the Supreme Pontiff any appropriate actions to be taken.[135]

Juridic Representative of the Diocese

Canon 393 — The diocesan bishop represents his diocese in all its juridic affairs.

Once it has been legitimately erected, the diocese possesses juridic personality ipso iure (c. 373). The diocesan bishop is the agent who represents the diocese in all its juridic affairs.[136]

This canon is new: it is not found in the 1917 code which had only indicated that the local ordinary can stand in trials concerning the cathedral church or the episcopal temporal goods (CIC 1653, §1). Canon 393 makes it clear that the diocesan bishop represents his diocese in all

[131] Canon 135, §3 says that the judicial power possessed by judges or judicial colleges must be exercised in the manner prescribed in the law; it can be delegated only to perform acts preparatory to some decree or sentence.

[132] CIC 336, §1; CCEO 201, §1.

[133] Ecclesiastical laws may originate from the supreme authority of the church but also from particular councils (cc. 445–446), the episcopal conference (c. 455), or the diocesan bishop himself (see c. 391, §2).

[134] CIC 336, §2 added to this listing matters of faith and morals, catechetical instruction, and Catholic schools. The 1983 code treats these matters in c. 386. See CCEO 201, §2; Directory 65, 83, 87, 133–138.

[135] PB 79. In mission territories, such an apostolic visitation would be initiated, overseen, and concluded by the CEP: PB 89. See the CLSA Committee for the Study of Apostolic Visitation and the Limitation of Powers of a Diocesan Bishop, "Apostolic Visitation, Accountability, and the Rights of the Local Church," J 49 (1989) 341–346.

[136] CCEO 201.

juridic affairs, not only in a trial involving the cathedral or episcopal temporalities.[137]

Fostering of Apostolate

Canon 394 — §1. A bishop is to foster various forms of the apostolate in the diocese and is to take care that in the entire diocese or in its particular districts, all the works of the apostolate are coordinated under his direction, with due regard for the proper character of each.

§2. He is to insist upon the duty which binds the faithful to exercise the apostolate according to each one's condition and ability and is to exhort them to participate in and assist the various works of the apostolate according to the needs of place and time.

This canon reflects the teaching of Christus Dominus 17.[138] The diocesan bishop is to foster the various forms of the apostolate in the diocese. He is to take care that all apostolic works are coordinated under his direction throughout the whole diocese and its various parts, and with due regard for the proper character of each.

Apostolicam actuositatem 2 teaches that every activity of the Church which is intended to spread the kingdom of God is to be called the "apostolate." The Church exercises the apostolate through all its members, though in different ways. The conciliar decree says in clear terms that "the Christian vocation is, of its nature, a vocation to the apostolate as well." All are called to play an active role in the work of the Church. Canon 394, §2 says that the diocesan bishop is to insist on the duty of the faithful[139] to exercise the apostolate, and is to exhort them to participate in and assist the various works of the apostolate, with due regard for the needs of place and time.

The role of the faithful in the apostolate is identified several times among the rights and duties of all the Christian faithful. Canon 210 says that, according to the proper condition of each, they are to promote the growth and continual sanctification of the Church. Canon 211 reminds them of the obligation and right to work so the divine message of salvation reaches people of every age and place. Canon 215 mentions their right to found and direct associations for purposes of charity, piety, or the promotion of the Christian vocation; the faithful may hold meetings to pursue these purposes. Canon 216 gives all the Christian faithful the right to promote or sustain apostolic action by their own undertakings, according to their state and condition. To be called Catholic, however, the undertaking must have the consent of the competent ecclesiastical authority.

Canon 298, §1 says that associations of the faithful exist to exercise works of the apostolate such as evangelization, works of piety or of charity, and works which animate the temporal order with a Christian spirit.

Furthermore, the law also indicates that the diocesan bishop has a special rapport with the religious who exercise the apostolate in his diocese (see especially cc. 678–683).

Obligation of Residence

Canon 395 — §1. Even if a diocesan bishop has a coadjutor or auxiliary, he is bound by the law of personal residence in the diocese.

§2. Apart from ad limina visits, councils, synods of bishops, conferences of bishops which he [137] The 1983 code also says that in juridic affairs the rector represents the seminary (unless the competent authority determines otherwise for certain matters, c. 238, §2), and the pastor represents the parish (c. 532).

[138] See CCEO 203; Directory 139–161. Canon 275, §2 says all clerics are to acknowledge and promote the mission of the laity in the Church and the world, and c. 529, §2 says pastors are to do the same, even by fostering lay associations for religious purposes.

[139] The Christian faithful include clerics and lay persons; individuals from each group may live the consecrated life (c. 207). Hence, c. 394, §2 says the bishop is to insist on the duty of clergy and lay persons, consecrated or not, to exercise the apostolate according to each one's condition and ability, with an awareness of the needs of place and time.

must attend, or some other duty legitimately entrusted to him, he can be absent from his diocese for a reasonable cause but not beyond a month, whether continuous or interrupted, and provided that he makes provision so that the diocese will suffer no detriment from his absence.

§3. He is not to be absent from the diocese on Christmas, during Holy Week, and on Easter, Pentecost, and the Feast of the Body and Blood of Christ, except for a grave and urgent cause.

§4. If a bishop has been illegitimately absent from the diocese for more than six months, the metropolitan is to inform the Apostolic See of his absence; if it concerns the metropolitan, the senior suffragan is to do so.

Canon 283 says that all clerics, even those without a residential office, are not to leave their diocese for a notable period without at least the presumed permission of their proper ordinary, and that universal and particular law are to determine the time for a due and sufficient annual vacation. This rather general norm is made more specific for diocesan bishops in canon 395.

The diocesan bishop has a personal obligation to reside in the diocese, even if he has a coadjutor or auxiliary.[140] The pastoral work of the diocesan bishop requires a physical presence so that he can personally and actively perform his many responsibilities in his particular church.[141] When he is away from his diocese, he remains its diocesan bishop and must provide for the continued pastoral care of the particular church through others. Even if the diocese has coadjutor or auxiliary bishops, their function is fundamentally different from that of the diocesan bishop, whom they are called to assist and whose role they do not replace.

The diocesan bishop can be absent from his diocese for a reasonable cause but not beyond a month, continuous or interrupted. This includes his vacation time. He must take care that the diocese suffers no detriment from his absence.[142] In addition he may be absent from the diocese for the ad limina visit, councils, synods of bishops, conferences of bishops, or some other duty legitimately entrusted to him.[143] He may also be away when he makes his retreat (see c. 276, §2, 4°). The revised Form for the Quinquennial Report, issued in 1997 by the Congregation for Bishops, asks the diocesan bishop to report about his absence from the diocese: "motives, frequency, effects on the pastoral governance of the diocese."[144]

Except for a grave and urgent cause, the diocesan bishop is not to be absent from the diocese on [140] See PCILT, "Obbligo del vescovo di risiedere in diocesi (circa il canone 395 CIC)," September 12, 1996, Comm 28 (1996) 182–186. The presence of a bishop at gatherings of the conference of bishops is justified when the conference's statutes state a given bishop must be present. A superior authority may also confer another office on a bishop occasioning his absence from the diocese. Finally, a bishop should count his vacation time within the month-long period of his absence from the diocese; further, also within this month he would include such things as: giving retreats outside the diocese to persons not from his diocese, attending lectures or conferences, meetings of various regional or national groups (associations, movements, etc.), visiting foreign missions, leading religious and cultural pilgrimages not organized by the diocese, etc. The document insists that bishops exhibit their solicitude for all the Church best when they minister well to the people of their own particular churches.

[141] CIC 338; CCEO 204.

[142] Canon 533, §§2–3 deals with the absence of a pastor from his parish. The pastor is given an annual vacation of one month, taken in whole or parts, in addition to his time for annual spiritual retreat. If he is absent from the parish for more than a week, he is to inform the local ordinary. The diocesan bishop is to issue norms which provide for the care of the parish by a priest with necessary faculties while the pastor is absent.

[143] CIC 338, §2 had forbidden the bishop to add vacation days to the ad limina visit or to add them to days which take him away from the diocese for other reasons, or to combine vacations of two years into one period. It had permitted, however, that each bishop take a vacation not to exceed a maximum of three months per year, continuous or interrupted.

[144] Congregatio pro Episcopis, Formulae Relationis Quinquennialis (Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1997). English translation from the same congregation: Form for the Quinquennial Report, III, 10, hereafter cited as FRQ.

Christmas, during Holy Week, on Easter, Pentecost, and Corpus Christi.[145]

If a diocesan bishop is illegitimately absent from his diocese for more than six months, the metropolitan[146] is to inform the Apostolic See. If it is the metropolitan himself who is absent, the senior suffragan bishop is to do so. One recalls the norm of canon 1396 that a person who violates the obligation of residence which binds by reason of ecclesiastical office is to be punished with a just penalty—including the possibility, after a warning, even of privation from office.[147]

Obligation of Visitation

Canon 396 — §1. A bishop is obliged to visit the diocese annually either in whole or in part, so that he visits the entire diocese at least every five years either personally or, if he has been legitimately impeded, through the coadjutor bishop, an auxiliary, vicar general, episcopal vicar, or another presbyter.

§2. A bishop is permitted to choose the clerics he prefers as companions and assistants on a visitation; any contrary privilege or custom is reprobated.

Since he is pastor of his particular church, the diocesan bishop has the obligation to visit the diocese on a regular basis.[148] The visitation is an occasion for the diocesan bishop to know the faithful entrusted to his care and to see the various institutions, places, and things present in the diocese.[149] The Ceremonial of Bishops says: "The bishop in fulfilling the obligation to visit the parishes or local communities of his diocese should not appear to be satisfying a purely administrative duty. Rather the faithful should see in him the herald of the Gospel, the teacher, shepherd, and high priest of his flock."[150] The information the diocesan bishop gathers through the pastoral visitation process may assist his preparation of the ad limina report (c. 399) made every fifth year to the Apostolic See. Canons 396–398 concern his obligation to visit his diocese, the scope of this obligation, and the style of his visitation.

Canon 396, §1 says that the diocesan bishop is obliged to visit the diocese annually, either in whole or part, such that at least every five years he visits the entire diocese. He is to make this visitation either personally or, if he is legitimately impeded, through another—specifically, through the coadjutor bishop, an auxiliary bishop, a vicar general, an episcopal vicar, or another presbyter.[151] The canon does not provide for the visitation to be accomplished through deacons or lay persons.

Canon 396, §2 says that when the diocesan bishop makes the episcopal visitation, he is allowed to choose the clerics (i.e., bishops, presbyters, or deacons)[152] who will accompany him as [145] CIC 338, §3 had also forbidden the bishop to be absent during the entire time of Advent and Lent.

[146] Canon 435 says that the metropolitan is the archbishop of his diocese and presides over an ecclesiastical province. The office of metropolitan is joined with an episcopal see determined or approved by the Roman Pontiff. The metropolitan's very limited competencies within the suffragan dioceses of his province are outlined in canon 436.

[147] The Eastern code does not contain the threat of a sanction for unlawful absence.

[148] CIC 343. Paragraph one of this canon had identified the following several reasons for the visitation: the preservation of sound and orthodox doctrine, the defense of morality, the correction of abuses, the promotion of peace, simplicity, piety, and docility in the people and the clergy, and the establishment of anything which seems profitable for religion in light of the circumstances. Such a listing had been included in earlier drafts of canon 396, but was suppressed since it was judged evident and unnecessary: Comm 12 (1980) 305. See CCEO 205, §1; Directory 166–170.

[149] CD 23 (2) said that a factor in the revision of diocesan boundaries should be facilitating the exercise of the duty of the bishop to carry out his pastoral visitations, perhaps assisted by others.

[150] CB 1177; see also 1178–1184.

[151] Canon 555, §4 says that the vicar forane (dean) is to visit the parishes of his district in accord with the regulations made by the diocesan bishop.

[152] Canon 207, §1 says that clerics are the sacred ministers in the Church. Canon 1008 teaches that the sacrament of companions and assistants. Any contrary privilege or custom is reprobated.[153]

If the diocesan bishop fails to conduct the visitation, the Holy See may approve the metropolitan's conducting it in a suffragan diocese (c. 436, §1, 2°).

Scope of Visitation

Canon 397 — §1. Persons, Catholic institutions, and sacred things and places, which are located within the area of the diocese, are subject to ordinary episcopal visitation.

§2. A bishop can visit members of religious institutes of pontifical right and their houses only in the cases expressed in law.

This canon identifies the scope of the visitation of a bishop within his diocese.[154] Subject to the ordinary visitation of the diocesan bishop are the persons, Catholic institutions, sacred things, and sacred places located within the diocese.

The diocesan bishop can visit members and houses of religious institutes[155] of pontifical right only in cases expressed by law.[156] Canon 683, §1 says that at the time of his pastoral visitation and also in cases of necessity, the diocesan bishop (personally or through another) can visit these specific works entrusted to religious: churches and oratories which the faithful habitually attend, schools, and other works of religion or charity; he cannot visit those schools which are open exclusively to an institute's own members. Canon 683, §2 adds that, should the diocesan bishop discover abuses during the visitation process, if he warns the religious superior in vain, he can take steps to correct the abuses even on his own authority. Canon 806, §1 gives the diocesan bishop the right to watch over and visit the Catholic schools of his territory, even those founded or directed by religious; he can also issue prescripts regulating Catholic schools of the diocese, even those directed by religious.[157]

Canon 1224, §1 says the ordinary (personally or through another) is to visit a place destined to become an oratory to make sure it is properly prepared; only thereafter is he to grant permission to establish the oratory.[158]

Canon 366, 1° says that the seat of a pontifical legation is exempt from the power of governance of the local ordinary, except in marriage matters. The seat is also exempt from the diocesan bishop's visitation.

Style of Visitation

Canon 398 — A bishop is to strive to complete the pastoral visitation with due diligence. He is to take care that he does not burden or impose a hardship on anyone through unnecessary expenses.

orders marks them with an indelible character and consecrates them to nourish the people of God, fulfilling in the person of Christ the Head the functions of teaching, sanctifying, and governing. Canon 1009, §1 identifies the three orders: the episcopate, the presbyterate, and the diaconate.

[153] Canon 24, §2 teaches that any custom expressly reprobated by the law is not reasonable, and therefore cannot obtain the force of law.

[154] CIC 344, §1; CCEO 204, §§2–3; Directory 118–119, 168.

[155] This canon does not prevent a diocesan bishop from visiting a secular institute (cc. 710–730).

[156] CD 35; ES I, 38–40. Canon 397, §2 concerns the diocesan bishop's visitation of members and houses of religious institutes of pontifical right. Canon 628, §2 says the diocesan bishop has the right and duty to visit, even with respect to religious discipline, the autonomous monasteries mentioned in c. 615 and individual houses of an institute of diocesan right located within his own territory.

[157] Canon 806, §1 adds, however, that the diocesan bishop is not to interfere with the autonomy of religious regarding the internal direction of their schools.

[158] Interestingly, the code does not require any episcopal visitation before the erection of a church, though more extensive consultation is envisioned. The diocesan bishop is to hear the presbyteral council and the rectors of neighboring churches (c. 1215, §2). The law mentions, however, that even if the diocesan bishop has given religious his consent to establish a new house in his diocese, they must also obtain his permission before erecting a church (c. 1215, §3).

The diocesan bishop is to perform the pastoral visitation with due diligence.[159] He is to be careful that he does not burden or impose a hardship on anyone by unnecessary expenses.

Quinquennial Report

Canon 399 — §1. Every five years a diocesan bishop is bound to make a report to the Supreme Pontiff on the state of the diocese entrusted to him, according to the form and time determined by the Apostolic See.

§2. If the year determined for submitting a report falls entirely or in part within the first two years of his governance of a diocese, a bishop can refrain from making and submitting his report on this one occasion.

This canon concerns the so-called Quinquennial Report.[160] Every five years every diocesan bishop[161] is to present a report to the Supreme Pontiff on the state of his diocese. The format of the report is determined by the Apostolic See, as is the time it is to be submitted. It is to be sent to the Congregation for Bishops six months before the time set for the visit. In addition to this report, each diocesan bishop submits an annual statistical report to the Central Statistical Office of the Secretariat of State.[162]

Pastor bonus says that the Quinquennial Report "is to be examined with all diligence by the competent dicasteries, and their remarks are to be shared with a special committee convened for this purpose so that a brief synthesis of these may be drawn up and readily at hand in the meetings."[163] The Congregation for Bishops is competent to study the quinquennial reports presented by the bishops on the occasion of the ad limina visit, for the particular churches assigned to its care.[164]

The diocesan bishop can refrain from making this report on one occasion only: if the year for submitting it falls entirely or partly within the first two years of his pastoral governance of the diocese (§2).

In 1997 the Congregation for Bishops issued a revised Form for the Quinquennial Report. Its introductory remarks indicate that the Holy Father is given a synthesis of each quinquennial report before his private audience with each diocesan bishop, and that the preparation of the quinquennial on the local level "affords a privileged occasion for reflection on the situation of the diocese and pastoral planning for its future."[165] The diocesan bishop is to adapt the extensive schema to the circumstances of his particular church, and is urged to be objective, precise, and succinct in providing the requested information. It is important for him to include pastoral difficulties, their causes, and the means used to resolve them; he is also to enumerate pastoral issues yet to be resolved. Reports on confidential matters may be sent directly to the various dicasteries of the Roman Curia.[166] The document invites the diocesan bishop to involve his closest collaborators in drawing up [159] CIC 346. This canon had added that the bishop is not to seek or accept any gift of any kind, and any contrary custom is to be considered unreasonable; local custom is to be observed, however, regarding travel costs, food, and lodging for him and his companions. There is no parallel canon in the Eastern code. See also Directory 170.

[160] CIC 340. Paragraph two of this canon had listed the specific years that bishops from the various nations were to make the quinquennial report; this is omitted in the present law. Remaining in effect is the decree issued on June 29, 1975, by the SCB, in consultation with other interested dicasteries of the Roman Curia, entitled Ad Romanam Ecclesiam, which fixes the years in which the diocesan bishops will make the ad limina visit and prepare the quinquennial report: AAS 67 (1975) 674–676; CLD 8, 246–250. See CCEO 206, §2. The CEC handles everything concerning the quinquennial reports for the Eastern churches (PB 58, §1).

[161] SMC XII says that the military ordinary is to present a report to the Holy See on the affairs of the ordinariate every five years, according to the prescribed formula, in accord with the norm of c. 399.

[162] PB 44.

[163] PB 32.

[164] PB 81.

[165] FRQ, Intro., n. 2.

[166] FRQ, Intro., nn. 3, 5.

the quinquennial report, but adds that the bishop's own contribution is essential. This is true especially when evaluating his own ministry, giving a general assessment of the situation of the diocese, and discussing the diocesan pastoral plan with its future goals and the means to achieve them).[167]

The Form for the Quinquennial Report contains twenty-two sections, most of which begin with a comparison of statistics regarding January 1 of the first year of the quinquennium and December 31 of the last year of the quinquennium.[168] The sections, and their major divisions, are the following:

I. Pastoral and Administrative Organization of the Diocese
   A. Diocesan Ordinary
   B. Other Bishops Working or Residing in the Diocese
   C. Vicars General and Episcopal Vicars
   D. Diocesan Synod
   E. Pastoral-Administrative Offices and Consultative Diocesan Agencies
   F. Cathedral of the Diocese
   G. Division of the Diocese into Deaneries
   H. The Bishop's Evaluation and Personal Judgment on the Effectiveness and Efficiency of the Above Listed Offices, Agencies and Tribunals
II. Identification and General Religious Situation of the Diocese
III. The Ministry of the Diocesan Bishop
IV. Liturgical and Sacramental Life, The Cult of Saints
V. Catholic Education
VI. Catechesis
VII. Life and Ministry of the Clergy
VIII. Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life
IX. Missionary Cooperation
X. The Laity
XI. Ecumenism
XII. Other Religions
XIII. Pastoral Care of the Family
XIV. Evangelization of Culture
XV. Social Communications
XVI. Social Justice and the Social Teaching of the Church
XVII. Christian Charity and Human Development
XVIII. Health Care
XIX. Pastoral Care of Migrants and Pilgrims
XX. Artistic and Historical Patrimony of the Church
XXI. Financial State of the Diocese
XXII. General Assessment and Outlook for the Future

An overview of these sections and a careful reading of the entire Form for the Quinquennial Report show that the diocesan bishop is asked to render an account of the many pastoral obligations he has in his particular church. These are listed here in these canons on the role of the diocesan bishop and elsewhere throughout the code and in other legislation as well.

Ad Limina Visit

Canon 400 — §1. Unless the Apostolic See has established otherwise, during the year in which he is bound to submit a report to the Supreme Pontiff, a diocesan bishop is to go to Rome to venerate the tombs of the Blessed Apostles Peter and Paul and to present himself to the Roman Pontiff.

§2. A bishop is to satisfy the above-mentioned obligation personally unless he is legitimately impeded. In that case, he is to satisfy it through his coadjutor, if he has one, or auxiliary, or a suitable priest of his presbyterate who resides in his diocese.

§3. An apostolic vicar can satisfy this obligation through a proxy, even one living in Rome. This obligation does not bind an apostolic prefect.

[167] FRQ, Intro., n. 6.

[168] Section II is largely statistics. Sections III–XXI are divided into two parts: "A. Statistics" and "B. Description."

Unless the Apostolic See determines otherwise, during the year when the diocesan bishop[169] is to submit his Quinquennial Report, he is to go to Rome to venerate the tombs of the apostles Peter and Paul and to present himself to the Roman Pontiff.[170] This visit is known as the ad limina (literally, to the threshold) visit; it has three principal stages: the pilgrimage to the tombs of Peter and Paul and their veneration, the meeting with the Supreme Pontiff, and the meetings with the officials of the dicasteries of the Roman Curia.[171] Titular bishops do not have this obligation.

Pope John Paul II explains that the ad limina visit is an occasion when every bishop exercises his inviolable right and duty to approach the successor of Peter.[172] He states in the introduction to his apostolic constitution, Pastor bonus:

> These visits have a special meaning all of their own, in keeping with ecclesiological and pastoral principles explained above. Indeed, they are first of all an opportunity of the greatest importance, and they constitute, as it were, the center of the highest ministry committed to the Supreme Pontiff. For then the pastor of the universal Church talks and communicates with the pastors of the particular churches, who have come to him in order to see Cephas (cf. Gal. 1:18), to deal with him concerning the problems of their dioceses, face to face and in private, and so to share with him the solicitude for all the Churches (cf. 2 Cor. 11:28). For these reasons, communion and unity in the innermost life of the Church are fostered to the highest degree through the ad limina visits.[173]

He adds that in these meetings the pope confirms and supports his brother bishops in faith and charity; the bonds of hierarchical communion are strengthened; and the catholicity of the Church and the unity of the episcopal college are manifested openly.[174]

Pastor bonus teaches that the ad limina visits also engage bishops in dialogue with officials of the dicasteries of the Roman Curia: information is shared and deepened, and advice and suggestions are offered for the good and progress of the Church and for the observance of common ecclesiastical discipline.[175]

The Congregation for Bishops is competent to handle all matters related to the ad limina visits for the particular churches assigned to its care. The congregation studies the quinquennial reports and is available to the bishops when they arrive in Rome, especially to see to arrangements for visits with the Supreme Pontiff and for other meetings and pilgrimages. After the ad limina visit, the congregation also communicates in writing to the bishops the conclusions concerning their dioceses.[176] Pastor bonus announces that the Congregation for Bishops, in consultation with other interested congregations, is preparing a directory to assist bishops in preparation for the ad limina reports.[177]

In 1988, the Congregation for Bishops issued the Directory for the Ad Limina Visit[178] which contains two principal parts. The first part discusses three phases of the ad limina visit: remote preparation (involving a time of reflection and prayer, writing the quinquennial report, dialogue with the [169] SMC XII also says that the military ordinary is to make the ad limina visit prescribed by c. 400, §§1–2.

[170] CIC 341, §1; CCEO 208, §1.

[171] PB 31. See also Appendix I of PB, which offers a lengthy and inspiring reflection on the pastoral significance of the ad limina visit. The CEC handles everything concerning the ad limina visits for the Eastern churches (PB 58, §1).

[172] PB, Intro., 10.

[173] Ibid.

[174] PB 29.

[175] PB 30.

[176] PB 81.

[177] PB, App. I, 6.

[178] CFB, Directory for the Ad Limina Visit (Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1988). Comm 20 (1988) 156–165.

papal representative), intermediate preparation (involving dialogue with the Coordinating Office of the Congregation for Bishops), and the execution of the ad limina visit (involving pilgrimage to and veneration of the apostles' tombs, the meeting with the Holy Father, and contacts with officials of the dicasteries of the Roman Curia). The second part of the Directory contains three texts to help bishops better understand the richness of the ad limina visits: Joseph Cardinal Ratzinger addresses theological issues, Lucas Cardinal Moreira Neves addresses spiritual-pastoral issues, and Monsignor Vincente Cárcel Ortí addresses historico-juridical issues.

The second paragraph of canon 400 says that the diocesan bishop is to make this visit personally.[179] If he is legitimately impeded from doing so, he satisfies this obligation through his coadjutor or auxiliary, or through a suitable priest who resides in his diocese.

An apostolic vicar can choose to satisfy this obligation through a proxy, even one living in Rome.[180] An apostolic prefect, however, does not have this obligation. No reference is made to an ad limina visit made by the apostolic administrator mentioned in canon 371, §2. The heads of these three kinds of particular churches govern with vicarious power, in the name of the Supreme Pontiff.

Retirement from Office

Canon 401 — §1. A diocesan bishop who has completed the seventy-fifth year of age is requested to present his resignation from office to the Supreme Pontiff, who will make provision after he has examined all the circumstances.

§2. A diocesan bishop who has become less able to fulfill his office because of ill health or some other grave cause is earnestly requested to present his resignation from office.

The 1983 code is the first codified legislation asking for the retirement of bishops, both diocesan (c. 401) and coadjutor and auxiliary (c. 411). A diocesan bishop who has completed his seventy-fifth year is asked (rogatur) to submit his resignation to the Supreme Pontiff.[181] Strictly speaking, the law does not require resignation, but seeks voluntary resignation. The resignation must be accepted by the Supreme Pontiff,[182] who will make a provision after he has studied all the circumstances. Christus Dominus 21 had urged diocesan bishops (and their equivalents) who had become less capable of performing their roles because of age or other serious reason to resign voluntarily or at the request of competent authority; no specific age was mentioned. Without explanation, Ecclesiae sanctae I, 11 set seventy-five as the age for voluntary resignation, but did not mention retirement for reasons other than age. Canon 401, §1 reflects the voluntary request for retirement of all bishops at age seventy-five.[183]

A diocesan bishop is earnestly asked (enixe rogatur) to submit his resignation if he has become less able to fulfill his office due to ill health or some other grave cause (c. 401, §2). The "grave cause" is not further specified, but entails something other than ill health or advanced age, which are already mentioned in the canon. The code here makes a stronger request (enixe) for voluntary retirement than when the diocesan bishop reaches

[179] CIC 342.

[180] CIC 299.

[181] CCEO 210.

[182] Canon 416. The resignation does not take place ipso facto, but must be accepted by the pope. See cc. 187–189 on resignation from ecclesiastical offices.

[183] Resignation to be offered at age seventy-five is also requested of cardinals who preside over dicasteries and other permanent institutes of the Roman Curia and Vatican City (c. 354; see PB 5, §2), coadjutor and auxiliary bishops (c. 411), and pastors (c. 538, §3). Non-cardinal moderators and secretaries of Roman dicasteries cease holding office at age seventy-five, and other members of congregations lose their office at age eighty (PB 5, §2). Judges (auditors) of the Roman Rota retire at age seventy-four, and undersecretaries of dicasteries resign at age seventy; major and minor officials of dicasteries resign at age seventy (if they are clergy or religious) or sixty-five (if they are lay): Regolamento Generale della Curia Romana 43, §§4–6, February 4, 1992; AAS 84 (1992) 220–221.

the age of seventy-five, but once again the resignation is not, strictly speaking, required.

A diocese does not become vacant at the moment the diocesan bishop submits his resignation for whatever reason; it becomes vacant only when the Roman Pontiff accepts the resignation (c. 416).

Status of Diocesan Bishop Emeritus

Canon 402 — §1. A bishop whose resignation from office has been accepted retains the title of emeritus of his diocese and can retain a place of residence in that diocese if he so desires, unless in certain cases the Apostolic See provides otherwise because of special circumstances.

§2. The conference of bishops must take care that suitable and decent support is provided for a retired bishop, with attention given to the primary obligation which binds the diocese he has served.

Once his resignation has been accepted by the Supreme Pontiff, the diocesan bishop immediately becomes a titular bishop and holds the title of bishop emeritus of his diocese.[184] Unlike the custom in the past, he does not receive title to a titular church in partibus infidelium (in the territory of unbelievers) but instead holds the title of "Former Bishop of N." This symbolizes an ongoing relationship to the people whom he had previously served as diocesan bishop.

The retired diocesan bishop can retain a place of residence in the diocese if he so chooses, unless in certain cases the Apostolic See makes another provision because of special circumstances. A retired religious bishop may choose to live outside the house of his institute, unless the Apostolic See has determined otherwise (c. 707, §1).

The conference of bishops must make sure that suitable and decent support is provided to a retired diocesan bishop, although the primary obligation rests with the diocese he served. This canon reflects the discipline of Christus Dominus 21 and Ecclesiae sanctae I, 11. If a retired religious bishop has served a diocese, that diocese is to provide his sustenance unless his own institute wishes to do so; otherwise the Apostolic See is to provide (c. 707, §2).[185]

Retired bishops continue to be members of the college of bishops (c. 336) and to be pastors in the Church who are teachers of doctrine, priests of sacred worship, and ministers of governance (c. 375, §1). They still have the right and duty to take part in an ecumenical council with a deliberative vote (c. 339, §1). They also can be called to particular councils and have a deliberative vote within them if they are so called (c. 443, §1, 3°).[186]

On October 31, 1988, the Congregation for Bishops issued norms for retired bishops.[187] The

[184] CCEO 211.

[185] At its November 13, 1995, meeting, the NCCB approved a plan proposed by the ad hoc Committee on Bishops' Life and Ministry, which gives retired bishops a monthly stipend of $1,300. Also provided are other "basic benefits" which include: appropriate housing and board, health and welfare benefits (including major medical and the full cost of all medical and hospital care), an office with secretarial assistance as needed, and suitable funeral and burial. In addition, retired bishops are to receive a car for personal use, and transportation, food, and lodging expenses for NCCB meetings, ad limina visits, and provincial and regional meetings, workshops, and retreats. These norms were last considered in 1990, and will be reviewed again in 2000. See Mark Pattison, "Bishops Revise, OK Retirement Plan for Retired Colleagues," Catholic News Service, November 14, 1995.

[186] See T. Green, "Deliberative Vote for Retired Bishops in Teaching Matters," J 54 (1994) 15–21. Green discusses the possibility and advisability of retired bishops having a deliberative vote in decisions of the conference of bishops. He notes: "Relatively few conference statutes provide for a deliberative vote by retired bishops in conference deliberations. A fair number of conference statutes envision a consultative vote for such bishops. However, the great majority of conference statutes in Europe and the Americas do not explicitly refer to the involvement of retired bishops, whatever may be the de facto practice of involving them in conference activities" (19).

[187] Congregatio pro Episcopis, "Normae de episcopis ab officio cessante," Comm 20 (1988) 167–168. Unofficial translation: CLS-GBIN 79 (September 1989) 17–19.

norms acknowledge that retired bishops have the right and duty to take part in an ecumenical council (c. 339, §1). They are to be consulted about questions of a general nature just like other bishops, so that their proven pastoral experience may be shared. Like other bishops, they are to be sent documents from the Holy See, especially from the Holy Father. They may be consultants to and adjunct members of dicasteries of the Roman Curia. They may be selected by episcopal conferences to participate in synods of bishops.[188] They may have a role in the work of episcopal conferences, even if they have no vote; they should receive documents from the conference. They should also receive documents from their diocese and be informed of the various activities of the diocesan community; special care should be taken to provide financial support for them within the limits of diocesan resources. The entire Church is encouraged to make retired bishops feel they are part of its life.[189]

On December 3, 1991, the Pontifical Council for the Interpretation of Legislative Texts promulgated an authentic interpretation of canon 346, §1 stating that retired diocesan bishops (c. 402, §1) can be elected by the conference of bishops as members of the synod of bishops. This clarifies the meaning of canon 346, §1.[190]

ARTICLE 3: COADJUTOR AND AUXILIARY BISHOPS [cc. 403–411][191]

Diocesan bishops are entrusted with the pastoral care of a diocese (c. 376). Article 3 treats three categories of bishops who may serve in a diocese with the diocesan bishop and under his leadership: the coadjutor (who has the right of succession to the office of diocesan bishop), the auxiliary with special faculties, and the auxiliary without special faculties. The article contains the norms on their appointment (c. 403) and explains how they take canonical possession of their office (c. 404). The scope of their ministry is identified (c. 405). The diocesan bishop is to appoint them as vicars general or, in the case of the auxiliaries without special faculties, at least as episcopal vicars (c. 406). Under the leadership of the diocesan bishop, these bishops are to collaborate together and consult each other so they work in harmony (c. 407). They should perform pontificals and other episcopal functions when so directed by the diocesan bishop (c. 408). They are obliged to reside in the diocese and are given a month-long vacation (c. 410). The norms on the resignation of a diocesan bishop also apply to coadjutor and auxiliary bishops (c. 411).

When the see is vacant, the coadjutor immediately becomes the diocesan bishop; the auxiliaries retain their current powers and faculties until a [188] Bishop Anthony Pilla reported in a letter to the U.S. bishops, dated May 16, 1997, that the Vatican document "Criteria for Participation at the Special Assembly for America" states specifically "that the election of delegates to any synod is to be conducted by and from the members of the episcopal conference who have active and passive vote according to the statutes in force at the moment." He noted that the NCCB had erred in permitting retired bishops to vote on synod delegates, but that Pope John Paul II had granted a sanation of the votes. The retired delegate elected, Archbishop John Quinn, however, was not qualified to be a synod delegate, so a replacement for him would need to be elected at the bishops' June 19–21, 1997 meeting. Origins 27 (1997) 34.

[189] G. Read, "Norms of Bishops Leaving Office," CLSGBIN 79 (September 1989) 20–22.

[190] AAS 83 (1991) 1093. Some may suggest this interpretation is expansive, since by universal legislation retired bishops are not de iure members of the conference (c. 450, §2) and therefore not eligible for synod membership which is limited to conference members (c. 346, §1). Others, however, will suggest that the interpretation is simply declarative, since no legislation restricts the conference of bishops from electing a retired bishop to synod membership; see Wrenn, 62–63. In any event, the interpretation is helpful, since the October 31, 1988 norms from the Congregation for Bishops do not appear to be legislative in nature. One notes, further, that the interpretation refers only to retired diocesan bishops. See Green, "Deliberative Vote for Retired Bishops," 11–12, n. 23.

[191] For the history of the development of these canons, see Comm 3 (1971) 188; 5 (1973) 223–224; 7 (1975) 161–172; 12 (1980) 309–314; 19 (1987) 117–130, 143–145; 24 (1992) 40–41.

new diocesan bishop takes possession of the see (c. 409).

These canons reflect the teaching of Christus Dominus 25–26 and Ecclesiae sanctae I, 13.

Appointment of Coadjutor/Auxiliary

Canon 403 — §1. When the pastoral needs of a diocese suggest it, one or more auxiliary bishops are to be appointed at the request of the diocesan bishop. An auxiliary bishop does not possess the right of succession.

§2. In more serious circumstances, even of a personal nature, an auxiliary bishop provided with special faculties can be given to a diocesan bishop.

§3. If it appears more opportune to the Holy See, it can appoint ex officio a coadjutor bishop who also has special faculties. A coadjutor bishop possesses the right of succession.

This preliminary canon identifies three kinds of bishops who may serve in a diocese together with the diocesan bishop: the auxiliary bishop, the auxiliary bishop with special faculties, and the coadjutor bishop.[192] All are appointed to service of the diocese, not the person of the diocesan bishop, even though some personal characteristic of the diocesan bishop (e.g., poor health) may occasion the appointment of the latter two types of auxiliaries.[193] All are titular bishops (c. 376); however, the coadjutor holds the title of "Coadjutor Bishop of N." while the auxiliaries hold the title to a titular church.[194]

The auxiliary bishop[195] with or without special faculties does not have the right of succession. One or more are appointed at the request of the diocesan bishop when the pastoral needs of the diocese suggest it. Christus Dominus 25 suggests that an auxiliary may be appointed when the diocesan bishop on his own cannot provide sufficiently well for the good of the faithful of his diocese because of the great size of the diocese, the number of inhabitants, some special pastoral problem, or some other reasons.

The auxiliary bishop with special faculties[196] can be given to a diocesan bishop in more serious [192] CIC 350. The 1917 code had identified a coadjutor given to the person of the bishop with the right of succession; the coadjutor given to the see without the right of succession; and the coadjutor (called the auxiliary) given to the bishop without the right of succession. When the see became vacant, the coadjutor with the right of succession immediately became the ordinary of the diocese if he had taken canonical possession; the coadjutor given to the see continued his office during the vacancy; and the auxiliary lost his office unless the apostolic letters of appointment had provided otherwise (see CIC 355).

See also CCEO 212. The Eastern code identifies two kinds of bishops who serve together with the eparchial bishop: coadjutor bishops who can be appointed ex officio, who have special powers, and who have the right of succession; and auxiliary bishops. No reference is made to auxiliary bishops with special faculties. CCEO 234, however, provides norms for apostolic administrators appointed by the Roman Pontiff for serious and special reasons, whether sede plena or sede vacante. See also Directory 199.

[193] See c. 377, §3 on the procedure for the appointment of a coadjutor bishop, and c. 377, §4 on the procedure for the appointment of an auxiliary.

[194] For more on this issue, see the commentary on c. 376.

[195] See M. Foster, "The Role of Auxiliary Bishops," J 51 (1991) 423–430. Foster concludes his study as follows: "The conciliar principles derived from Christus Dominus, Ecclesiae Sanctae I, and the Directory on the Pastoral Ministry of Bishops influenced the formulation of the canons on auxiliary bishops. These four principles of pastoral need, unity in diocesan governance, episcopal status, and a close working relationship between the diocesan bishop and his auxiliaries are the basic frame of reference within which one can view the role of auxiliary bishops in the life of the local church" (430). See also CLSA Committee for Research and Education on Rights and Pastoral Responsibilities of Bishops, "Report of a CLSA Survey on Auxiliary Bishops," J 53 (1993) 354–361.

[196] The Eastern code does not make provision for this kind of auxiliary bishop; it does, however, identify an apostolic administrator who may, for grave and special reasons, be appointed by the Roman Pontiff even to a see which is not vacant (CCEO 234). A similar figure was found in CIC 312–318, but is not mentioned in the 1983 code though in fact apostolic administrators are still appointed in Latin dioceses. This apostolic administra-circumstances, even of a personal nature. Interestingly, the code does not say this kind of auxiliary is appointed necessarily at the request of the diocesan bishop.

The coadjutor bishop has the right of succession. This means that the diocese does not become vacant when the current diocesan bishop ceases to hold office in one of the ways identified in canon 416, provided that the coadjutor has taken canonical possession of his office; instead, diocesan governance passes immediately to the coadjutor, who then is the new diocesan bishop. If the see is impeded, the coadjutor assumes immediate interim governance of the diocese unless the Holy See determines otherwise (c. 413, §1). He is appointed ex officio by the Holy See (not specifically at the request of the diocesan bishop) when this arrangement seems more opportune, and is endowed with special faculties to be determined in the letter of appointment. It is not envisioned that any diocese have more than one coadjutor bishop.

The law gives special consideration to the coadjutor and the auxiliary with special faculties. They are to aid the diocesan bishop in the entire governance of the diocese and to take his place if he is absent or impeded (c. 405, §2). They are to be appointed vicars general, and the diocesan bishop is to entrust to them before others those things which by law require a special mandate (c. 406, §1). They and the diocesan bishop are to consult one another on matters of major importance (c. 407, §1). Since their special faculties restrict the rights of the diocesan bishop, those faculties must be strictly interpreted (see c. 18).[197]

Other canons specify further the rights and duties of coadjutor and all auxiliary bishops. They have the right and duty to take part in an ecumenical council with a deliberative vote (c. 339, §1). They must be called to particular councils and have the right to a deliberative vote in them (c. 443, §1, 2°). They belong to the conference of bishops by the law itself (c. 450, §1); coadjutor bishops have a deliberative vote in plenary meetings of the conference (c. 454, §1) and auxiliary bishops have a consultative or deliberative vote according to the statutes of the conference (c. 454, §2). They are to be called to and participate in a diocesan synod (c. 463, §1, 1°). They are to serve as vicars general or episcopal vicars, with corresponding rights and duties (cc. 475–481) and, as such, may belong to the episcopal council of the curia where that council exists (c. 473, §4). Auxiliary bishops, however, may not serve as presidents or pro-presidents of the conference of bishops or a gathering of bishops of an ecclesiastical region.[198]

Taking Possession of Office

Canon 404 — §1. A coadjutor bishop takes possession of his office when he, either personally or through a proxy, has shown the apostolic letter of appointment to the diocesan bishop and college of consultors in the presence of the chancellor of the curia, who records the event.

§2. An auxiliary bishop takes possession of his office when he has shown the apostolic letter of appointment to the diocesan bishop in the presence of the chancellor of the curia, who records the event.

tor may function very much like the auxiliary bishop with special faculties in c. 403, §2 of the Latin code; certainly the faculties of an apostolic administrator will need to be clearly delineated since no listing of them is found in the current Latin code. See J. Huels, "The Correction and Punishment of a Diocesan Bishop," J 49 (1989) 529–530.

[197] Huels, 527–528. He adds: "It is possible that the special faculties may be contrary to the general law by limiting the diocesan bishop's authority in certain areas. Even if the apostolic letter of appointment contains provisions against the common law, the letter must be acknowledged as holding precedence, and the diocesan bishop may not act contrary to it" (528). The faculties are examples of delegated power.

[198] This incapacity of the auxiliary bishop is found in a response of the PCILT promulgated March 15, 1989: AAS 81 (1989) 388. See Wrenn, 52–54.

§3. If the diocesan bishop is completely impeded, however, it suffices that both the coadjutor bishop and the auxiliary bishop show the apostolic letter of appointment to the college of consultors in the presence of the chancellor of the curia.

Canon 382, §1 forbids one appointed as diocesan bishop to exercise his office before taking canonical possession of it. In a related fashion, the coadjutor and auxiliary also are expected to take canonical possession of their offices before they begin their pastoral ministry.[199]

The coadjutor takes possession of his office when, personally or through a proxy, he has shown his apostolic letter of appointment to the diocesan bishop (unless he is completely impeded) and the college of consultors; the chancellor is to be present to record the event. This arrangement is quite similar to the manner in which a diocesan bishop takes possession of his diocese: the diocesan bishop presents his apostolic letter to the college of consultors in the presence of the chancellor (c. 382, §3). This reflects the fact that the coadjutor has the right of succession: he will become the diocesan bishop immediately upon the death of the current diocesan bishop, his resignation accepted by the Roman Pontiff, his transfer, or his deprivation of office (see cc. 409, §1; 416).

An auxiliary bishop (even one with special faculties) takes possession of his office when he has shown his apostolic letter of appointment only to the diocesan bishop (not also to the college of consultors); the chancellor is to be present to record the event. The law does not mention the auxiliary doing this through a proxy as it does in the case of a coadjutor bishop.

If the diocesan bishop is completely impeded (see c. 412), the coadjutor and the auxiliary may show the apostolic letter of appointment to the college of consultors, instead of to the diocesan bishop. The chancellor is to be present presumably to record the event, though the code does not specify exactly so in this instance; the chancellor presumably would also record the fact that the diocesan bishop was completely impeded. The code does not mention taking possession of office being done through a proxy.

When the diocesan bishop takes canonical possession of his office, the code strongly recommends that this be done in a liturgical act at the cathedral with clergy and others gathered together (c. 382, §4). The code does not say the same for the coadjutor or auxiliary bishops, though it certainly does not oppose a public liturgical celebration in which canonical possession takes place. The former is envisioned more as a public celebration, and the latter more as a simple administrative act.

Rights and Obligations in General

Canon 405 — §1. A coadjutor bishop and an auxiliary bishop have the obligations and rights which are determined in the prescripts of the following canons and are defined in the letter of their appointment.

§2. A coadjutor bishop and the auxiliary bishop mentioned in can. 403, §2 assist the diocesan bishop in the entire governance of the diocese and take his place if he is absent or impeded.

The first paragraph of this canon says that the rights and obligations of coadjutor bishops and auxiliary bishops (with or without special faculties) are explained both in their letter of appointment and in the following canons.[200]

Paragraph two says that the coadjutor and the auxiliary with special faculties assist the diocesan bishop in the governance of the entire diocese, and they take his place if he is absent or impeded (see c. 413, §1). They are to be appointed vicars general, and the diocesan bishop is to entrust to them before others whatever by law requires a special mandate (c. 406, §1). Further, they are to consult each other on matters of major importance in order to foster the present and future good of the diocese (c. 407, §1).

[199] CIC 353; CCEO 214.

[200] CIC 351, §§1–2; CCEO 213.

Appointment as Vicar General/Episcopal Vicar

Canon 406 — §1. The diocesan bishop is to appoint a coadjutor bishop and the auxiliary bishop mentioned in can. 403, §2 as vicar general. Moreover, the diocesan bishop is to entrust to him before others those things which by law require a special mandate.

§2. Unless the apostolic letter has provided otherwise and without prejudice to the provision of §1, a diocesan bishop is to appoint his auxiliary or auxiliaries as vicars general or at least as episcopal vicars, dependent only on his authority or that of the coadjutor bishop or auxiliary bishop mentioned in can. 403, §2.

Appointment by the Holy See to be a coadjutor or an auxiliary bishop (even though special faculties may be granted in their letter of appointment) does not confer the office of local ordinary in the diocese. Canon 406 expects the diocesan bishop to appoint his coadjutor and auxiliary as local ordinaries of the diocese with him, whether as vicars general or episcopal vicars.[201] Christus Dominus 26, which is reflected in this canon, adds that the coadjutor and auxiliary are dependent on the authority of the diocesan bishop.[202]

Because of the preeminent diocesan status of the coadjutor and the auxiliary with special faculties, they are to be appointed by the diocesan bishop as vicars general (§1). Christus Dominus 27 says that the vicar general holds a preeminent position in the diocesan curia; it also says that episcopal vicars may be appointed to promote the good government of the diocese with the same powers of the vicar general but over a specific part of the diocese, a specific kind of affair (e.g., education, evangelization, liturgy, etc.), or a specific group of the faithful (such as those of a particular rite). The vicar general and episcopal vicar exercise vicariously (not properly, or in their own name) the ordinary power of executive governance as defined by the law; by special mandate, they may be delegated even executive powers otherwise belonging to the diocesan bishop alone (e.g., the power to appoint a parochial administrator).[203] The law asks the diocesan bishop to entrust to the coadjutor and the auxiliary with special faculties before others those things which by law require this special mandate (see c. 134, §3). All this illustrates that they, before others, share with the diocesan bishop in a special way the general pastoral governance of the diocese.

Unless the apostolic letter says otherwise, the diocesan bishop is to appoint his auxiliaries without special faculties as vicars general or episcopal vicars (§2). These auxiliaries are to be dependent solely on the authority of the diocesan bishop, the coadjutor bishop, or the auxiliary bishop with special faculties.

Episcopal Consultation and Collaboration

Canon 407 — §1. In order to foster the present and future good of the diocese as much as possible, a diocesan bishop, a coadjutor, and the auxiliary mentioned in can. 403, §2 are to consult one another on matters of major importance.

§2. In considering cases of major importance, especially of a pastoral character, a diocesan bishop is to wish to consult the auxiliary bishops before others.

§3. Since a coadjutor bishop and an auxiliary bishop are called to share in the solicitude of the diocesan bishop, they are to exercise their duties in such a way that they proceed in harmony with him in effort and intention.

The diocesan bishop, the coadjutor, and the auxiliary with special faculties are to consult each other on matters of major importance in order to foster the present and future good of the diocese (§1).[204] A very close bond of collaboration exists between the diocesan bishop and these others, closer than that existing between the diocesan bishop and an auxiliary bishop without special faculties.

[201] CIC 351, §3; CCEO 215, §§1–2; Directory 199, 201.
[202] See also ES I, 13.

[203] Appendix II of this commentary identifies rights and responsibilities which belong by law to the diocesan bishop; for another local ordinary to perform any of these functions requires that he receive a special mandate from the diocesan bishop. Even a mandate is useless, however, if the action requires episcopal ordination and the local ordinary is a presbyter, not a bishop.

When considering cases of major importance, especially pastoral ones, the diocesan bishop is to consult his auxiliaries before others (§2).[205]

The coadjutor and auxiliaries share in the solicitude of the diocesan bishop; therefore they are to perform their duties in harmony with him in effort and intention (§3).[206] The law places strong emphasis on the importance of diocesan unity; this unity is evident in collaboration and harmony among the bishops serving the diocese.

Assistance Rendered the Diocesan Bishop

Canon 408 — §1. A coadjutor bishop and an auxiliary bishop who are not prevented by a just impediment are obliged to perform pontificals and other functions to which the diocesan bishop is bound whenever the diocesan bishop requires it.

§2. A diocesan bishop is not to entrust habitually to another the episcopal rights and functions which a coadjutor or auxiliary bishop can exercise.

Whenever the diocesan bishop requires it, the coadjutor and the auxiliary bishops are to perform pontificals and other functions to which the diocesan bishop is bound, unless they are prevented by a just impediment (§1).[207] They are not bound to substitute for the diocesan bishop in fulfilling strictly personal responsibilities which he has assumed on his own.

The diocesan bishop is not to entrust habitually to another any of the episcopal rights and roles which a coadjutor or auxiliary can exercise (§2).[208] This reflects the close collaboration which should exist between the diocesan bishop and his coadjutor or auxiliary, and the importance of the episcopal office.

Vacancy of See

Canon 409 — §1. When the episcopal see is vacant, the coadjutor bishop immediately becomes the bishop of the diocese for which he had been appointed provided that he has legitimately taken possession of it.

§2. When the episcopal see is vacant and unless competent authority has established otherwise, an auxiliary bishop preserves all and only those powers and faculties which he possessed as vicar general or episcopal vicar while the see was filled until a new bishop has taken possession of the see. If he has not been designated to the function of diocesan administrator, he is to exercise this same power, conferred by law, under the authority of the diocesan administrator who presides over the governance of the diocese.

The see becomes vacant in one of four ways: death of the diocesan bishop, his resignation accepted by the pope, his transfer, or privation of office made known to him (see c. 416). This canon concerns the destiny of the coadjutor and the auxiliary bishops when the vacancy occurs.[209]

Chistus Dominus 25 determined that the auxiliary bishop is not to lose his powers and faculties when the see becomes vacant, unless competent authority determines otherwise. It also recommended that the auxiliary (or, if there were several, one of them) should be assigned the governance of the diocese during the vacancy. Ecclesiae

[204] Directory 199.

[205] Canon 500, §2 says that the diocesan bishop is to listen also to the presbyteral council in matters of greater importance (in negotiis maioris momenti), above and beyond the specific instances in which he must consult it to act validly.

[206] CCEO 215, §4.

[207] CIC 351, §4; CCEO 215, §3.

[208] CIC 351, §3; CCEO 216.

[209] CIC 355. CIC 355, §2 said that the auxiliary lost his office when the see became vacant, unless his apostolic letter provided otherwise. See also CCEO 224.

sanctae I, 13 reiterated the fact that the auxiliary does not lose his powers as vicar general or episcopal vicar during the vacancy, but acknowledged the fact that the auxiliary might not be elected as diocesan administrator. If he is not elected the diocesan administrator, during the vacancy the auxiliary retains the powers he had as vicar general or episcopal vicar, until the new diocesan bishop takes possession of the see. During the vacancy, the auxiliary is to serve in full accord with the diocesan administrator, who is primarily responsible for diocesan governance. The code commission refused to legislate that an auxiliary must be designated diocesan administrator; this would unnecessarily have restricted the electoral prerogatives of the college of consultors.[210]

When the see becomes vacant, if there is a coadjutor, he immediately becomes the diocesan bishop, provided he has legitimately taken possession of his office in the manner explained in c. 404, §1 (§1).[211]

If there is no coadjutor and therefore the see is truly vacant, the means of providing governance in the diocese is explained in canons 416–430. In such a case, unless competent authority has decided otherwise, an auxiliary (both one with special faculties and one without them) loses his office (c. 481, §1) yet retains all the powers he had as vicar general or episcopal vicar while the see was filled until the new diocesan bishop takes possession of the see.[212] The new diocesan bishop, after he takes canonical possession, needs to reappoint the auxiliaries as his vicars general or episcopal vicars (§2; c. 406).

If the auxiliary is not designated as diocesan administrator, he is to exercise his powers (which he retains during the vacancy) under the authority of the diocesan administrator who governs the diocese until its new bishop takes possession of it.

[210]Comm 14 (1982) 209.

[211]CCEO 222.

[212]This is an example of executive power delegated by the law.

Obligation of Residence

Canon 410 — Like the diocesan bishop, a coadjutor bishop and an auxiliary bishop are obliged to reside in the diocese. Except for a brief time, they are not to be absent from it other than to fulfill some duty outside the diocese or for vacation, which is not to exceed one month.

Like the diocesan bishop (c. 395), the coadjutor and auxiliary bishops have the duty of personal residence in the diocese.[213] Even though they are not heads of the particular church, they may be absent from it only for a brief time to fulfill some duty (e.g., episcopal conference committee work), and may enjoy a vacation not to exceed a month.

Canon 395, which concerns the absence of the diocesan bishop from the diocese for other work and vacation, specifies certain events (the ad limina visits, councils, the synod of bishops, or the episcopal conference) that legitimate such absence; it mentions certain days (Christmas, Holy Week, Easter, Pentecost, Corpus Christi) when the diocesan bishop is not to be absent from the diocese except for an urgent or grave reason. The canon also indicates that the metropolitan is to report an illegitimate absence beyond six months to the Apostolic See. Canon 410 does not contain similar provisions for a coadjutor or auxiliary, but simply says they are not to be outside the diocese except for a brief time for their annual vacation, which is not to exceed a month, or for fulfilling a duty outside the diocese.

Resignation from Office

Canon 411 — The prescripts of cann. 401 and 402, §2 on resignation from office apply to a coadjutor and auxiliary bishop.

The coadjutor and auxiliary bishops, like the diocesan bishop, are asked to submit their resignation at age seventy-five to the Supreme Pontiff who will decide on accepting it after he has examined all the circumstances (see c. 401 §1).[214] They are earnestly asked to resign at an earlier age if they become less able to perform their office due to illness or some other grave cause (see c. 401, §2).[215]

[213]CIC 354; CCEO 217.

The episcopal conference must take care that the retired coadjutor and auxiliary have suitable and decent support, the primary obligation for which binds the diocese which they served before retirement (see c. 402, §2).

This canon does not specify the title of these retired bishops,[216] nor is reference made to the bishops' residence in the diocese; both of these matters are considered in the code's treatment of retired diocesan bishops (c. 402, §1). It is reasonable to presume that appropriate adaptations are to be made in the norms on retired diocesan bishops.

CHAPTER III THE IMPEDED SEE AND THE VACANT SEE [cc. 412–430][217]

These canons make special provisions when the pastoral governance of a diocese is interrupted, either because the diocesan bishop is impeded (cc. 412–415) or because he no longer holds his office as diocesan bishop and the see has become vacant (cc. 416–430).

ARTICLE 1: THE IMPEDED SEE [cc. 412–415]

This article begins with a definition of the code's understanding of the impeded see (c. 412). It then provides norms for the interim governance of the diocese. This is to be exercised either by the coadjutor; or, if there is no coadjutor, by the priest identified on a secret list created by the diocesan bishop and preserved by the chancellor; or, if there is no list, by a priest selected by the college of consultors (c. 413). The rights and obligations of the interim diocesan leader, who has no specific title in the law, are outlined (c. 414). Finally, a canon explains that special provision is to be made by the Holy See if a diocesan bishop is subject to an ecclesiastical penalty which prevents his exercising his governance role (c. 415).[218]

Notion of Impeded See

Canon 412 — An episcopal see is understood to be impeded if by reason of captivity, banishment, exile, or incapacity a diocesan bishop is clearly prevented from fulfilling his pastoral function in the diocese, so that he is not able to communicate with those in his diocese even by letter.

A diocese is considered impeded when its bishop is clearly prevented from performing his pastoral role, such that he cannot communicate with the faithful of the diocese even by letter.[219]

[214] CCEO 218.

[215] CD 21 and ES I, 11 considered only the resignation of diocesan bishops. Canon 411 applies the conciliar doctrine also to the coadjutor and auxiliary. The coadjutor has the right of succession to become diocesan bishop, so the same age limits and other requirements for continued pastoral ministry of a diocesan bishop would logically apply also to him.

[216] CCEO 218 says that the retired coadjutor and auxiliary bishops are given the title emeritus of the office previously held.

[217] For the history of the development of these canons, see Comm 3 (1971) 188; 5 (1973) 233–235; 13 (1981) 140–146; 14 (1982) 220; 24 (1992) 32, 103–108, 130–137, 163–167, 204–205, 227–229. Other commentaries: CLSGBI Com, 234–241; Pamplona ComEng, 320– 328.

[218] CIC 429. The 1917 code devoted only this one canon to the impeded see. The same is true of the Eastern code: CCEO 233.

[219] The code does not speak precisely of an impeded parish, but c. 539 foresees that a parochial administrator (that is, a priest who substitutes for a pastor in accord with c. 540) may be appointed by the diocesan bishop for a number of reasons: (1) captivity, (2) exile, (3) banishment, (4) incapacity, (5) ill health, or (6) some other cause.

This situation can result from the four reasons identified in this canon: (1) captivity, (2) banishment, (3) exile, or (4) personal incapacity. The first three factors are extrinsic to the diocesan bishop, but the last concerns his human capacity itself.

The canon does not indicate who makes the determination that the diocese is, in fact, impeded. Dialogue with the metropolitan (or senior suffragan, if the metropolitan see is impeded) and the papal representative is prudent and appropriate to determine whether the diocese is, in fact, impeded.

If the bishop is able to communicate by letter with the diocese, the see is not considered impeded from a canonical point of view. He is able to govern the diocese, and can delegate others to govern in his absence, perhaps even with special mandates (see c. 134, §3).

The diocese ceases to be impeded when the circumstances creating the impeded situation cease (e.g., when a diocesan bishop is no longer in captivity, banishment, or exile; when he becomes able to communicate with the diocese at least by letter even under these circumstances; when his personal capacity to govern is restored, etc.). If there is doubt, recourse should be made to the Apostolic See which is to have been informed immediately about the impeded see (c. 413, §3).

Determination of Interim Diocesan Leader

Canon 413 — §1. When a see is impeded, the coadjutor bishop, if there is one, has governance of the diocese unless the Holy See has provided otherwise. If there is none or he is impeded, governance passes to an auxiliary bishop, the vicar general, an episcopal vicar, or another priest, following the order of persons established in the list which the diocesan bishop is to draw up as soon as possible after taking possession of the diocese. The list, which must be communicated to the metropolitan, is to be renewed at least every three years and preserved in secret by the chancellor.

§2. If there is no coadjutor bishop or he is impeded and the list mentioned in §1 is not available, it is for the college of consultors to select a priest to govern the diocese.

§3. The one who has assumed the governance of a diocese according to the norm of §§1 or 2 is to advise the Holy See as soon as possible of the impeded see and the function he has assumed.

When the diocese is impeded, the Holy See may make special arrangements for its governance. Otherwise, the governance rests with the coadjutor bishop, if there is one and if he has taken canonical possession of his office. If there is no coadjutor or if he too is impeded,[220] diocesan governance rests with the first available person identified on a list[221] of priests created for this purpose by the diocesan bishop soon after taking [220] Mention must be made of the auxiliary bishop with special faculties (c. 403, §2) who, like a coadjutor bishop, is to assist the diocesan bishop in the entire governance of the diocese and is to take his place when he is absent or impeded (impeditus). Does this not indicate that when the diocese is impeded, if there is no coadjutor, the auxiliary with special faculties is to assume interim governance, and that recourse is to be made to the secret list of priests only if there is also no such auxiliary with special faculties? There is a certain parity between the coadjutor and the auxiliary with special faculties—e.g., cc. 405, §1 and 406, §1.

[221] CIC 429, the single canon treating the impeded see, did not make mention of this secret list composed by the diocesan bishop. It said the vicar general or another cleric assumed governance when the bishop was impeded, and that the bishop could delegate several to succeed each other in office; if these were not available, the cathedral chapter elected a vicar who took on governance with the power of a vicar capitular (diocesan administrator).

CCEO 233, §1 says that when the see is impeded its governance passes to the coadjutor or, if there is no coadjutor, to the protosyncellus (vicar general), syncellus (episcopal vicar), or another suitable priest designated by the eparchial bishop, who at a suitable time can designate several to succeed one another in office. No mention is made of a secret list as in the 1983 code. CCEO 233, §2 says that if no such priest is available, the college of eparchial consultors elects a priest to govern the eparchy.

canonical possession of the diocese and to be renewed (i.e., confirmed or changed) at least every three years. Those listed must be priests. The canon mentions as likely possibilities the auxiliary bishop, vicar general, or episcopal vicar, but these are only possibilities: the diocesan bishop is entirely free to name them or others. A number of priests may be named on this list, which is to be communicated to the metropolitan and preserved in secret by the chancellor of the diocesan bishop. If it concerns the metropolitan see, it would be reasonable for the metropolitan's secret list to be maintained by his chancellor and the senior suffragan bishop, even though the canon does not make this specific provision.[222]

If the diocese is impeded and there is neither a coadjutor nor the list of priests drawn up by the diocesan bishop, the college of consultors (see c. 502)[223] selects a priest to govern the diocese. This priest assumes governance immediately upon his acceptance of the selection made by the college.

The code does not provide any title for the bishop or presbyter who governs the diocese temporarily while it is impeded, whether he is the coadjutor, the priest named on the secret list by the diocesan bishop, or the priest chosen by the college of consultors. He is not properly called the diocesan administrator, since this is a technical term in law for "the one who is to govern the [vacant] diocese temporarily" (see c. 421, §1).

The code requires the person who governs the impeded see temporarily to inform the Holy See as soon as possible both that the see is impeded and that he has assumed its temporary governance. The Holy See may decide to make other determinations after it has been informed of the status of the diocesan bishop.

The function of this interim diocesan leader ceases when the diocese is no longer impeded or when the Holy See makes other provision. Although the law does not specifically mention it, if the interim diocesan leader ceases his function while the see remains impeded (whether by his death, resignation, etc.), another interim diocesan leader must be determined in accord with canon 413, §§1–2, unless the Holy See then makes another provision.

Status of Interim Diocesan Leader

Canon 414 — Whoever has been called according to the norm of can. 413 to exercise the pastoral care of a diocese temporarily and only for the period in which the see is impeded is bound by the obligations and possesses the power in the exercise of the pastoral care of the diocese which a diocesan administrator has by law.

The temporary leader of the impeded see exercises pastoral care for the diocese only while it remains impeded. During this time he is bound by the obligations and possesses the powers given in law to a diocesan administrator, i.e., the priest who temporarily governs a vacant see (c. 421).[224] These obligations and rights are identified especially in canons 427–429.[225] His role ceases when the see is no longer impeded, or when the Apostolic See makes other provision.

[222] Such a presumption is in keeping with the role of the senior suffragan in relation to the metropolitan, identified for example in cc. 395, §4; 415; 421, §2; 425, §3. This is a good example of a lacuna iuris situation (c. 19).

[223] Canon 502, §2 says that when the see is impeded or vacant, the priest member oldest in ordination presides over the college until the one who temporarily replaces the diocesan bishop takes office. Canon 502, §3 says that the conference of bishops can establish that the functions of the college of consultors be entrusted to the cathedral chapter.

[224] Canon 525, 2° specifies that this interim diocesan leader may appoint pastors when the see has been impeded for one year. CCEO 233, §1 says that the priest who governs the impeded eparchy has the powers and rights of a protosyncellus (vicar general).

[225] See the commentary on c. 427, which identifies other rights and obligations of a diocesan administrator listed in the code. The diocesan administrator can perform some acts only with the consent of the college of consultors, and/or only after the see has been vacant for a year.

Penalized Diocesan Bishop

Canon 415 — If an ecclesiastical penalty prevents a diocesan bishop from exercising his function, the metropolitan or, if there is none or it concerns him, the suffragan senior in promotion, is to have recourse immediately to the Holy See so that it will make provision.

If a diocesan bishop is unable to function due to an ecclesiastical penalty, the see is not "impeded" in the senses identified in canon 412. Still, special provision must be made for the governance of the diocese while the penalty remains. In such a situation, the metropolitan is to have immediate recourse to the Holy See so that it will make provision for the pastoral governance of the diocese. If there is no metropolitan, or if it is the metropolitan himself who is bound by the ecclesiastical penalty, the suffragan bishop senior in promotion has the duty to inform the Holy See.[226]

Most penalties bind a guilty party only after they have been imposed; these are called ferendae sententiae penalties (c. 1314). Only the Roman Pontiff is competent to impose penalties on bishops (see c. 1405, §1, 3°). In such an instance, the Holy See would already know if a penalty is being imposed upon a diocesan bishop, and provision would have been made for diocesan governance without the intervention of the metropolitan. It is reasonable to conclude, therefore, that canon 415 concerns penalties which are incurred ipso facto when the delict is committed. These are called latae sententiae penalties (c. 1314), and the involvement of the metropolitan identified in this canon appears to be limited to such instances.[227]

[226] CIC 429, §5. There is no parallel canon in the Eastern code.

[227] Huels, 530–540. Two delicts which only bishops may commit are identified in c. 1382 (consecration of a bishop without a pontifical mandate, which may result in a latae sententiae excommunication reserved to the Apostolic See) and c. 1383 (ordination of a non-subject as a deacon or presbyter without legitimate dimissorial letters, which may result in a prohibition from conferring the order for one year).

When the function of the diocesan bishop is suspended, the power of his vicars general and episcopal vicars is also suspended unless they are bishops, given their close dependence on him for the exercise of their office (c. 481, §2; see also cc. 406, 409).

ARTICLE 2: THE VACANT SEE [cc. 416–430]

This article provides norms for diocesan governance when the see is vacant. It begins with a definition of the code's understanding of the vacant see (c. 416). It explains that the diocesan bishop and his vicars retain their power until they are certain of the vacancy (c. 417), and provides norms to govern the diocese when the diocesan bishop is transferred to another see (c. 418). Special norms apply in an apostolic vicariate or prefecture (c. 420).

As soon as a diocese becomes vacant, its immediate governance devolves either upon the senior auxiliary bishop or, if there is none, upon the college of consultors (c. 419). This interim leader is to inform the Apostolic See of the death of the diocesan bishop (c. 422) and has the powers of a vicar general (c. 426). Thereafter, the college of consultors is to elect a diocesan administrator (c. 421) according to the norms of canons 165–178 (c. 424). Only one diocesan administrator is to be elected, and he cannot be the diocesan finance officer (c. 423). His qualifications are identified (c. 425) as are his obligations and powers (cc. 427, 429). The function of the diocesan administrator ceases when the new diocesan bishop takes possession of the diocese, or by the diocesan administrator's resignation, removal by the Holy See, or death (c. 430).

Nothing is to be modified during the vacancy, and nothing is to be done that is prejudicial to the see (c. 428).

Notion of Vacant See

Canon 416 — An episcopal see is vacant upon the death of a diocesan bishop, resignation accepted by the Roman Pontiff, transfer, or privation made known to the bishop.

A diocese is considered vacant when it no longer has a diocesan bishop.[228] Such a vacancy can result from four causes: (1) the death of the diocesan bishop, (2) the resignation of the diocesan bishop which has been accepted by the Roman Pontiff, (3) the transfer of the diocesan bishop, or (4) the privation of office of the diocesan bishop which has been communicated to him.[229]

If the diocesan bishop wishes to resign, his resignation (by letter, or orally in the presence of two witnesses) must be made to the Roman Pontiff (see c. 189, §1). Canon 189, §3 indicates that a resignation which requires acceptance lacks force if it is not accepted within three months.

If the diocesan bishop is being transferred, his former diocese is considered vacant only from the day he takes canonical possession of the new diocese (c. 418, §1).

If the diocese has a coadjutor bishop who has taken canonical possession of his office (see c. 404, §1), he immediately becomes the diocesan bishop when the current one ceases to hold office (c. 409, §1). The diocese never actually becomes vacant.

[228] A parish is vacant when it no longer has a pastor (c. 539). Such a vacancy can result from: (1) removal or transfer of the pastor by the diocesan bishop done according to the norm of law (cc. 682, §2; 1740–1752); (2) resignation of the pastor accepted by the diocesan bishop; (3) lapse of time if the pastor was appointed for a definite period of time in accord with particular law (c. 522); (4) death of the pastor (c. 538, §1).

[229] CIC 430, §1; CCEO 219. CB contains directives on the occasion of the transferral or resignation of the diocesan bishop (n. 1156) and on the occasion of his death (nn. 1157–1165). It also says that "when the see becomes vacant, the diocesan administrator should ask the clergy and people to offer their prayers that the pastor chosen will be one who can meet the needs of the local Church" (n. 1166).

Validity of Vicars' Acts

Canon 417 — Everything that a vicar general or episcopal vicar does has force until they have received certain notice of the death of the diocesan bishop. Likewise, everything that a diocesan bishop, a vicar general, or an episcopal vicar does has force until they have received certain notice of the above-mentioned pontifical acts.

When the diocesan bishop dies, the acts of his vicar general or episcopal vicar have force until they have certain notice of the death, even though the diocese is actually vacant from the moment of the bishop's death. When the see is vacant for one of the reasons other than death identified in canon 416, the acts of the diocesan bishop, his vicar general, or episcopal vicar have force until they have certain notice that the see has become vacant.[230] The obvious reason for the provisions of this canon is to provide efficacious pastoral care (valid acts of governance) for the faithful of the diocese, and to give a certain legal security to such vicars regarding the exercise of their office.

If the vicar general or episcopal vicar is an auxiliary bishop, however, when the see is vacant, the auxiliary retains the powers he had while the see was filled and until a new diocesan bishop takes possession of the see (c. 409, §2). This provision reflects earlier legal enactments on this point. Christus Dominus 26 stated that the powers and faculties of an auxiliary were not terminated when the diocesan bishop departed from his office.[231] Ecclesiae sanctae I, 13 (3) specified further that, unless other provisions were made by the competent authority in a particular case, an auxiliary retained the powers he had as vicar general or episcopal vicar before the see was vacant; he retained these powers during the vacancy even if he were not appointed the diocesan administrator and until the new diocesan bishop took canonical possession of his office.[232]

[230] CIC 430, §2; CCEO 224.

[231] CD 26 also urged that, unless there existed grave reasons to the contrary, the duty of governing the diocese sede vacante was to be entrusted to the auxiliary bishop or, if there were several, to one of them. This recommendation, however, never became law.

Vacancy Because of Transfer of Diocesan Bishop

Canon 418 — §1. Upon certain notice of transfer, a bishop must claim the diocese to which he has been transferred (ad quam) and take canonical possession of it within two months. On the day that he takes possession of the new diocese, however, the diocese from which he has been transferred (a qua) is vacant.

§2. Upon certain notice of transfer until the canonical possession of the new diocese, a transferred bishop in the diocese from which he has been transferred:

1° obtains the power of a diocesan administrator and is bound by the obligations of the same; all power of the vicar general and episcopal vicar ceases, without prejudice to can. 409, §2;

2° receives the entire remuneration proper to this office.

When a diocesan bishop is transferred to another see, he must take canonical possession of it within two months (§1; see also c. 382, §2). The former diocese is vacant on the day he takes canonical possession of the new one (see c. 191, §1).[233] If the diocese has a coadjutor bishop who has taken possession of his office, he assumes the role of diocesan bishop as soon as the current bishop takes canonical possession of his new diocese (c. 409, §1).

When the diocesan bishop receives certain notice that he is transferred, his present diocese is not technically vacant, but he loses the power of a diocesan bishop.[234] He immediately obtains instead the power of a diocesan administrator, and continues to receive his full remuneration from this diocese (see also c. 191, §2). The obligations and rights of a diocesan administrator are identified in canons 427–429. When he takes canonical possession of the new diocese, his rights and obligations in the former diocese cease (§2).

All the power of the vicars general and episcopal vicars ceases when the diocesan bishop receives certain notice of his transfer to another diocese, without prejudice to the prescript of canon 409, §2, which says that an auxiliary bishop in a vacant see retains the powers he had as vicar general or episcopal vicar until a new diocesan bishop takes canonical possession of the see. If the former vicars general and episcopal vicars are to continue a ministry similar to that which they had been performing as vicars, they will need delegated power to do so (see c. 131, §1).

Interim Government Before Administrator

Canon 419 — When a see is vacant and until the designation of a diocesan administrator, the governance of a diocese devolves upon the auxiliary bishop or, if there are several, upon the one who is senior in promotion. If there is no auxiliary bishop, however, it devolves upon the college of consultors unless the Holy See has provided otherwise. The one who so assumes governance of the diocese is to convoke without delay the college competent to designate a diocesan administrator.

This canon identifies who assumes the interim responsibility of diocesan governance immediately upon the vacancy of the see before the designation of a diocesan administrator.[235] When the dio-

[232] See also ES I, 14, (5), which repeats that an auxiliary bishop who is an episcopal vicar does not lose that power during the vacancy of the diocese.

[233] CIC 430, §3. The 1917 code had given the bishop four months to take possession. Two months are given in CCEO 223.

[234] CIC 194, §2; 430, §3, 1° and 3°.

[235] See CIC 427; 431, §1. The latter had said the governance of the vacant diocese devolved immediately upon the cathedral chapter (college of consultors) unless an apostolic administrator (CIC 312–318) had been appointed or the Holy See made other provisions. See CCEO 221, 2°.

cese becomes vacant but before a diocesan administrator is designated, the auxiliary bishop immediately assumes the interim governance; if there are several auxiliary bishops, the one senior in promotion governs. This norm, new to the 1983 code, further enhances the role of the auxiliary bishop.[236]

If there is no auxiliary bishop, the interim diocesan responsibility immediately devolves upon the college of consultors (see c. 502)[237] as a body, unless the Holy See has made some other provision.[238] The priest oldest in ordination presides over the college of consultors when the see is impeded or vacant, before the one who temporarily replaces the diocesan bishop assumes his office (c. 502, §2).

Whoever assumes interim diocesan governance has the power of a vicar general, not of a diocesan bishop (c. 426; see c. 134, §3). Such an interim leadership figure is to convoke without delay the college competent to designate the diocesan administrator, and is immediately also to inform the Apostolic See of the death of the diocesan bishop (c. 422).

Interim Government in Missions

Canon 420 — When the see is vacant in an apostolic vicariate or prefecture, the governance is assumed by the pro-vicar or pro-prefect, appointed only for this purpose by the vicar or prefect immediately after the vicar or prefect has taken possession of the vicariate or prefecture, unless the Holy See has established otherwise.

When the vacancy occurs in an apostolic vicariate or an apostolic prefecture (whose leader governs vicariously in the name of the Supreme Pontiff, c. 371, §1), the governance is immediately assumed by the pro-vicar or the pro-prefect.[239] This is a priest appointed for this purpose by the apostolic vicar or apostolic prefect immediately upon taking possession of the particular church, unless the Holy See has made some other provision.[240] The vicar or prefect must nominate the pro-vicar or pro-prefect immediately upon taking possession, just as, immediately upon taking possession of a diocese, the diocesan bishop must identify those who would govern the diocese if it becomes impeded (c. 413, §1).

Election of Diocesan Administrator

Canon 421 — §1. The college of consultors must elect a diocesan administrator, namely the one who is to govern the diocese temporarily, within eight days from receiving notice of the vacancy of an episcopal see and without prejudice to the prescript of can. 502, §3.

§2. If a diocesan administrator has not been elected legitimately within the prescribed time for whatever cause, his designation devolves upon the metropolitan, and if the metropolitan church itself is vacant or both the metropolitan and the suffragan churches are vacant, it devolves upon the suffragan bishop senior in promotion.

[236] Again, if the diocese has a coadjutor bishop, it never becomes vacant with the departure of the diocesan bishop; pastoral governance passes to the coadjutor who immediately becomes the new diocesan bishop provided he has taken canonical possession of his office.

[237] Canon 502, §3 says that the conference of bishops can determine that the functions of the college of consultors are to be entrusted to the cathedral chapter.

[238] The Holy See may, for example, appoint an apostolic administrator to govern the diocese until a new diocesan bishop takes his canonical possession of it.

[239] CIC 309, §§1–2. There is no parallel canon in the Eastern code.

[240] There is no presbyteral council (and consequently no college of consultors, c. 502) in the apostolic vicariate or apostolic prefecture. Instead, the vicar or prefect establishes a council of at least three missionary presbyters whose opinion, even by letter, he is to hear in more serious matters (c. 495, §2). These particular churches are not yet dioceses, and their leader governs in the name of the Supreme Pontiff with vicarious (not proper) power. Special provisions apply, among which is the determination of the person to govern during vacancy.

When the see is vacant, a diocesan administrator must be constituted.[241] The college of consultors must elect a diocesan administrator within eight days of receiving notice of the vacancy of the diocese (§1). The episcopal conference can determine that the functions of the college of consultors be entrusted to the cathedral chapter (c. 502, §3; see cc. 503–510).

The diocesan administrator is the priest who governs the diocese during its vacancy. In the 1917 code he was called the vicar capitular (CIC 432–444).

If the administrator has not been legitimately elected within the first eight days of the vacancy of the diocese, the metropolitan is to designate the diocesan administrator (§2). The college of consultors loses its right of election, and the metropolitan has no legal responsibility to consult the college when he designates the diocesan administrator.

The diocesan administrator may not be legitimately elected for a number of reasons: (1) because the eight available days have passed without the college of consultors taking any action (c. 421, §1); (2) because more than one diocesan administrator was elected (c. 423, §1); (3) because the election was invalid inasmuch as it was not conducted according to the norms of canons 165–178, which are required for validity (c. 424); or (4) because the one elected lacks the necessary qualifications for office (c. 425, §1).

If the metropolitan see is vacant, or if both the metropolitan see and the suffragan see are vacant, and the diocesan administrator has not been elected, the suffragan bishop senior in promotion is to designate the diocesan administrator (see also c. 425, §3).

Notification of Holy See

Canon 422 — An auxiliary bishop or, if there is none, the college of consultors is to inform the Apostolic See of the death of a bishop as soon as possible. The one elected as diocesan administrator is to do the same concerning his own election.

The one who assumes diocesan governance immediately upon the death of the diocesan bishop (i.e., the auxiliary bishop or the college of consultors, c. 419) is to inform the Apostolic See as soon as possible (quantocius) about the bishop's death. This notification, commonly done through the papal representative, is to take place before the election of the diocesan administrator.[242]

Once he has been elected, the diocesan administrator is to inform the Apostolic See about his own election. This is similar to the obligation of the one who governs the impeded see (c. 413, §3).

Only One Administrator/ Distinct from Finance Officer

Canon 423 — §1. One diocesan administrator is to be designated; any contrary custom is reprobated. Otherwise, the election is invalid.

§2. A diocesan administrator is not to be the finance officer at the same time. Therefore, if the finance officer of the diocese has been elected as administrator, the finance council is to elect a temporary finance officer.

A vacant see can have only one diocesan administrator; this assures unified diocesan governance. Otherwise, the election is invalid.[243] Any contrary custom is expressly reprobated by the law and, therefore, is unreasonable and cannot obtain the force of law (c. 24, §2).

One person cannot be diocesan administrator and finance officer at the same time. If the finance officer is elected diocesan administrator, the finance council is to elect a temporary finance officer who performs the tasks of the finance officer while he serves as diocesan administrator.[244]

[241] CIC 427; 432 §§1–2; CCEO 221.

[242] CIC 432, §4; CCEO 221.

[243] CIC 433, §1; CCEO 225, §1.

[244] Here is a rare instance of appointment to a diocesan office by a corporate body; the only other example of such an appointment is the "pastor consultors" chosen by the presbyteral council from a list presented to it by the diocesan bishop (c. 1742, §1). By contrast, the 1917 code had envisioned the election of both a vicar capitular (diocesan administrator) and an oeconomus by the

The separation of the roles of diocesan administrator and finance officer limits even the perception of any financial misconduct during the vacancy. When the vacancy ends, the original finance officer resumes his role, and the function of the temporary finance officer ceases.

Election of Diocesan Administrator

Canon 424 — A diocesan administrator is to be elected according to the norm of cann. 165–178.

The diocesan administrator, whether chosen by the college of consultors or by the cathedral chapter, is to be elected according to the norms of canons 165–178 on elections.[245] The particular statutes of the college of consultors may specify some of the options mentioned in those canons.[246] The one who assumes diocesan governance immediately upon the vacancy (c. 419) is competent to convoke the college of consultors.

Qualifications of Diocesan Administrator

Canon 425 — §1. Only a priest who has completed thirty-five years of age and has not already been elected, appointed, or presented for the same vacant see can be designated validly to the function of diocesan administrator.

§2. A priest who is outstanding in doctrine and prudence is to be elected as diocesan administrator.

§3. If the conditions previously mentioned in §1 have been neglected, the metropolitan or, if the metropolitan church itself is vacant, the suffragan bishop senior in promotion, after he has ascertained the truth of the matter, is to designate an administrator in his place. The acts of the one who was elected contrary to the prescripts of §1, however, are null by the law itself.

This canon considers the qualifications to be found in the priest elected as diocesan administrator.[247] Paragraph one legislates that, for the validity of his appointment, the diocesan administrator must be a priest (sacerdos: i.e., a bishop or a presbyter) who has completed thirty-five years of age. He cannot have been already elected, appointed, or presented for the same vacant see.[248]

The second paragraph says that, for liceity, the one elected must be outstanding in doctrine and prudence.

The third paragraph provides for the case in which no diocesan administrator has been validly elected. If the conditions of the first paragraph have been neglected, the metropolitan is to ascertain the truth of the matter and then to designate a diocesan administrator in virtue of his pastoral oversight role in the province. The college of consultors is no longer competent to elect him; it has lost that right. If the metropolitan see is vacant, this task is performed by the suffragan bishop senior in appointment.

Since there is no valid designation of a diocesan administrator, all acts performed by the one invalidly elected are invalid.[249] Likewise, the acts cathedral chapter; these two roles could be fulfilled by the same person (CIC 433, §3). The oeconomus (or several of them) was to be a trustworthy and competent person appointed if the chapter had the function of collecting revenues (CIC 432–433). In the United States the diocesan consultors did not have the responsibility of collecting revenues or maintaining the mensa episcopalis, so the appointment of an oeconomus would have been superfluous. See CCEO 225, §2.

[245] CIC 432, §2; 433, §2; CCEO 221.

[246] See cc. 167, §1 (permitting votes by letter or proxy); 174, §1 (forbidding an election by compromise); and 176 (identifying the majority of votes necessary to be elected as different from the norm of c. 119, 1°).

[247] CIC 434. CIC 434, §1 had said that the vicar capitular could be thirty years old. The higher age here parallels a similar provision for bishops in c. 378, §1, 3°. (Note the other parallels in qualifications for a candidate for episcopacy—e.g., c. 378, §1, 3° and 5°.) See CCEO 227.

[248] These specific issues pertain only in places where the cathedral chapter elects the bishop or where civil authorities propose a candidate for the episcopacy (see c. 377, §§1, 5).

[249] Canon 421, §2 requires the intervention of the metropolitan (or, for the metropolitan see, the suffragan of those appointed to office by him or delegated by him are also invalid, since he has no power to appoint or delegate.

Status of One Governing a Diocese Before Administrator

Canon 426 — When a see is vacant, the person who is to govern the diocese before the designation of a diocesan administrator possesses the power which the law grants to a vicar general.

In the very brief period when the see is vacant and before the diocesan administrator is elected, the one who assumes the immediate governance of the diocese (i.e., the auxiliary bishop or the college of consultors, c. 419) has the power given by law to a vicar general.[250]

Canon 479, §1 says that by office the vicar general has the executive power over the entire diocese which the law gives to the diocesan bishop —that is, the power to place all administrative acts except those which the bishop has reserved to himself or which the law says require a special mandate from the bishop (c. 134, §3).[251] He is a local ordinary (c. 134, §2).

Obligations and Powers of Diocesan Administrator

Canon 427 — §1. A diocesan administrator is bound by the obligations and possesses the power of a diocesan bishop, excluding those matters which are excepted by their nature or by the law itself.

§2. When he has accepted election, the diocesan administrator obtains power and no other confirmation is required, without prejudice to the obligation mentioned in can. 833, n. 4.

The first paragraph of this canon says that the diocesan administrator has the obligations and powers of a diocesan bishop—except for those which are excluded (1) by the nature of the matter or (2) by the law itself.[252]

Several acts are excluded from the powers of a diocesan administrator by the law itself: A diocesan administrator can never perform the following acts:

– to approve diocesan associations of the faithful (c. 312, §1, 3°)
– to confer a canonry in places where canons exist in cathedral or collegial churches (c. 509, §1)[253]
– to entrust a parish to a clerical religious institute or clerical society of apostolic life (c. 520, §1)
– to remove the judicial vicar and adjutant judicial vicars (c. 1420, §5).

A diocesan administrator can perform the following acts only with the consent of the college of consultors:

– to remove the chancellor and other notaries (c. 485)
– to issue dimissorial letters for ordination, but never to those who have been denied orders by the diocesan bishop (c. 1018).

A diocesan administrator can grant excardination, incardination, or even permission to move to another particular church, only after the see is vacant for one year and with the consent of the college of consultors (c. 272). Finally, a diocesan administrator can name pastors only after the see has been vacant for one year (c. 525, 2°).

senior by appointment) when the college of consultors has failed to elect a diocesan administrator within eight days of being notified of the vacancy of the episcopal see.

[250] CIC 435. Actually, no vicar general exists in a vacant diocese (see cc. 417; 481, §1). See CCEO 221, 2°. Some may suggest that this canon would be placed more appropriately after canon 419, which also governs the situation before the designation of the administrator.

[251] See also cc. 475–481.

[252] CIC 435, §§1–2; CCEO 229.

[253] Canons do not exist in the United States.

The second paragraph says that when the diocesan administrator has been elected, he assumes the power of his office and he needs no other confirmation (see c. 178). Nonetheless, he must make the profession of faith in the presence of the college of consultors according to the formula approved by the Apostolic See (c. 833, 4°).[254]

No Innovations During Vacancy

Canon 428 — §1. When a see is vacant, nothing is to be altered.

§2. Those who temporarily care for the governance of the diocese are forbidden to do anything which can be prejudicial in some way to the diocese or episcopal rights. They, and consequently all others, are specifically prohibited, whether personally or through another, from removing or destroying any documents of the diocesan curia or from changing anything in them.

The first paragraph expresses succinctly the general norm that when the diocese is vacant, nothing is to be innovated.[255] The provisional nature of the diocesan administrator's function is eminently clear here. Care must be taken to maintain the status quo of the diocese until the new diocesan bishop takes canonical possession of it. Nonetheless, the life of the particular church continues and certain determinations must be made. The commentary on canon 427 above identifies certain actions which the diocesan administrator may never take, may take only with the consent of the college of consultors, or may take after the see has been vacant for a full year (perhaps with the consent of the consultors). Nonetheless, the general principle enunciated in paragraph one of canon 428 maintains its significance.

The second paragraph highlights certain actions always forbidden during the vacancy, and thereby further specifies the more general norm of the first paragraph.[256] All who govern the diocese temporarily (this includes the one who assumes diocesan governance immediately upon the vacancy [c. 419] and the diocesan administrator [c. 421, §1]) are specifically forbidden to do anything which could be prejudicial to the diocese or episcopal rights. These diocesan leaders, and all other persons as well, are forbidden to remove, destroy, or modify any documents of the diocesan curia, whether personally or through another. Access to the secret archive or safe of the diocese is forbidden except in case of true necessity, in which case only the diocesan administrator personally is permitted to open it (c. 490, §2). Those who violate this canon may be punished with a just penalty, according to the gravity of the delict (see c. 1391, 1°).

Residence/Mass for the People

Canon 429 — A diocesan administrator is obliged to reside in the diocese and to apply Mass for the people according to the norm of can. 388.

Canon 427, §1 says the diocesan administrator has the obligations of a diocesan bishop unless such are excepted by their nature or by the law. This canon specifies two certain obligations of the diocesan administrator: he is to reside in the diocese and to apply the Missa pro populo. These are obligations of a diocesan bishop identified in cc. 395, §1 and 388, respectively.[257]

Cessation of Ministry of Diocesan Administrator

Canon 430 — §1. The function of a diocesan administrator ceases when the new bishop has taken possession of the diocese.

§2. The removal of a diocesan administrator is reserved to the Holy See. If an administrator resigns, the resignation must be presented in au-

[254] CIC 438.

[255] CIC 436; CCEO 228, §1. Similar norms proscribe innovations during the vacancy of the Roman See (c. 335) and of a parish (c. 540, §2).

[256] CIC 435, §3; CCEO 228, §2.

[257] CIC 440. There is no parallel canon in the Eastern code.

thentic form to the college competent to elect, but it does not need acceptance. If a diocesan administrator has been removed, resigns, or dies, another diocesan administrator is to be elected according to the norm of can. 421.

The function of the diocesan administrator ceases in the four ways identified in this canon: (1) the new diocesan bishop's taking canonical possession of the diocese, (2) the diocesan administrator's removal by the Holy See, (3) his resignation, or (4) his death.[258]

The function of the diocesan administrator ceases when the new bishop takes possession of the diocese in accord with the prescript of c. 382, §3. The administrator retains his power as administrator after the new diocesan bishop has been identified and until the latter takes canonical possession of the diocese, since the new bishop is not permitted to exercise governance in the diocese before he has taken canonical possession of it (c. 382, §1). Even if the diocesan administrator is appointed the diocesan bishop, he retains only the powers of a diocesan administrator until he takes canonical possession of the diocese (c. 382).[259]

The function of the diocesan administrator may also cease before the new diocesan bishop takes canonical possession of the diocese for two reasons other than the administrator's own death: his removal by the Holy See, or his resignation. Only the Holy See is competent to remove a validly elected diocesan administrator (see c. 192); the college of consultors that elected him cannot remove him.[260]

If the diocesan administrator wishes to resign, he must present his resignation in authentic form to the college of consultors. The resignation is valid even without acceptance by the group competent to elect (see c. 189, §3) but must be communicated according to the proper legal form (that is, either in writing, or orally in the presence of two witnesses, c. 189, §1).

If the diocesan administrator is removed, resigns, or dies, a new diocesan administrator is to be elected in the usual way by the college of consultors (§2; c. 421).

[258] CIC 443; CCEO 231.

[259] CIC 444 had required the new bishop to seek a report on their offices, jurisdiction, and administration during the vacancy from the cathedral chapter, vicar capitular, oeconomus, and other officials. This requirement is omitted from the revised code, though some may still wisely do what CIC 444 had required. Canon 540, §3, however, expects the parochial administrator to render an account to the pastor after the administrator has completed his function.

CCEO 232 says that when the eparchial see is vacant the eparchial finance officer administers ecclesiastical goods under the authority of the eparchial administrator; the eparchial finance officer must give an account of his administration to the new eparchial bishop and, thereafter, ceases to hold office unless confirmed in it by the new bishop.

[260] Of course, the norm of c. 194 on the removal from an ecclesiastical office by the law itself also pertains to the diocesan administrator.

APPENDIX I – REVISION OF THE 1917 CODE

Dates of Meetings	Comm	Pages
December 4–7, 1967	18 (1986)	54–74; 94–97; 99–102
March 4–7, 1968	18 (1986)	111–170
December 16–21, 1968	19 (1987)	106–123, 131–145
April 14–19, 1969	24 (1992)	32–41
February 2–9, 1970	24 (1992)	56–57
October 5–10, 1970	24 (1992)	103–115
February 15–20, 1971	24 (1992)	103–137; 163–167
December 13–18, 1971	24 (1992)	204–205; 227–228
May 15–20, 1971	3 (1971)	186–189
	4 (1972)	39–43
November 20–23, 1972	5 (1973)	216–224; 233–235
April 9–14, 1973	24 (1992)	309–310; 315–320; 340–350
February 18–22, 1974	7 (1975)	161–163
December 2–6, 1974	7 (1975)	163–172
March 10–15, 1980	12 (1980)	275–314
April 18, 1980	13 (1981)	140–146
May 13, 1980	13 (1981)	298–302
July 16, 1981 – Relatio	14 (1982)	201–220

The code identifies the diocesan bishop as the agent responsible in the following matters; other local ordinaries cannot perform these actions or exercise these powers without a special mandate and perhaps not even then if the episcopacy is required. Some are rights, others are obligations.[261]

- to extend an expired rescript granted by the Apostolic See once, but not beyond three months (c. 72)
- to dispense from certain disciplinary laws (c. 87, §1)[262]
- to designate a guardian for a minor (c. 98, §2)
- to confer ecclesiastical offices in the particular church entrusted to them (c. 157)
  - curial officials (c. 470)
  - moderator of the curia (c. 473, §§2–3)
  - vicar general (c. 475)
  - episcopal vicars (c. 476)
  - chancellor, vice-chancellors, and notaries (cc. 482–483 – implicit)
  - diocesan finance officer (c. 494, §1)
  - priest with faculties equivalent to a canon penitentiary (c. 508, §2)
  - canons (c. 509)
  - priest members of a "team ministry" and their moderator (cc. 517, §1 – implicit; 544)
  - deacons, lay persons, and communities of persons who are not priests, to whom is entrusted a participation in the exercise of pastoral care of a parish (c. 517, §2)
  - pastor (cc. 523–524)
  - parochial administrator (c. 539)
  - parochial vicars (c. 547)
  - vicars forane (c. 553, §2)
  - rectors of churches (c. 557)
  - judicial vicar (c. 1420, §1)
  - adjutant judicial vicars (c. 1420, §3 – implicit)
  - diocesan judges (c. 1421, §1)
  - tribunal auditors (c. 1428)
  - promoter of justice (c. 1435)
  - defender of the bond (c. 1435)
- to determine whether seminarians are to be formed outside a seminary, and to entrust them to a devout and suitable priest (c. 235, §2)
- to admit candidates to the major seminary (c. 241, §1)
- to make decisions about seminary governance and administration (c. 259, §1)
- to visit the seminary and oversee formation (c. 259, §2)
- to impose a seminary tax (c. 264, §1)
- to issue letters of incardination and excardination (c. 267, §1)
- to oppose in writing ipso iure incardination/excardination (c. 268, §1)
- to decide about incardination (c. 269)
- to grant clerics permission to move to another particular church, and to recall them (c. 271)
- to establish diocesan public associations (c. 312, §1, 3°)
- to convoke, preside over, choose members of (when the law makes no specific determinations), suspend, and dissolve the diocesan synod (cc. 462–463; 468, §1)
- to determine promises of faithful discharge of office to be made by curial officials, and to define terms of their secrecy (c. 471)
- to establish an episcopal council (c. 473, §4)
- to remove from ecclesiastical offices
  - vicars general and episcopal vicars (c. 477, §1)
  - chancellors (vice-chancellors), and notaries (c. 485)
  - diocesan finance officer (c. 494, §2 – implicit)
  - pastors (c. 538, §1; 1740–1747)

(continued)

[261] This list identifies some of the principal matters for which the diocesan bishop is the responsible agent. See also NCCB, A Manual for Bishops: Rights and Responsibilities of Diocesan Bishops in the Revised Code of Canon Law, rev. ed. (Washington, D.C.: NCCB, 1992).

[262] A response from the PCILT promulgated August 1, 1985 decreed that the diocesan bishop may not dispense from canonical form for the marriage of two Catholics: AAS 77 (1985) 771. Wrenn, 21–22. A response from the same council promulgated September 3, 1987 also explains that the diocesan bishop cannot dispense from the prescription of c. 767, §1 by which a homily is reserved to priests and deacons: AAS 79 (1987) 1249. Wrenn, 41–43.

  - parochial vicar (c. 552)
  - vicar forane (c. 554, §3)
  - judges (c. 1422 – implicit)
  - promoter of justice (c. 1436, §2)
  - defender of the bond (c. 1436, §2)
- to preside over the diocesan finance council (c. 492, §1)
- to establish a diocesan budget and oversee diocesan expenditures (c. 494, §3)
- to approve presbyteral council statutes (c. 496)
- to name freely some presbyteral council members (c. 497, 3°)
- to convoke, preside over, set the agenda for, and dissolve the presbyteral council (cc. 500–501)
- to choose members of and preside over the college of consultors (c. 502, §§1–2)
- to approve cathedral/collegial chapter statutes (c. 505)
- to separate parishes from chapters of canons (c. 510, §1)
- to establish norms for a pastor and a chapter of the same church (c. 510, §3)
- to establish, convoke, preside over, choose members of, and make public the work of the diocesan pastoral council (cc. 511–514)
- to erect, suppress, or alter parishes (c. 515, §2) or quasi-parishes (c. 516 §1 – implicit)
- to provide pastoral care where a (quasi-)parish cannot be erected (c. 516, §2)
- to determine conditions for entrusting a participation in the exercise of pastoral care in a parish to a deacon, to a lay person, or to a community of persons who are not priests (c. 517, §2)
- to entrust a parish to a clerical religious institute or society of apostolic life (c. 520, §1)
- to require establishment of parish pastoral councils (c. 536, §1)
- to accept the resignation of a pastor, and to provide for his retirement (c. 538, §3)
- to determine rights and duties of parochial vicars (c. 548, §1)
- to erect diocesan institutes of consecrated life (c. 579) which remain under his special care (c. 594)
- to approve and modify constitutions of diocesan institutes of consecrated life, to grant dispensations from the constitutions, and to oversee the more significant business matters of these institutes (c. 595)
- to receive the vows or bonds of hermits, and to guide their lives (c. 603, §2)
- to consecrate virgins (c. 604, §1)
- to discern new gifts of consecrated life in the Church and to aid their promoters (c. 605)
- to give written consent to erect houses of religious institutes (c. 609, §1)
- to consent for a religious house to perform apostolic works different from those for which it was founded (c. 612)
- to give special vigilance to an autonomous monastery (c. 615); to preside at elections of its superiors (c. 625, §2); to visit it even with respect to religious discipline (c. 628, §2, 1°); to grant dismissal of members (c. 699, §2)
- to visit even with respect to internal discipline individual houses of diocesan religious institutes (c. 628, §2, 2°)
- to enter cloisters of monasteries of nuns, to allow others to enter, and to permit the nuns to leave if truly necessary (c. 667, §4)
- to consult mutually with religious superiors in organizing apostolic works (c. 678, §3)
- to prohibit a religious from living in his diocese (c. 679)
- to entrust works to religious, to direct them, and to enter into written agreements about them (c. 681)
- to confer ecclesiastical offices on religious, and remove them (c. 682)
- to visit the churches, oratories, schools, and works of religious, and to address any abuses discovered (c. 683)
- to extend an indult of exclaustration beyond three years for religious of diocesan institutes, or to impose exclaustration upon the same (c. 686, §§1, 3)
- to confirm an indult of departure of temporarily professed religious belonging to diocesan institutes and autonomous monasteries (c. 688, §2)

- to grant an indult of departure of perpetually professed religious belonging to diocesan institutes (c. 691, §2) and of perpetually incorporated members of diocesan secular institutes (c. 727, §1)
- to receive a religious cleric for incardination, at least experimentally, and to refuse incardination of the same (c. 693)
- to confirm the decree of dismissal of religious of institutes of diocesan right (c. 700)
- to give prior written permission to erect a house and to establish a local community of a society of apostolic life, and to be consulted for its suppression (c. 733, §1)
- to call members of institutes of consecrated life to assist in proclaiming the gospel (c. 758)
- to prohibit a bishop from preaching in the diocese (c. 763)
- to issue norms on preaching (c. 772, §1)
- to issue norms on catechesis, to make catechetical instruments available, and to coordinate catechetical endeavors (c. 775, §1; see c. 777)
- to oversee missionary activity in missionary dioceses, and to enter into contracts with missionary institutes (c. 790, §1)
- to consent to religious establishing schools (c. 801)
- to regulate and oversee Catholic religious education in schools and the media (c. 804, §1)
- to exercise vigilance over and to visit Catholic schools (c. 806, §1)
- to exercise vigilance over Catholic universities (c. 810, §2)
- to provide pastoral care for students at Catholic universities, other institutes of higher education, and ecclesiastical universities and faculties by erecting a parish or providing priests, and to provide Catholic centers at universities, even non-Catholic ones (cc. 813, 818)
- to send outstanding young people and clerics to ecclesiastical universities and faculties (c. 819)
- to establish higher institutes of religious sciences, whenever possible (c. 821)
- to guard against harmful publications/media, to require writings on faith and morals be submitted to his judgment, and to repudiate works contrary to faith and morals (c. 823)
- to determine when "in grave necessity" the sacraments of penance, Eucharist, and anointing may be administered to non-Catholic Christians (c. 844, §4), after appropriate consultation with the competent non-Catholic authority (c. 844, §5)
- to permit baptism in hospitals, outside cases of necessity (c. 860, §2)
- to baptize persons fourteen years of age and older (c. 863)
- to delegate the faculty to confirm to one or more specific presbyters (c. 884, §1)
- to associate priests with him in confirming on an ad hoc basis (c. 884, §2)
- to make a judgment about eucharistic processions through public streets, and to issue norms about them (c. 944)
- to determine whether the conditions for general absolution exist (c. 961, §2)
- to forbid a bishop to hear confessions (c. 967, §1)
- to issue norms on the communal anointing of the sick (c. 1002)
- to ordain his own subjects, or to grant dimissorials to another bishop (cc. 1015, §1; 1018, §1, 1°; 1020–1021)
- to give permission in his diocese for a bishop to confer orders (c. 1017)
- to place restrictions in dimissorial letters, or to revoke them (c. 1023)
- to judge the suitability and usefulness of candidates for orders (cc. 1025, §§1–2; 1029; 1052, §1)
- to see that candidates are instructed about the order to be received (c. 1028)
- to forbid, for a canonical reason, the advance of a transitional deacon to the presbyterate (c. 1030)
- to determine the length of the pastoral internship of a transitional deacon (c. 1032, §2)
- to admit one to candidacy for orders (c. 1034, §1)

(continued)

- to receive signed hand-written declarations of freedom and intention from candidates for diaconate and presbyterate (c. 1036)
- to determine if a serious cause prevents a transitional deacon, refusing advance to presbyterate, from exercising the diaconate (c. 1038)
- to make certain candidates have made the preordination retreat of at least five days (c. 1039)
- to issue an authentic certificate of ordination (c. 1053, §2)
- to delegate qualified lay persons to assist at marriages after favorable vote of the conference of bishops and approval of the Holy See (c. 1112, §1)
- to issue norms on the marriage register (c. 1121, §1)
- to grant radical sanations of individual marriages unless an impediment of divine or natural law has ceased or dispensation is reserved to the Apostolic See (c. 1165, §2)
- to dedicate a sacred place, and to commission another bishop or presbyter to do so (c. 1206)
- to bless churches, or to delegate another priest to do so (c. 1207)
- to give written consent to erect a church, even for religious (c. 1215)
- to relegate a church to profane but not sordid use (c. 1222)
- to determine special feast and penitential days (c. 1244, §2)
- to issue prescriptions on pastors' dispensing or commuting days of obligation or penance (c. 1245)
- to impose taxes in accord with the norm of law (c. 1263)[263]
- to involve the diocesan finance council in significant economic activity, and even to obtain their consent for acts of "extraordinary administration" (c. 1277)
- to assign special functions to the diocesan finance officer (c. 1278)
- to determine acts exceeding ordinary administration (c. 1281, §2)
- to alienate ecclesiastical goods of the diocese according to the norms of law, which often requires the consent of the finance council, the college of consultors, and the concerned parties (c. 1292, §1)
- to reduce Mass obligations in cases defined by law (c. 1308, §§3–4)
- to transfer Mass obligations (c. 1309)
- to see that penal laws are uniform in the same city or region (c. 1316)
- to remit a non-declared latae sententiae penalty in confession (c. 1355, §2)
- to make determinations in certain procedural matters
  - to entrust more difficult or more significant cases to three or five judges (c. 1425, §2)
  - to involve the promoter of justice in contentious cases (c. 1431, §1)
  - to permit extern judges to acquire judicial proofs (c. 1469, §2)
  - to execute sentences issued in first instance in the diocese (c. 1653, §1)
  - to decree separation of spouses or to permit them to approach civil court (c. 1692, §§1–2)
  - to receive a petition for dissolution of a non-consummated marriage (c. 1699, §1), to permit either party to have a legal expert (c. 1701, §2), to prepare his own opinion (c. 1704, §1), to send the acts to the Apostolic See (c. 1705, §1), and to receive the rescript of dispensation from the Apostolic See (c. 1706)
  - to make a declaration of presumed death (c. 1707)
  - to establish an office or council of mediation (c. 1733, §2)

[263] The PCILT issued a decree promulgated August 10, 1989 indicating that the diocesan bishop cannot tax the external schools of religious institutes of pontifical right: AAS 81 (1989) 991. Wrenn, 57–58.

Primary Sources

Bishops' Committee on the Permanent Diaconate. Foundations for the Renewal of the Diaconate. Washington, D.C.: NCCB/USCC, 1993.

CDF. "Instruction on the Ecclesial Vocation of the Theologian." Origins 20 (July 5, 1990) 117, 119–126.

CDWDS. Caeremoniale Episcoporum, September 14, 1984. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1984. ICEL translation: Ceremonial of Bishops. Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1989.

CFB. Directory for the Ad Limina Visit. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1988.

———. Form for the Quinquennial Report. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1997.

———. "Normae de episcopis ab officio cessante," October 31, 1988. Comm 20 (1988) 167–168. Unofficial translation CLSG-BIN 79 (September 1989) 17–19.

CFC. Directory for the Life and Ministry of Priests, January 31, 1994. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1994.

John Paul II. Apconst Pastor bonus, June 28, 1988. AAS 80 (1988) 841–924, 1867. Unofficial translation: Code of Canon Law, Annotated, ed. E. Caparros, et al. Montreal: Wilson and Lafleur, 1993. Pp. 1167–1279 (alternating).

———. Apexhort Pastores dabo vobis, March 25, 1992. Origins 21 (April 16, 1992) 717, 719–759.

———. Apconst Spirituali militum curae, April 21, 1986. AAS 78 (1986) 481–486. Unofficial translation: TPS 31 (1986) 284–288.

NCCB. "Doctrinal Responsibilities: Approaches to Promoting Cooperation and Resolving Misunderstandings between Bishops and Theologians." Origins 19 (June 29, 1989) 97, 99–110.

———. A Manual for Bishops: Rights and Responsibilities of Diocesan Bishops in the Revised Code of Canon Law. Rev. ed. Washington, D.C.: NCCB, 1992.

———. Permanent Deacons. 3rd ed. Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1995.

———. The Teaching Ministry of the Diocesan Bishop: A Pastoral Reflection. Washington, D.C.: NCCB, 1992.

PCPCU. Directory for the Application of Principles and Norms on Ecumenism, March 25, 1993. Origins 23 (July 29, 1993) 129, 131–160.

Secretariat of State. "Regolamento Generale della Curia Romana," February 4, 1992. AAS 84 (1992) 201–267.

Secondary Sources

Austin, R. "The Particular Church and the Universal Church in the 1983 Code of Canon Law." Stud Can 22 (1988) 339–357.

BCL. Ceremonial of Bishops: A Reader. Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1994.

Beal, J. "The Apostolic Visitation of a Diocese: A Canonico-Historical Investigation." J 49 (1989) 347–398.

Caparros, E., M. Theriault, and J. Thorn, eds. Code of Canon Law Annotated. Montreal: Wilson and LeFleur, 1993.

Cappellini, E. "La tutela dei diritti delle communità territoriali: diocesi e parrocchia." ME 113 (1988) 85–104.

Cárcel Ortí, V. "Legislazione e magistero di Giovanni Paolo II sulla visita 'ad limina apostolorum.'" ME 118 (1993) 451–500.

CLSA Committee for Research and Education on Rights and Pastoral Responsibilities of Bishops. "Report of a CLSA Survey on Auxiliary Bishops." J 53 (1993) 354–361.

CLSA Committee for the Study of Apostolic Visitation and the Limitation of Powers of a Diocesan Bishop. "Apostolic Visitation, Accountability, and the Rights of the Local Church." J 49 (1989) 341–346.

Faris, J. D. The Eastern Catholic Churches: Constitution and Governance. New York: St. Maron Publications, 1992.

Foster, M. "The Role of Auxiliary Bishops." J 51 (1991) 423–430.

Ghirlanda, G. "Adnotatio ad responsum authenticum circa can. 346, §1." P 81 (1992) 347–350.

———. "La chiesa particolare: Natura e tipologia." ME 115 (1990) 551–568.

Granfield, P. "The Church Local and Universal: Realization of Communion." J 49 (1989) 449–471.

Green, T. "The Church's Sanctifying Mission: Some Aspects of the Normative Role of the Diocesan Bishop." Stud Can 35 (1991) 245–276.

———. "The Church's Sanctifying Mission: Some Aspects of the Role of Episcopal Conferences." In Ius Sequitur Vitam: Law Follows Life, Studies in Canon Law Presented to P. J. M. Huizing, 57–88. Louvain: University Press, 1991.

———. "Deliberative Vote for Retired Bishops in Teaching Matters." J 54 (1994) 1–21.

———. "The Diocesan Bishop in the Revised Code: Some Introductory Reflections." J 42 (1982) 320–347.

———. "The Pastoral Governance Role of the Diocesan Bishop: Foundations, Scope and Limitations." J 49 (1989) 472–506.

———. "Persons and Structures in the Church: Reflections on Selected Issues in Book II." J 45 (1985) 24–94.

———. "Rights and Duties of Diocesan Bishops." CLSAP (1983) 18–36.

———. "Shepherding the Patrimony of the Poor: Diocesan and Parish Structures of Financial Administration." J 56 (1997) 706–734.

Griffin, B. "The Challenge of Ecumenism for Canonists." CLSAP (1993) 17–38.

Herranz, J. "The Personal Power of Governance of the Diocesan Bishop." CLSAP (1987) 16–34; reprinted in Comm 20 (1988) 288–310.

Huels, J. M. "The Correction and Punishment of a Diocesan Bishop." J 49 (1989) 507–542.

Legrand, H. "Reflections on Conferences and Diocesan Bishops." J 48 (1988) 130–133.

Longhitano, A., et al. Chiesa particolare e strutture di communione. Bologna: Dehoniane, 1985.

Mallett, J., ed. The Ministry of Governance. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1986.

McHugh, J. "What Is the 'New Situation'?" Origins 26 (August 29, 1996) 175–176.

Metz, R. "La désignation des évêques dans le droit actuel: Étude comparative entre le Code latin de 1983 et le Code oriental de 1990." Stud Can 27 (1993) 321–334.

———. "Papal Legates and the Appointment of Bishops." J 52 (1992) 259–284.

Montini, G. P. "Ecclesia universalis an ecclesia universa?" P 74 (1985) 43–62.

Müller, H. "De speciali episcopi mandato iuxta CIC/1983." P 79 (1990) 219–241.

———. "How the Local Church Lives and Affirms Its Catholicity." J 52 (1992) 340–364.

———. "The Relationship Between the Episcopal Conference and the Diocesan Bishop." J 48 (1988) 111–129.

O'Connor, J. "Reflections on Church Governance." Origins 26 (August 29, 1996) 171–175.

PCILT, ed. Ius in Vita et in Missione Ecclesiae. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1994.

Pospishil, V. J. Eastern Catholic Church Law. 2nd rev. ed. Staten Island: Saint Maron Publications, 1996.

Provost, J. "Appointment of a Diocesan Administrator or a Coadjutor." CLSA Advisory Opinions 1984–1993, ed. P. Cogan, 90–91. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995.

Quinn, J. "Considering the Papacy." Origins 26 (July 18, 1996) 119–128.

Read, G. "Norms on Bishops Leaving Office." CLS-GBIN 79 (September 1989) 20–22.

———. "Retired Bishops as Members of the Synod of Bishops: A Comment on the Interpretation of Can. 346, §1 dated 2nd July 1991." CLS-GBIN 89 (March 1992) 6–8.

Reese, T. Archbishop. New York: Harper and Row, 1989.

———. A Flock of Shepherds: The National Conference of Catholic Bishops. Kansas City: Sheed and Ward, 1992.

———, ed. Episcopal Conferences: Historical, Canonical, and Theological Studies. Washington, D.C.: Georgetown University, 1989.

Rodríguez, P. Particular Churches and Personal Prelatures. Dublin: Four Courts, 1986.

Routhier, G. "'Église locale' ou 'église particulière': Querelle sémantique ou opinion théologique?" Stud Can 25 (1991) 277–334.

Ruini, C. "Il vescovo e la communione nella chiesa particolare." ME 116 (1991) 227–241.

Sarrazin, F. "La nomination des évêques dans l'église latine." Stud Can 20 (1986) 367–407.

Sheehy, G., et al., eds. The Canon Law: Letter and Spirit. Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1995.

Thomas, F. "The Bishop in His Teaching Office and Those Who Assist Him." Stud Can 21 (1987) 229–238.

Tobin, J. "The Diocesan Bishop as Moderator of the Entire Ministry of the Word." CLSANZ (1988) 51–84.

Weakland, R. "The Local Churches and the Church of Rome." Origins 26 (August 29, 1996) 176–177.

Wijlens, M. "'For You I Am a Bishop, With You I Am a Christian': The Bishop as Legislator." J 56 (1996) 68–91.

Wrenn, L. Authentic Interpretations on the 1983 Code. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1993.

Title II
Groupings of Particular Churches
[cc. 431–459]

The 1917 code's canons on "Patriarchs, Primates, and Metropolitans" (CIC 270–280) and on "Plenary and Provincial Councils" (CIC 281–292) were sandwiched between chapters on "Legates of the Roman Pontiff" (CIC 265–270) and "Apostolic Vicariates and Prefectures" (CIC 293–211), under the rubric, "The Supreme Power and Those Who by Church Law Share in It." Provinces merited only passing notice as the territories over which metropolitans and provincial councils exercised authority. This organization of material could easily give the impression that the authority exercised by metropolitans and by particular councils, like the power exercised by legates and apostolic vicars, was delegated papal power, and that provinces were only administrative units of the universal church.

The 1983 code's treatment of provinces, metropolitans, particular councils, and episcopal conferences is differently situated. The code does not approach these institutes under the rubric of the supreme church authority but in a section devoted to particular churches and their groupings (cc. 368–572). After a title concerning particular churches and their shepherds (cc. 368–430) comes the present title dealing with groupings of particular churches (cc. 431–459). This organization of material does not suggest that metropolitans, particular councils, and episcopal conferences are vehicles for the exercise of papal power.

One should probably resist the temptation to exaggerate the significance of the change. Common sense could argue that the governance of groupings of particular churches need not involve a sharing in the supreme power.[1] When an archbishop celebrates a pontifical Mass in a parish church located within the territory of one of his suffragans, is he really exercising the supreme power? On the other hand, it is difficult not to see in the structure of this section of the 1983 code something of the new mindset (novus mentis habitus) about which Pope Paul VI spoke. Ideas recovered or more forcefully emphasized by the Second Vatican Council clearly constitute the background against which the reader will understand these canons.

(1) If a diocese is a particular church in and from which the one and only Catholic Church comes into being (LG 23; cf. CD 11), it is more than an administrative unit of the universal Church. In and through it the Church of Christ manifests itself in a particular place at a particular time. When such particular churches come together to promote their common dedication to the mission of the Church (cc. 431, §1; 434; 445; 447), their assemblies ought also to reflect something more than administrative efficiency. It may be too early to say how these gatherings exhibit the structure of the Church, but the 1983 code's organization seems open and flexible enough to accommodate doctrinal development.

(2) If the authority to shepherd a particular church is conveyed by episcopal ordination,[2] then, when ministering routinely to the particular churches entrusted to their care, bishops are exercising their own episcopal rather than delegated papal power (LG 27). Overarching papal power and the power of the college of bishops coordinate (and sometimes limit) the exercise of this episcopal power so as to allow the whole Church to grow harmoniously toward its goal. Intermediate structures such as provincial councils and episcopal conferences can be seen as vehicles provided or sanctioned by supreme authority for the more effective exercise of episcopal authority.

[1] See, for example, the remarks of one consultor during the February 13, 1980 session of the coetus responsible for the revision of this section of the code (Comm 12 [1980] 244–245).

[2] The essential proviso is that such authority can be exercised only in hierarchical communion with the head and members of the college of bishops (LG 21).

(3) As members of the college entrusted with responsibility for the well-being of the universal Church, each individual bishop has a right and duty to be "solicitous" for the whole Church (LG 23). Gatherings of bishops to provide for the better shepherding of the particular churches over which they individually preside are a forum within which this solicitude comes to practical expression. The 1983 code's emphasis on the fostering of relationships among neighboring bishops (c. 431, §1) and on the joint exercise of pastoral munera (c. 447) seems to acknowledge that effective shepherding is always a collaborative[3] endeavor.

This title of the code consists of four chapters that are not logically parallel. Chapter 1 comprises four canons, two each on ecclesiastical provinces and ecclesiastical regions (cc. 431–434). In the 1977 schema on the People of God (hereafter "schema") the latter were coterminous with nations. It would therefore have been quite logical for the next chapters to address the institutes that exercise authority within the province (the metropolitan and the provincial council) and then those which exercise it within the region (the regional—now plenary—council and the episcopal conference).[4] However, the neatness of this pattern has been somewhat disordered by the change in meaning of region. Regions are now optional gatherings of provinces within the territory over which a single episcopal conference exercises authority. A gathering of the bishops of an ecclesiastical region has no proper name in the code: canon 434 calls it a conventus, a meeting, assembly, or "coming together" of the involved bishops.

The chapter on provinces and regions is followed by chapters on metropolitans (who exercise authority within the provinces—cc. 435–438) and particular councils (one type of which, the provincial council, also exercises authority within a province—cc. 439–446). The chapter on particular councils also discusses plenary councils because the norms on membership, procedure, and authority of both institutes are virtually identical. The final chapter in the title addresses episcopal conferences (cc. 447–459). Strictly speaking, an episcopal conference is not, as the rubric might lead one to suspect, a coetus of particular churches; it is a gathering of the chief shepherds of particular churches. In the practical order, however, this distinction may be academic: at least in the United States of America, particular councils as envisaged by the canons almost never occur.

The principal sources of the following canons are the 1917 code, the conciliar decree Christus Dominus, and the 1966 motu proprio Ecclesiae sanctae. With one exception[5] there are no exact parallels in the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches.

CHAPTER I
ECCLESIASTICAL PROVINCES AND ECCLESIASTICAL REGIONS
[cc. 431–434]

The four canons in this chapter comprise two loosely parallel pairs dealing respectively with ec-

[3] One hesitates to use the term collegial here. Strictly collegial acts involve the entire episcopal college. On the other hand, "the episcopal function is by its very nature 'collegial.' This essential connection of each bishop with the college brings it about that the acts of only one bishop, even if they are personal, also imply a collegial dimension so long as he remains in hierarchical communion" (A. Antón, "The Theological 'Status' of Episcopal Conferences," J 48 [1988] 205). If this be true of the solitary activity of the individual bishop, how much more should it be true of the activity of bishops working together in provinces, in particular councils, or in episcopal conferences!

[4] The schema in fact used the opposite order: because article I (concerning particular councils) began with canons on regional (i.e., national) councils, article II dealt with the other national institute, the episcopal conference; and article III dealt with the other provincial institute, the metropolitan. The canons in chapter 1 of the present code were called "preliminary canons."

[5] Canon 437 concerning the pallium corresponds with c. 156, §1 of the Eastern code.

clesiastical provinces (cc. 431 and 432) and ecclesiastical regions (cc. 433 and 434). Canons 431, §1 and 434 specify the purposes for which these institutes exist. Canons 431, §3 and 433, §1 indicate how they come into being. Canons 432, §2 and 433, §2 discuss their juridic personality. Canons 432, §1 and 434 note who exercises authority within them.

Ecclesiastical Provinces

Canon 431 — §1. To promote the common pastoral action of different neighboring dioceses according to the circumstances of persons and places and to foster more suitably the relations of the diocesan bishops among themselves, neighboring particular churches are to be brought together into ecclesiastical provinces limited to a certain territory.

This canon, without antecedent in the 1917 code, consists of (a) two parallel purpose clauses specifying the values the law seeks to promote and (b) an impersonally expressed norm of action.

The norm of action is clear: the particular churches within specified territories must be gathered into provinces. Canon 368 defines particular churches as (1) dioceses; (2) territorial prelatures; (3) territorial abbacies; (4) apostolic vicariates; (5) apostolic prefectures; and (6) apostolic administrations "erected in a stable manner." Canon 431, §3 indicates upon whom falls the obligation of grouping these particular churches into provinces: the supreme authority of the Church.

The canon's two parallel purpose clauses provide reasons for the establishment of provinces: (1) it will make it easier for neighboring particular churches to collaborate; (2) it will foster communion among the shepherds of their constitutive particular churches. The qualification, iuxta personarum et locorum adiuncta, demonstrates the legislator's realization that "common pastoral action" is not an absolute value: local circumstances may indicate that within a given province the well-being of the people of God as a whole or the people of God within one or another particular church will be best served by independent action on the part of one or several dioceses. The law does not see the fostering of communio among the shepherds, and therefore among the flocks, as subject to any similar qualification.

§2. As a rule, exempt dioceses are no longer to exist. Therefore, individual dioceses and other particular churches within the territory of some ecclesiastical province must be joined to this ecclesiastical province.

The source of this canon, also without a 1917 code parallel, is Christus Dominus 40, 2: "As a general rule all dioceses and other territorial divisions which are by law equivalent to dioceses should be attached to an ecclesiastical province. Therefore dioceses which are now directly subject to the Apostolic See and not united to any other are either to be brought together to form a new ecclesiastical province, if that be possible, or else attached to that province which is nearer or more convenient. They are to be made subject to the metropolitan jurisdiction of the archbishop, in keeping with the norms of common law."[6] The canon consists of two norms of action derived from the principles expressed in §1. Given the importance of the values identified therein, the existence of particular churches that respond directly to the Holy See and are not associated with any province does not make much sense. A freedom not to collaborate with neighboring particular churches is not a privilege; it is a failure to appreciate the universal Church as a communion of particular churches. Henceforth, no particular church ought to be considered (ne habeatur) exempt from the provincial structure. The canon, following the council, does qualify this dictate: pro regula, as a rule.[7] The legislator does not ex-

[6] AAS 58 (1966) 694.

[7] The expression appears in three other canons. Canon 372, §1 declares that dioceses should pro regula include all and only the faithful who live within a given territory. Nevertheless, paragraph two recognizes that special circumstances might require the erection of personal dioclude a priori the possibility that particular circumstances might require that some particular church not be joined to some province.[8]

The second clause of the paragraph strongly prescribes (ascribi debent) the assimilation of hitherto exempt particular churches into the provinces within whose territorial limits they lie. Paragraph three specifies the subject of this impersonally expressed obligation: the supreme power in the Church.

§3. It is only for the supreme authority of the Church to establish, suppress, or alter ecclesiastical provinces after having heard the bishops involved.

The source of this canon is canon 215, §1 of the 1917 code which claimed for the supreme power (changed to authority in the present code) of the Church the sole prerogative to "erect or otherwise circumscribe, divide, combine, or suppress" provinces and particular churches. The former code made no mention of any requirement for prior consultation with the bishops, territorial prelates, etc., who might be affected by the exercise of this prerogative.

Lumen gentium 21 teaches that bishops can exercise their sacred power only in hierarchical communion with the head and members of the college of bishops. Assigning each bishop a specific office as well as delineating the sphere of its exercise is a function of the supreme authority within the Church.

According to canon 331, by virtue of his office the pope "possesses supreme, full, immediate, and universal ordinary power in the Church." He usually conducts the business of the universal Church "through the Roman Curia" (c. 360). According to article 76 of Pastor bonus, everything concerning the "constitution, division, union, suppression, or other changes of particular churches and their groupings" belongs to the Congregation for Bishops. According to article 89, the same responsibility in mission lands belongs to the Congregation for Evangelization of Peoples. It is therefore through these dicasteries that the pope would fulfill his right and duty "to establish, suppress, or alter ecclesiastical provinces."

According to canon 336, the episcopal college, "together with its head and never without this head, is also the subject of supreme and full power over the universal Church." Nothing in the text of canon 431, §3 would prevent the college of bishops from establishing, suppressing, or changing ecclesiastical provinces. Indeed, the Second Vatican Council can be thought of as having exercised just this power when it mandated the suppression of the institute of "exempt" particular churches.

Although nothing in law precludes the collegial creation or suppression of an ecclesiastical province, such an activity would be very difficult in practice. The entire episcopal college is the subject of the power in question; but, apart from the convocation of an ecumenical council, the entire college lacks a vehicle for the exercise of this power. For all practical purposes, therefore, only the Holy See can erect, suppress, or change the makeup of an ecclesiastical province.

The canon prescribes that the bishops likely to be affected by the decision should be heard beforehand. This prescription appears to be a particceses, e.g., for members of a different rite. Canon 475, §2 prescribes that pro regula there should be only one vicar general, but allows for exceptions due to "pastoral reasons." Canon 857, §2 indicates that adults should be baptized in their own parish church and infants in the parish church of their parents, "unless a just cause suggests otherwise." Only in c. 431, §2 is the expression pro regula not immediately followed by an explicit recognition that circumstances might make observing the general rule unduly difficult. The coetus responsible for drafting this section of the code added the expression lest the canon impose an inflexible norm out of harmony with some situations. Comm 12 (1980) 253.

[8] CLD 7, 124 reports a private SCB rescript, dated June 28, 1972, withdrawing the Diocese of Berlin from the jurisdiction of the Archdiocese of Wroclaw, Poland, and making it immediately subject to the Holy See. G. Read points to "the dioceses in Switzerland in which there are no provinces" as other examples of still-existing particular churches that have not been joined to an ecclesiastical province. G. Read, "Section II: Particular Churches and their Groupings," in CLSGBI Com, 242.

ular application of canon 50: "Before issuing a singular decree, an authority is to seek out the necessary information and proofs and, insofar as possible, to hear those whose rights can be injured." One of the functions of the provincial structure is the fostering of common pastoral activity in the light of local circumstances (c. 431, §1). If only in order to prepare the quinquennial report (c. 399, §1), a bishop must be sensitive to these circumstances. Hence, the Holy See would want to consult with the bishops of the affected local churches, not so much to prevent injury to the personal interests of the bishops themselves, but more to avail itself of the information and insights only these shepherds could provide.[9]

Authority in Province

Canon 432 — §1. The provincial council and the metropolitan possess authority in an ecclesiastical province according to the norm of law.

A province, like a particular church or even the universal Church, needs a physical person or a group of physical persons to represent it and to coordinate the activities of its members. This paragraph, part of whose material derives from canon 272 of the 1917 code, identifies two institutes that fulfill this function: the provincial council and the metropolitan. The norms of law defining the metropolitan's exercise of this authority[10] are found primarily in chapter 2 (cc. 435–437) of the current title; those dealing with the provincial council are found primarily in chapter 3 (cc. 439, §2; 440; 442–446).

§2. An ecclesiastical province possesses juridic personality by the law itself.

This paragraph indicates the juridic nature of the ecclesiastical provinces whose existence is mandated in canon 431: they are juridic persons, "subjects in canon law of obligations and rights which correspond to their nature" (c. 113, §2), "aggregates of persons or of things ordered for a purpose which is in keeping with the mission of the Church and which transcends the purpose of the individuals" (c. 114, §1).[11] A province enjoys this legal status ipso iure: it cannot exist as a province without therefore being a juridic person. As such it can own property, make contracts, receive bequests, stand in court—in short, engage in whatever business is necessary for the accomplishment of its mission.

It would appear that a province is a public juridic person as defined in canon 116, §1: it is constituted by competent ecclesiastical authority (the Holy See) to fulfill "the proper function entrusted to [it] in view of the public good." Canon 118 states that the person or persons entitled to represent a public juridic person must be specified in universal law, in particular law, or in the statutes of the juridic person. Canon 432, §1 functions as the necessary acknowledgment in universal law of the rights and duties of the metropolitan[12] and of the provincial council in this regard.

Ecclesiastical Regions

Canon 433 — §1. If it seems advantageous, especially in nations where particular churches are more numerous, the Holy See can unite neighboring ecclesiastical provinces into ecclesiastical regions at the request of the conference of bishops.

[9] ES I, 42 had "established the competence of the conference of bishops to provide information" about the erection, suppression, or alteration of ecclesiastical provinces. Canon 431, §3 appears to eliminate from the process the involvement of the conference. Cf. J. Arrieta, "Title II—Groupings of Particular Churches," in Pamplona ComEng, 329.

[10] Read, in CLSGBI Com, 242, correctly observes that the metropolitan has no legislative power over the province and very limited executive power. His judicial authority is limited to particular cases.

[11] A juridic person in canon law is roughly analogous to a corporation in civil law. It appears that, at least in the United States of America, provinces are not civilly incorporated.

[12] "Based on an analogy of law (see cc. 19, 118, 435), the Metropolitan represents the province in juridical matters in the same way as the Bishop represents the diocese (see Can. 393)." Read, in CLSGBI Com, 242.

The material in this canon parallels the material in canon 431, §§1 and 3, and is without antecedent in the 1917 code. Christus Dominus 40, 3 had urged that, when it seemed useful, provinces should be gathered into ecclesiastical regions, for which regulations should be formulated.[13] The 1977 schema proposed that all of the provinces of a single nation constitute an ecclesiastical region (c. 187, §2), which could be subdivided into "regional districts" (c. 187, §5).[14] The optional institute envisaged by the 1983 code, by contrast, is an intermediate structure between the province and the nation—i.e., it is roughly what the schema had termed a "regional district."[15]

Canon 433, §1 is a complex conditional sentence. The main clause in the indicative recognizes that the Holy See has the power to gather provinces into ecclesiastical regions. The canon presupposes that the Holy See will do this, not on its own initiative, but in response to a request from the episcopal conference of the territory in question. The same considerations that necessitate the grouping of particular churches into provinces (cf. c. 431, §1) can suggest the usefulness of grouping provinces into regions: the fostering of common pastoral action and the enhancing of effective collegiality among neighboring bishops. In relatively small countries (e.g., Belgium) these values may be adequately realized through regular meetings of the episcopal conferences. Where there are many provinces, however (e.g., Italy), there might be some point in having an intermediate level of organization.[16] The initiative for proposing the establishment of such a structure belongs to the affected bishops, acting through the episcopal conference.

The phrasing of this canon is entirely concessive: it acknowledges a power to act, but imposes no obligation to do so. It should be noted that Ecclesiae sanctae I, 42 directed episcopal conferences to determine whether "the good of souls" urged the erection of such regions. If so, the conferences were to make proposals to the Holy See concerning their correct ordering.[17]

§2. An ecclesiastical region can be erected as a juridic person.

The purely optional character of the ecclesiastical region is underscored by this canon. The establishment of a region, unlike that of a province, does not automatically endow it with juridic personality. Because canon 433, §1 views the Holy See as the authority competent to erect a region, one can infer that the Holy See is likewise the authority competent to endow it with juridic personality.[18]

Canon 434 — It belongs to a meeting of the bishops of an ecclesiastical region to foster cooperation and common pastoral action in the region.

[13] AAS 58 (1966) 694.

[14] For a clear presentation of the evolution of the meaning of the term, see J. Provost, "Title II— Groupings of Particular Churches," in CLSA Com, 353. See also the original coetus discussion of the formulation of the canons on ecclesiastical regions in Comm 17 (1985) 97–98.

[15] J. Listl notes that this and the following canons are products of the final redaction of the 1983 code: they were not to be found even in the March 25, 1982 Schema novissimum of the code. The lateness of the appearance of these canons demonstrates how controversial were questions about the nature and function of ecclesiastical regions. J. Listl, "§33 Plenarkonzil und Bischofskonferenz," in Handbuch, 305. The unsettled state of these questions, in turn, might explain the code's restrained treatment of this optional institute.

[16] J. Gutiérrez reports that since 1919 Italy has been divided into 17 pastoral regions called conciliar regions. J. Gutiérrez, "Capítulo VI Organización Jerarquica de la Iglesia," in Manual de Derecho Canonico (Pamplona: Universidad de Navarra, 1988) 352.

[17] AAS 58 (1966) 774–775.

[18] Chapter VII of the Bylaws of the NCCB (= Article XIV of the Bylaws of the USCC) states, "For the purposes of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops, the archdioceses and dioceses of the United States will be grouped into regions as designated by the Administrative Committee." These regions are not examples of the canonically erected regions with which cc. 433 and 434 are concerned. According to Sister Sharon Euart, RSM, Associate General Secretary of the NCCB, "there is no uniform manner of operation among the regions. Each has a regional chairman elected by the members of the regions and regional representation on the Administrative Committee and Board" (private communication).

Nevertheless, such a meeting does not have the powers attributed to a conference of bishops in the canons of this Code unless the Holy See has specifically granted it certain powers.

Without antecedent in the 1917 code, this canon parallels canon 432, §1 concerning the province. There are two foci of authority in the province, but only one in a region; and its authority is rather weakly defined. The two clauses of this canon specify what the conventus ("meeting" or "assembly") of the bishops of a region can and cannot do. In the absence of a special grant of power from the Holy See, such an assembly lacks the powers which the code attributes to the episcopal conference. On the other hand, because it is not a particular council, it lacks the powers proper to a provincial or plenary council (cf. c. 445). Although such an assembly is responsible for fostering "cooperation and common pastoral action in the region," the canon gives no indication that individual bishops are legally bound to observe decisions reached by the assembly.[19]

Despite its obvious lack of juridic authority, such a conventus cannot be chaired by an auxiliary bishop.[20]

[19] Arrieta observes, "This assembly does not usually exercise a governing power that is binding on the member bishops." However, if granted peculiar faculties by the Holy See, "it will exercise some kind of the power of governance" when it uses those faculties (Pamplona ComEng, 330). In other words, the power exercised by such an assembly of bishops would always be delegated power. Because the legislative power of an authority lower than the supreme authority cannot be delegated (cf. c. 135, §2), Read dryly concludes, "It is clear that the Bishops at a regional meeting cannot do more than reach joint decisions to be implemented on the basis of their individual episcopal authority within their own dioceses" (CLSGBI Com, 243).

[20] AAS 81 (1989) 388. The code likewise reserves the presidency of a plenary council (c. 441, 3°) and (if the metropolitan is impeded from acting) of a provincial council (c. 442, §2) to diocesan bishops. For the arguments in favor of reserving the presidential role to diocesan bishops see R. Castillo Lara, "De episcoporum conferentiarum praesidentia," Comm 21 (1989) 95–97. See the commentary on c. 452 for a précis of his arguments.

CHAPTER II
METROPOLITANS
[cc. 435–438]

The world into which Christianity first spread was, long before the Roman conquest, a world of city states. Some urban centers exercised considerable political, economic, and cultural influence over their less important neighbors; and their becoming the seats of Roman provincial government heightened their prestige. Christian communities sprang up first in these centers, and the evangelization of other cities and towns began there. These "mother" churches (metropolitan sees) accordingly acquired certain prerogatives over their "daughter" churches, a development that reached its climax in the growth of the great patriarchal sees.

This process was attenuated in the West, partly because it was less thoroughly urbanized, partly because of the preeminence of Rome. Although history has known doughty metropolitans like Hincmar of Rheims, current law accords the metropolitan very limited authority.

The four canons of this chapter are based on canons 272 through 281 of the 1917 code. A preliminary canon (c. 435) defines the office of metropolitan. Canon 436 specifies the rights and duties of the office. Canon 437 deals with the pallium, a vestment symbolizing the communion between the metropolitan and the pope. Canon 438 is a kind of appendix, noting that the titles of patriarch and primate are purely honorific in the West.

Definition

Canon 435 — A metropolitan, who is the archbishop of his diocese, presides over an ecclesiastical province. The office of metropolitan is joined with an episcopal see determined or approved by the Roman Pontiff.

This canon, a reworking of canon 272 of the 1917 code, combines elements of constitutional law and definition. Canon 432, §1 states that within the norms of law the competent authority in the province is the metropolitan and the provincial council. This raises the questions, "Who is the metropolitan? What norms of law govern his activity?" Canon 435 answers the first question, and canon 436 answers the second.

The former code appeared to identify the titles metropolitan and archbishop. The current canon is more exact: the title of archbishop can be given to a non-residential bishop—for example, the pronuncio to the United States of America. A metropolitan is a residential archbishop, the chief shepherd of a particular church to which the office of presiding over the province has been attached either by papal determination or with papal approbation. The chief shepherds of the other particular churches belonging to the province are called suffragans. The former code categorized the task of presiding over the province as a dignity. Canon 435 more appropriately calls it an officium. Canon 145, §1 defines officium as "any function constituted in a stable manner by divine or ecclesiastical ordinance to be exercised for a spiritual purpose." To facilitate achieving the purposes of provinces (cf. c. 431, §1), in each province church law entrusts in a stable manner certain functions to the chief shepherd of a determinate particular church.

Authority

Canon 436 — §1. In the suffragan dioceses, a metropolitan is competent:

1° to exercise vigilance so that the faith and ecclesiastical discipline are observed carefully and to inform the Roman Pontiff of abuses, if there are any;

2° to conduct a canonical visitation for a cause previously approved by the Apostolic See if a suffragan has neglected it;

3° to designate a diocesan administrator according to the norm of cann. 421, §2, and 425, §3.

This simplification[21] of canon 274 of the 1917 code is a taxative (cf. c. 436, §3) specification of the duties (and corresponding rights or prerogatives) of the metropolitan vis à vis the dioceses of his suffragans.[22] Within his own particular church

[21] The items from the 1917 code omitted from the present code are not particularly significant. (1) Canon 274, 1° of the 1917 code concerned the presentation of a candidate for a benefice. The institution of presentation has been suppressed (cf. Comm 12 [1980] 273). (2) Canon 274, 2° concerned indulgences, an institute that has been greatly simplified: cf. Paul VI, apconst Indulgentiarum doctrina, January 1, 1967, AAS 59 (1967) 5–24; CLD 6, 570–575). See the commentary on cc. 992–997. (3) Canon 274, 6° was reworked into c. 436, §3 of the current code. (4) Canon 274, 7°–8° dealt with tribunal issues now relegated to procedural law (cf. Comm 12 [1980] 273; also Comm 14 [1982] 190).

[22] Canon 442, §1 lists other obligations of the metropolitan vis-à-vis a provincial council; and c. 442, §2 notes his right and duty to preside over such a council unless he is legitimately impeded. The metropolitan presumably would preside over the triennial meeting of the bishops of the province during which they compose a list of presbyters "who are more suitable for the episcopate" (c. 377, §2). One likewise presumes that the metropolitan would preside at the non-conciliar "meeting of the bishops of the province to determine by decree for the entire province the offering to be given for the celebration and application of a Mass" (c. 952, §1). According to c. 413, §1, "as soon as possible after taking possession of the diocese," each bishop is to prepare a list of persons who are (in their listed order) to assume the governance of the impeded see. A copy of this list, which must reviewed at least every three years, is to be provided to the metropolitan (cf. the commentary on this canon). The metropolitan is likewise entitled to receive copies of any declarations or decrees emanating from diocesan synods celebrated within his province (c. 467), but the canons do not imply that he has any power to disallow or revise either the aforementioned list or the declarations and decrees. Canon 501, §3 requires a suffragan bishop to consult his metropolitan before dissolving a "presbyteral council [which] does not fulfill the function entrusted to it for the good of the diocese or gravely abuses it." However, the phrasing of the canon makes it obvious that the metropolitan has no authority to overrule the suffragan's decision, for the canon speaks of consultation (facta consultatione), not of consent. Furthermore, it requires the metropolitan to consult "the suffragan bishop senior in promotion" before dissolving the archdiocesan presbyteral council; and no suffragan, not even the most senior, has a supervisory function vis à vis his metropolitan. In none of these instances does the law grant the metropolitan any power of governance within the suffragan dioceses.

the archbishop possesses all of the rights and duties of a diocesan bishop: these are not in question in this section of the code.[23]

Canon 392, §1 situates a diocesan bishop's disciplinary role within the context of his concern for the unity of the universal Church. His guarding against abuses (c. 392, §2) is a particular expression of this concern: false or inaccurate teaching, irreverent or otherwise improper worship, and maladministration are disruptive of the harmony and good order without which the people of God cannot fulfill their mission and grow in charity. The metropolitan exercises a similar but more circumscribed oversight over the entire province. Unlike the diocesan bishop, who has "all ordinary, proper, and immediate power" necessary for shepherding the particular church entrusted to his care (cf. c. 381, §1), the metropolitan has no authority to intervene on his own initiative in the affairs of the dioceses of his suffragans. He has instead the right and duty to inform the pope (who does have "ordinary power over all particular churches"—c. 333, §1) of any abuses in the area of faith or discipline.

Canons 395 and 415 offer two examples of the metropolitan's exercise of this kind of vigilance.[24] According to canon 395, §4, if a suffragan absents himself from his diocese for longer than six months, the metropolitan is obliged to inform the Holy See of his absence. Canon 415, in turn, prescribes that the metropolitan is to take immediate recourse to the Holy See if one of his suffragans should be prevented by an ecclesiastical penalty from fulfilling his episcopal duties.[25]

Canon 396, §1 specifies the diocesan bishop's obligation to visit his diocese at least once every five years. If a bishop neglects this duty, the metropolitan can fulfill the obligation, but only with the prior approval of the Holy See.

If a suffragan see falls vacant, the college of consultors is to elect a diocesan administrator within eight days. If it fails to do so (c. 421, §1), or if the administrator elected (a) is not a priest, or (b) is not at least thirty-five, or (c) was previously elected, nominated, or presented for the same vacant see[26] (c. 425, §1), the metropolitan has the right and the duty to appoint a diocesan administrator.

The phrasing of canon 436, §1, 1°, 2°, and 3° indicates how rarely a metropolitan can involve himself in the governance of the particular churches of his brother bishops. Potentially the most important of his prerogatives—the right and duty to appoint a diocesan administrator—is assumed by the senior suffragan when the metropolitan see itself is vacant (cc. 421, §2; 425, §3). It is obvious that the canons do not see the metropolitan as a kind of "super bishop."

§2. Where circumstances demand it, the Apostolic See can endow a metropolitan with special functions and power to be determined in particular law.

There are large cities—e.g., São Paulo[27] and Paris[28]—which have been divided into several particular churches, one of which is the archdiocese. The need for fostering common pastoral action, evident in any province (c. 431, §1), is critical in such situations.[29] This new canon recognizes that the Holy See may provide for the special needs of such [23] See the relevant commentary on cc. 381–402.

[24] The obligations specified by these canons belong to the senior suffragan if the metropolitan is the delinquent.

[25] According to c. 1405, §1, 3°, only the pope can serve as judge in penal cases involving bishops. See the relevant commentary on this canon. Presumably c. 415 would be of particular importance only when the suffragan had incurred an automatic penalty.

[26] The Holy See is the final arbiter of a person's suitability to be a bishop (c. 378, §2). A candidate who was nominated, presented, or elected to the office of bishop of a specific see but not confirmed by Rome has already been judged by Rome unsuitable to serve as shepherd of that particular flock. This implicit judgment of unsuitability prevents a group of diocesan priests from later selecting him for the same post.

[27] Comm 12 (1980) 273.

[28] Read, in CLSGBI Com, 244.

[29] For a more technical discussion of this issue, see Arrieta, in Pamplona ComEng, 332.

a province by endowing the metropolitan with additional responsibilities and authority. The canon expresses the preference that these peculiar rights and duties be regulated by particular law.

§3. The metropolitan has no other power of governance in the suffragan dioceses. He can perform sacred functions, however, as if he were a bishop in his own diocese in all churches, but he is first to inform the diocesan bishop if the church is the cathedral.

The list of rights and duties of metropolitans in canon 436, §1 is intended to be taxative: with the exception of the circumstances detailed in canon 436, §2, common law does not recognize the metropolitan as having any other governmental power[30] within the dioceses of his suffragans. This canon concedes that the metropolitan does enjoy a liturgical prerogative (not really a power) not shared by non-metropolitans. Canon 390 prescribes that a bishop "can perform pontifical functions in his entire diocese" but not outside his diocese "without the express, or at least reasonably presumed, consent of the local ordinary."[31] The metropolitan, by contrast, can pontificate throughout the province without anyone's consent. If he intends to preside in the cathedral of one of his suffragans, the canon obliges him to notify the latter beforehand; but the suffragan has no legal right to prevent the celebration.

The Pallium

Canon 437 — §1. Within three months from the reception of episcopal consecration or if he has already been consecrated, from the canonical provision, a metropolitan is obliged to request the pallium from the Roman Pontiff either personally or through a proxy. The pallium signifies the power which the metropolitan, in communion with the Roman Church, has by law in his own province.

This canon is virtually identical with canon 275 of the 1917 code.[32] The pallium is a kind of white woolen collar, roughly two and a half inches wide, with pendants in front and back. Decorated with six black silk crosses, it is secured with gold pins on top of the chasuble. It is woven from the wool of two lambs that are blessed at Saint John Lateran on the feast of Saint Agnes. On the vigil of the feast of Saints Peter and Paul the new pallia are taken to the crypt of Saint Peter where they are blessed by the pope at vespers. They are kept there overnight and are given to the new archbishops in a special ceremony on the feast.[33] The pallium used to be more widely given.[34] In response to Vatican II's call for a reform of the [30] The metropolitan's tribunal may or may not have appellate jurisdiction over the cases originating in his suffragans' tribunals (cf. c. 1438, 1°). In some areas (for example, Canada) regional appellate tribunals have been established instead; and in other areas the tribunals within a single province appeal to each other in "round robin" fashion (Tribunal A to Tribunal B; Tribunal B to Tribunal C; Tribunal C to Tribunal D; Tribunal D to Tribunal A). If the metropolitan's tribunal does have appellate jurisdiction over the tribunals of his suffragans, it also enjoys first instance jurisdiction in actions concerning "the rights or temporal goods of a juridic person represented by [any suffragan] bishop" (cf. c. 1419, §2). In any event, the appellate jurisdiction his tribunal might enjoy over the cases heard in first instance before his suffragans' tribunals does not imply that the metropolitan is the moderator of any tribunal other than his own.

[31] In the light of SC 41, this is a highly sensible norm: the Church becomes most clearly visible when the bishop, assisted by his fellow ministers, presides over the Eucharist with his flock. The symbolism is less clear when the bishop is presiding over a brother bishop's flock.

[32] The ius vigens more precisely describes the pallium as symbolizing, not archepiscopal power (cf. the commentary on c. 435), but the power which a metropolitan exercises as such within his own province.

[33] For a sprightly discussion of the history of the pallium, the ceremonies involved in blessing it, and the correct way to wear it, see J.-C. Noonan, Jr., The Church Visible: The Ceremonial Life and Protocol of the Roman Catholic Church (New York: Viking, 1996) 359–363.

[34] For example, Cleri sanctitati 321, §1 required all Eastern rite metropolitans outside patriarchates to obtain a pallium. AAS 49 (1957) 529.

laws governing the rights and privileges of metropolitans (CD 40, 2), Pope Paul VI decreed that the pallium would henceforth be conferred only on metropolitans and on the Latin patriarch of Jerusalem.[35]

The canon establishes a duty for the newly created archbishop. It is not the responsibility of the Holy See to endow him with the pallium; it is his responsibility to seek one from the pope. His seeking the pallium vividly represents the communion with the church of Rome it will be his special responsibility to foster throughout his province. According to canon 379, someone who is not a bishop is obliged to seek episcopal consecration within three months of his receiving his letter of appointment. A non-bishop appointed to a metropolitan see might therefore have a maximum of six months within which to petition the pope for his pallium. A bishop transferred to the metropolitan see, on the other hand, must ask for the pallium within three months of his appointment. The former code (CIC 276) and Cleri sanctitati (c. 321, §2) forbade new metropolitans from exercising certain of their powers until they had obtained the pallium. This restriction was eliminated from the 1983 code to avoid giving the impression that the pallium itself conferred power and to avoid the inconvenience of limiting a metropolitan's exercise of his authority until the next consistory.[36]

This canon has an exact parallel in the Eastern code canon 156, §1. Certain Eastern churches have a metropolitan rather than patriarchal structure. According to canon 151, §1 of the Eastern code, such a church "is presided over by a metropolitan of a determined see who is appointed by the Roman Pontiff and assisted by a council of hierarchs according to the norm of law." It is autonomous in the sense that it is not subject to the authority of a patriarch or a major archbishop. It is directly subject to the authority of the pope, who can be thought of as exercising patriarchal authority over it.[37] Faris lists five Eastern Catholic churches (Ethiopian, Malabar, Malankar, Romanian, and Ruthenian) with a metropolitan structure.[38] The metropolitans of these churches, like the Latin rite metropolitans, are obliged to obtain from the pope a pallium as "a sign of [their] metropolitan power and full communion" with the Roman church. Like the 1917 code, but unlike the 1983 code, the Eastern code prohibits a metropolitan from exercising certain functions prior to the reception of the pallium: he "cannot convoke the council of hierarchs or ordain bishops" (CCEO 156, §2).

§2. A metropolitan can use the pallium according to the norm of liturgical laws within any church of the ecclesiastical province over which he presides, but not outside it, even if the diocesan bishop gives his assent.

This canon simplifies canon 277 of the 1917 code. It recognizes two limitations on the metropolitan's right to wear the pallium. The first is liturgical. Because the pallium is a vestment, its use is naturally regulated by liturgical law. The Ceremonial of Bishops 62 prescribes that, after a residential archbishop has received the pallium, he wear it to celebrate the stational Mass,[39] other Masses celebrated with great solemnity,[40] ordinations, blessings of abbots and abbesses, consecrations of virgins, and dedications of churches and altars. The second limitation on the wearing of the [35] Paul VI, mp Inter eximia, May 11, 1978, AAS 70 (1978) 442.

[36] Comm 12 (1980) 274.

[37] J. D. Faris, The Eastern Catholic Churches: Constitution and Governance According to the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches (New York: Saint Maron, 1992) 375; Pospishil Com, 196–198.

[38] Faris, 375.

[39] According to CB 119, a stational Mass is celebrated "when the bishop, as high priest of his flock, celebrates the eucharist ... in the cathedral, surrounded by his college of presbyters and by his ministers, and with the full, active participation of all God's holy people."

[40] H. Mauritz, "§34 Die Kirchenprovinz," in Handbuch, 328, n. 8, lists some two dozen principal feasts on which the pallium might be worn.

pallium is territorial: the metropolitan may wear it in every church located within the province over which he presides but in no other church. Because it is a symbol of the authority he exercises precisely as a metropolitan, it would make little sense for him to wear it in places where he lacks that authority.[41]

§3. A metropolitan needs a new pallium if he is transferred to another metropolitan see.

This canon reproduces the provisions of canon 278 of the 1917 code, omitting the reference to a metropolitan's "losing" his pallium.[42] Because the pallium represents a metropolitan's authority over a specific province, it might be unseemly for him to use the same pallium in another province. Moreover, the act of requesting the pallium could be seen as a distinctive act of harmony between the province and the church of Rome.

Patriarchs and Primates

Canon 438 — The titles of patriarch and primate entail no power of governance in the Latin Church apart from a prerogative of honor unless in some matters the contrary is clear from apostolic privilege or approved custom.

In the Western church there exists only one genuine patriarch, the pope.[43] Nevertheless, although they lack the authority patriarchs exercise in the Eastern churches, several prelates enjoy the title patriarch: the Latin Patriarch of Jerusalem, the Patriarch of Venice, the Patriarch of Lisbon, the Patriarch of the East Indies, and the Patriarch of the West Indies.[44] The title of primate likewise is purely honorific in current Latin rite law. This canon, a slight reworking of canon 271 of the former code, concedes that the Holy See might grant a given patriarch or primate special powers,[45] or that a given patriarch or primate might acquire such powers by custom;[46] but it notes that the titles in themselves do not imply any power of governance.

CHAPTER III
PARTICULAR COUNCILS
[cc. 439–446]

When the Second Vatican Council expressed its earnest desire "that the venerable institute of synods and [particular] councils flourish with new vigor" (CD 36),[47] the Fathers were recommending the more frequent and widespread use of one of the most ancient elements of the Church's governmental structure. Luke writes that, when controversies erupted at Antioch concerning the necessity of circumcision for salvation, the leaders of that community sent representatives to meet with the leadership of the Jerusalem community to formulate a common response to the question (Acts 15). Whatever the historical accuracy of Luke's account, the leaders of Christian communities early developed the habit of meeting with their neighbors to discuss such issues as the date of Easter, controverted doctrinal matters, and the proper treatment of members who lapsed during persecutions. Particular councils such as those held at Carthage in North Africa and Elvira and Toledo in Spain were influential in the development of canon law. The celebration of particular councils was a critical factor in the success of the Carolingian reform. More recently, the Councils of Baltimore had a lasting impact on the [41] There are at least two exceptions to this rule: the Latin Patriarch of Jerusalem and the Patriarch of Lisbon enjoy the privilege of wearing their pallia even outside their provinces. Cf. Comm 14 (1982) 190.

[42] Wearing the pallium is a privilege rather than an obligation. A metropolitan who "lost" his pallium would not therefore be obliged to seek a new one. On the other hand, the law does not appear to prohibit him from seeking a replacement for a lost, stolen, or damaged pallium.

[43] Comm 12 (1980) 271.

[44] Gutiérrez, 352–353.

[45] See the commentary on cc. 76–84 on privileges.

[46] See the commentary on cc. 23–28 on custom.

[47] AAS 58 (1966) 692.

development of church life in the United States of America.[48]

From Vatican II's expression of the wish that this institute "flourish with new vigor" one can easily conclude that particular councils were not then flourishing at all. Indeed, the 1917 code's requirement that a provincial council be convoked at least once every twenty years (CIC 283) was largely a dead letter. Although at least two countries (Poland[49] and the Philippines[50]) have recently convoked plenary councils, the decades following Vatican II do not appear to have witnessed a proliferation of particular councils.[51] It is possible that the institute is falling into desuetude.

[48] Two easily accessible overviews of the history of particular councils are: F. J. Murphy, Legislative Powers of the Provincial Council (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1947) 1–28; and E. O. Poblete, The Plenary Council (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1958) 1–19. For an excellent analysis of the vicissitudes of particular councils, cf. J. Provost, "Particular Councils," in The New Code of Canon Law, ed. M. Theriault and J. Thorn (Ottawa: St. Paul University, 1986) 1:538–542.

[49] "Regolamento del II Sinodo Plenario," in Ius Ecclesiae 5 (1993) 403–407, with a commentary: T. Pieronek, "Nota al Regolamento del II Sinodo Plenario Polacco," Ius Ecclesiae 5 (1993) 407–411.

[50] "Second Plenary Council of the Philippines Directory," Ius Ecclesiae 6 (1994) 813–825, with an appended commentary: A. Opalalic, "The Second Plenary Council of the Philippines," Ius Ecclesiae 6 (1994) 825–832. This council was celebrated from January 20, 1991 to February 17, 1991.

[51] For example, in preparation for drafting this commentary, the author informally polled the thirty-one provinces of the United States of America. Since 1983, none of the twenty responding provinces has held a council of the sort the code envisions. The bishops of these provinces meet regularly, with varying degrees of formality; and several provinces have Catholic conferences involving non-episcopal participation. Two provinces have institutes called provincial councils which meet once or twice each year. One of them welcomes the participation of representative priests, but neither of these councils seems to be what the code envisions. If the promulgation of a new code, some of whose norms require adaptations of particular legislation, does not spur intense conciliar activity, nothing is likely to do so.

Not everyone views that prospect with alarm. J. Gutiérrez, for example, argues that the purposes served by particular councils can be more efficiently achieved in other ways: plenary sessions of the episcopal conference can substitute for the celebration of plenary councils, and informal meetings of the bishops of a province can take the place of provincial councils.[52] Certainly these alternatives require less preparation and prior consultation,[53] and they almost certainly would be less cumbersome and easier to manage.[54]

Against the commendable pragmatism of this position at least two counter arguments can be mounted, one of which is admittedly purely technical. Respecting the traditional value of particular councils, the code recognizes their legislative competence (c. 445). The more or less informal gatherings of the bishops of a province are not really as such subjects of governmental power, and the legislative authority of the episcopal conference is strictly defined (c. 455, §1). Hence, a particular council, whether provincial or plenary, has greater legislative competence than either of the alternatives of which Gutiérrez speaks. The more important defense of the continuing relevance of particular councils, however, is ecclesiological. The informal gathering of the bishops of a province is precisely a gathering of bishops. An episcopal conference is likewise (by definition!) an assembly of bishops (c. 447). A particular council, by contrast, is a gathering of the faithful, both clergy and lay, both religious and secular. Although only bishops may actually cast ballots in such gatherings (c. 443, §§1–2), all the participants may speak; and during the celebration of such a council the Church as a hierarchically ordered community of believers is graphically displayed. Surely there is some value in a vehicle for decision making that so well expresses the nature of the Church.

[52] Gutiérrez, 354. The above-cited survey indicates that bishops do tend to meet in provincial gatherings, sometimes as frequently as four or six times a year.

[53] Pieronek, 408, reports that preparatory work for the Polish Plenary Synod began in 1987.

[54] Opalalic, 826, reports that the plenary council recently celebrated in the Philippines involved 489 participants.

The eight canons in this chapter are all norms of action, and most of them involve reworking the material found in canons 281 through 291 of the 1917 code. Two introductory canons distinguish between plenary councils and provincial councils. There follow two canons indicating who is responsible for convoking, determining the agenda of, and presiding over these councils. Two canons deal with the participants in particular councils. One canon specifies the scope of the authority of particular councils, and a final canon addresses the aftermath of the celebration of a council.

Plenary Councils

Canon 439 — §1. A plenary council, that is, one for all the particular churches of the same conference of bishops, is to be celebrated whenever it seems necessary or useful to the conference of bishops, with the approval of the Apostolic See.

This canon, modeled (with some significant differences) on canon 281 of the 1917 code, (a) defines plenary councils, (b) contains a norm governing the frequency of their celebration, and (c) notes the need for papal approval before their convocation.

(a) A plenary council is a gathering of representatives from all the particular churches within the territory of a single episcopal conference. Most episcopal conferences are responsible for all the local churches within a nation (cf. c. 448, §1); but some exercise jurisdiction over only a portion of the territory of a nation (e.g., Puerto Rico, England and Wales) or over the territories of several countries (Gambia, Sierra Leone, and Liberia) (cf. c. 448, §2). According to this canon, a council involving the leadership of all the particular churches of Puerto Rico would be a plenary council. A gathering of representatives from all the particular churches in the state of California would not. Under the discipline of the 1917 code, by contrast, any council involving the leadership of particular churches from more than one ecclesiastical province was a plenary council (CIC 281).

(b) At least as far back as the Council of Nicea,[55] universal law has urged the frequent celebration of particular councils. This canon realistically entrusts the decision about the necessity or the usefulness of celebrating a plenary council to the discretion of the episcopal conference.[56] Conferences must hold plenary sessions at least annually (cf. c. 453), and these regular sessions involve the participation of the chief shepherds of all the particular churches that would be involved in the celebration of a plenary council. The conference can adequately discuss and decide many issues whose resolution, under the 1917 code, would have required the convocation of a plenary council.[57] The canon does not indicate how the [55] See Murphy, 3–6, for an overview of early attempts to foster the frequent celebration of councils.

[56] The initial draft of this canon prescribed the celebration of regional (= plenary in the 1983 code) councils "at least every twenty years and whenever the episcopal conference of the region, with the approval of the Apostolic See, judged it necessary or useful" (Comm 17 [1985] 106). Hence, Arrieta, in Pamplona ComEng, 334–335, contends that a norm requiring the celebration of plenary councils at fixed intervals "would have implicitly entailed the approval of the Holy See." The text of c. 439, §1, by contrast, ensures Roman participation in every decision to convoke a plenary council and also allows the episcopal conference more freedom to decide when such a council might be useful. Cf. Comm 12 (1980) 256.

[57] An episcopal conference, however, is by definition an assembly of bishops (cf. c. 447). A plenary council involves the participation of many non-bishops, even nonclerics. An observation from the Praenotanda to the 1977 schema De Populo Dei seems apposite here: "But it seems necessary that at certain times a broader discussion be had concerning the necessities of the region or province, in which not only the bishops who are members of the episcopal conference, but also several others whom it appears impossible to invite to each and every meeting of the conference." Comm 4 (1972) 47–48. The document adverts to two distinct and important advantages of holding councils: (1) they allow a more comprehensive discussion of some issues than would be possible in the regular sessions of the conference; and (2) they provide for the participation of non-bishops whose in-conference is to decide on the need for celebrating a plenary council. The matter apparently can be addressed in the statutes of each conference.[58]

(c) The approval of the Holy See is necessary before a plenary council can be convoked.[59] The phrasing of the canon[60] implies that the approval of the Holy See must be concurrent with the judgment of the conference: just as the conference's authority over the council does not cease with convoking it, so the Holy See's authority is not exhausted by approving of the convocation. The 1917 code provided for continued Roman involvement in the conciliar process by requiring that a papal legate convoke and preside over the plenary council (cf. CIC 281). Although requiring the recognitio of the Holy See before enactments of a plenary council can be promulgated (cf. c. 446 and the commentary, below), the 1983 code does not make explicit provision for such continuing Roman involvement.[61]

§2. The norm established in §1 is valid also for the celebration of a provincial council in an ecclesiastical province whose boundaries coincide with the territory of a nation.

There are episcopal conferences whose individual territories comprise single provinces. Every provincial council in such a setting would, by the definition given in canon 439, §1, be a plenary council.[62] The convocation of such a particular council is governed by the rules for plenary councils rather than by the rules for provincial councils. Thus, the conference (in which auxiliary bishops and other titular bishops may have a vote—cf. c. 454, §2) rather than a majority of the diocesan bishops (cf. c. 440, §1) determines whether the council should be convoked; and the approval of the Holy See must be sought before its convocation.

Provincial Councils

Canon 440 — §1. A provincial council for the different particular churches of the same ecclesiasti-sights could not practically be made available during regular sessions of the conference. Neither of these values has lost its validity.

[58] This was the view of the coetus (Comm 14 [1982] 193). Without offering supporting arguments, Arrieta, in Pamplona ComEng, 335, implies instead that the provisions of c. 455, §2 would apply: the motion to call a plenary council would need the approval of a two-thirds majority of the voting members of the conference.

[59] The coetus expressed the matter forcefully: "The final decision about the necessity or usefulness of celebrating [plenary] councils . . . belongs to the Holy See." Comm 14 (1982) 192. The reason for this reservation is that the celebration of such a council "involves the exercise of supradiocesan power—especially legislative—which goes beyond the ambit of the power of the individual bishops or even the episcopal conference." Ibid.

[60] The requirement of Holy See approval is expressed as an ablative absolute using a present active participle indicating simultaneity between the activity of the Holy See (giving approval) and that of the conference (deeming the celebration of a council useful).

[61] Nor does the code make explicit provision for the participation in the council of the papal representative to the country for which the plenary council is being celebrated. When discussing the first draft of the canon on participants in particular councils, the coetus was unable to achieve consensus about the presence or the voting status of the papal legate. Cf. Comm 17 (1985) 100. The coetus apparently decided not to mention the legate's potential participation (cf. c. 193 of the 1977 schema). Because a papal representative would ordinarily be one of the "titular bishops who perform in the territory a special function" (cf. c. 443, §1, 3°), one might conclude that he should be invited and would enjoy a deliberative vote. On the other hand, unlike other titular bishops with special functions in the territory (cf. c. 450, §1), the papal legate is not by law a member of the episcopal conference (c. 450, §2). Thus, the other bishops who must be invited to the plenary council are de iure members of the conference. If the legislator had intended the legate, who was not a de iure member of the conference convoking the plenary council, to be the only de iure participant in that council, would he not have expressed his intention more clearly? Other commentators take no position on this question.

[62] Provost, "Particular Councils," 547, observes, "For provinces in approximately forty-eight nations, provincial councils are equivalent to plenary councils because the province and nation are coterminous." He also notes that "in forty-three nations it would be possible to have a national synod even though no provincial or plenary council could be held there, since there is only one diocese and it is coterminous with the national boundaries." The law makes no special provisions for this situation.

cal province is to be celebrated whenever it seems opportune in the judgment of the majority of the diocesan bishops of the province, without prejudice to can. 439, §2.

Canon 283 of the 1917 code, the source of this canon, required the celebration of a provincial council at least once every twenty years. It came from a long line of unfortunately futile laws mandating the frequent celebration of particular councils. This new canon leaves the decision about the celebration of a provincial council to the wisdom of a majority of the diocesan bishops of the province.[63] The canon implies a definition of a provincial council: an official gathering of representatives of all the particular churches within a single ecclesiastical province.

§2. When a metropolitan see is vacant, a provincial council is not to be convoked.

Canon 284 of the 1917 code envisaged the celebration of a provincial council when the metropolitan see was vacant or impeded. In that event, the suffragan who was most senior by reason of his appointment to a suffragan see assumed the responsibilities of the non-existent or incapacitated metropolitan. This new canon simply forbids the celebration of a provincial council when there is no metropolitan.

Authority over Particular Councils

Canon 441 — It is for the conference of bishops:
1° to convoke a plenary council;
2° to select the place to celebrate the council within the territory of the conference of bishops;
3° to select from among the diocesan bishops a president of the plenary council whom the Apostolic See must approve;
4° to determine the agenda and questions to be treated, set the opening and duration of a plenary council, transfer, extend, and dissolve it.

This canon, a conflation and reworking of material found in canons 281 and 288 of the 1917 code, details some[64] of the rights and the duties of the episcopal conference vis à vis a plenary council celebrated for its territory. According to the former code, the ordinaries of several provinces could petition the pope for permission to celebrate a plenary council. The pope would then appoint a legate to convoke and preside over the council. In the current law, it is the prerogative of the conference, after obtaining approval from the Holy See (c. 439, §1), to convoke the plenary council and to select its president (who must be a diocesan bishop and requires Roman approval).[65] The Pio-Benedictine Code authorized the president —i.e., the papal legate—to set the agenda and to open, transfer, prorogue, or end the council. These rights and duties now belong to the conference. While the decision to convoke the council, the selection of its site, the specification of its opening and (anticipated) closing sessions, and the election of the president might all take place before

[63] By virtue of c. 381, §2, territorial prelates, territorial abbots, apostolic vicars, apostolic prefects, and apostolic administrators appointed on a stable basis (c. 368) are included in the term diocesan bishops, as are diocesan administrators by virtue of c. 427, §1. Note, however, the different terminology in c. 442, §1: "with the consent of the majority of the suffragan bishops. . . ."

[64] V., 2. of the "Regulations for the II Plenary Synod" issued (with Roman approval) by the Polish Episcopal Conference lists other prerogatives of the conference—e.g., determining the composition of synodal commissions, supervising the work of those commissions, and the like (Ius Ecclesiae 5 [1993] 404–405). Hence, the list in c. 441 must represent a minimal description of the conference's authority, not the maximum extent of its scope.

[65] While commendably reflecting the English language's aversion to the passive voice, the translation of c. 441, 3° might give the impression that the canon imposes on the Holy See an obligation to approve the candidate. The Latin uses the gerundive: "praesidem . . . approbandum." The sense is that the candidate needs papal approval before he can function as president. The Holy See is quite free to reject the candidate.

the council begins, decisions about transferring it, prolonging its celebration, or ending it early could be made only during or between its sessions. It would therefore seem prudent for the conference to make provisions for going into plenary session should the situation of the plenary council so require.[66]

Canon 442 — §1. It is for the metropolitan with the consent of the majority of the suffragan bishops:

1° to convoke a provincial council;

2° to select the place to celebrate the provincial council within the territory of the province;

3° to determine the agenda and questions to be treated, set the opening and duration of the provincial council, transfer, extend, and dissolve it.

§2. It is for the metropolitan or, if he is legitimately impeded, a suffragan bishop elected by the other suffragan bishops to preside over a provincial council.

This canon, which reworks material found in canons 284 and 288 of the 1917 code, specifies the rights and duties of the metropolitan vis-à-vis a particular council for his province. There are a few significant differences between the codes.

(1) The 1917 code provided for the holding of a provincial council during the vacancy of the metropolitan see. In that event, the suffragan most senior in terms of appointment to a suffragan see had the right and duty to convoke the council, to determine where it would be celebrated, and to preside over the council (CIC 284). The 1983 code prohibits the celebration of a provincial council when the metropolitan see is vacant (c. 440, §2).

(2) The 1983 code allows the suffragans to elect the council president if the metropolitan is legitimately prevented from acting.[67] As has just been noted, the 1917 code prescribed that the senior suffragan would act in the absence or incapacity of the metropolitan (CIC 284).

(3) The 1917 code authorized the president, who might be the metropolitan or might be the senior suffragan, to set the agenda and open, transfer, prorogue, or end the council (CIC 288). The 1983 code attributes these rights and duties, not to the president, but to the metropolitan (c. 442, §1, 2° and 3°). If councils were celebrated more frequently, this change might occasion some difficulty: a metropolitan might convoke a provincial council, determine its venue, and set its agenda, but then fall sick. The suffragans could elect a president; but would he be able to extend the council for another session, transfer it to a more convenient locale, or conclude it earlier than anticipated? The senior suffragan unquestionably had this authority under the 1917 code. The 1983 code has achieved a stylistically more elegant formulation at the cost of leaving this question unanswered.

(4) The 1917 code did not require the consent of the suffragans before the metropolitan (or senior suffragan) convoked a council. Presumably, the requirement that a council be celebrated at least every twenty years (c. 283) was sufficient warrant for his acting. Before he determined its meeting place, however, the convoker needed to hear (not obtain the consent of) all who were obliged to participate with a deliberative vote (c. 284, 1°). Moreover, before the president determined the order of discussion, etc., he needed "the consent of the Fathers." In the new discipline the metropolitan requires the consent of the majority of the suffragans (who are not the only participants obliged to participate with deliberative vote) before doing any of this.[68]

[66] Cf. Section 1, 1, of the "Second Plenary Council of the Philippines Directory": "The Conference may exercise its pertinent prerogatives at any time even during the very celebration of the council. Hence, duly convoked, the Conference can legitimately meet emergency situations and respond to contingencies." Ius Ecclesiae 6 (1994) 814.

[67] Provost, in CLSA Com, 359, notes that "'legitimate' reasons are not necessarily physical; given the pastoral emphasis in the code, pastoral reasons may be sufficient for a metropolitan to consider himself legitimately impeded." One of the suffragans, for example, might be more able to cope with the demands of presiding or might be more skilled at doing so. Read, in CLSGBI Com, 242, points to the definition of an impeded see found in c. 412: the bishop is completely prevented from exercising his pastoral ministry because of imprisonment, banishment, exile, or incapacity. The canon adds a particular measure of the incapacity: the poor man is unable to communicate even by letter. Read does allow that ill-health might also prove an impediment. His conclusion, "if he is both willing and able to preside, then the suffragans cannot prevent him," is well-taken; but Provost's point —that a lesser incapacity might induce him to see himself as incapable—also deserves consideration.

(5) The 1917 code expressed some preference for the celebration of a provincial council in the metropolitan's see (metropolitana ecclesia ne negligatur). However, this preference has disappeared from the new code.

The current canon enhances the suffragans' responsibility for the preparation for and development of a provincial council. The metropolitan, except as the presiding officer during sessions, acts only in concert with his brother bishops. The provincial council is clearly not an instrument whereby the metropolitan accomplishes his own objectives, however praiseworthy. It is instead a vehicle whereby the leaders of all the particular churches in the province, with due regard for appropriate input from a representative cross-section of the members of their dioceses, exercise collectively their responsibility for the faithful.

Participants in Particular Councils

Canon 443 — §1. The following must be called to particular councils and have the right of a deliberative vote in them:

1° diocesan bishops;

2° coadjutor and auxiliary bishops;

3° other titular bishops who perform in the territory a special function committed to them by the Apostolic See or the conference of bishops.

§2. Other titular bishops, even retired ones, living in the territory can be called to particular councils; they also have the right of a deliberative vote.

§3. The following must be called to particular councils but with only a consultative vote:

1° the vicars general and episcopal vicars of all the particular churches in the territory;

2° major superiors of religious institutes and societies of apostolic life in a number for both men and women which the conference of bishops or the bishops of the province are to determine; these superiors are to be elected respectively by all the major superiors of the institutes and societies which have a seat in the territory;

3° rectors of ecclesiastical and Catholic universities and deans of faculties of theology and of canon law, which have a seat in the territory;

4° some rectors of major seminaries elected by the rectors of the seminaries which are located in the territory, in a number to be determined as in n. 2.

§4. Presbyters and other members of the Christian faithful can also be called to particular councils, but with only a consultative vote and in such a way that their number does not exceed half the number of those mentioned in §§1–3.

[68] While lucidly phrased, the canon leaves some room for puzzlement here. (1) The metropolitan is a diocesan bishop but not a suffragan bishop. Canon 440, §1 requires the celebration of a provincial council whenever a majority of the diocesan bishops of the province deems it opportune, but c. 442, §1 allows the metropolitan to convoke a provincial council only with the consent of a majority of the suffragan bishops. In a province containing an odd number of dioceses, the anomalous situation could arise in which c. 440, §1 would require the celebration of a council (because the metropolitan and half of the suffragans thought it prudent) but c. 442, §1 would not authorize the metropolitan to convoke it (because only half of the suffragans would consent). (2) A related question arises about those who are not diocesan bishops but who preside over particular churches. They are equivalent to diocesan bishops in law. One presumes that, although they are not "suffragan bishops," they should be included in the tally required by c. 442, §1. Read, in CLSGBI Com, 247, argues to the contrary: "The term suffragan Bishop must be understood as a corollary of the 'suffragan dioceses' of Can. 436. Territorial prelatures, vicariates and prefectures are not suffragan dioceses, even though they are linked to a province; thus, it would appear that the prelate, even if in fact a Bishop, does not have a voting right at this preliminary stage." Other commentators do not address this issue.

§5. Moreover, cathedral chapters and the presbyteral council and pastoral council of each particular church are to be invited to provincial councils in such a way that each of them sends two of their members designated collegially by them; however, they have only a consultative vote.

§6. Others can also be invited as guests to particular councils, if it is expedient in the judgment of the conference of bishops for a plenary council, or of the metropolitan together with the suffragan bishops for a provincial council.

The 1917 code dealt separately with participants in plenary (CIC 282) and provincial (CIC 286) councils. This canon lists those who must or may be invited to particular councils, allowing for adaptations to fit the circumstances.

The canon distinguishes participants (§§1–5) from guests (§6), participants who must be invited (§§1, 3, and 5) from participants who may be invited (§§2, 4), and participants who can both speak and vote (§§1–2) from participants who can speak but cannot vote (§§3–5).

The possibility of inviting guests was not considered in the 1917 code. Paragraph six may be a happy result of the experience of having observers at Vatican II and sessions of the synod of bishops. The text clearly distinguishes these guests (etiam alii) from the bishops, clerics, and lay persons who can be invited but have no legal right to be summoned. The conclusion seems inescapable that these guests are not to be regarded as participants in conciliar discussions.[69]

The only participants who can vote on questions the council seeks to answer are the bishops (§§1–2) and those—including administrators of vacant dioceses—who are legally equivalent to diocesan bishops. Voting is seen as so bound up with the bishop's leadership role that any bishop who is invited to participate must be allowed to vote. All other participants in a council have the right to speak, but not to vote.

The participants who must be invited to the council include at least representatives of all those who exercise a supervisory role over the pastoral activities of the Church within the territory for which the council is being celebrated. Thus, the list of those who must be invited includes all bishops who are officially ministering within the territory, all vicars general and other episcopal vicars, elected representatives of the major superiors of religious congregations "which have a seat in the territory," all rectors of Catholic and ecclesiastical universities and deans of faculties of theology and canon law, elected representatives of rectors of major seminaries in the territory, and two representatives from each cathedral chapter (where these exist), presbyteral council, and diocesan pastoral council within the territory. Even if only those who must be invited were invited to a particular council, it seems inevitable that there would be lay participation: among the members should be at least some representatives from religious congregations of women as well as some lay members of diocesan pastoral councils.

In addition, the council could invite the participation of retired bishops, bishops who, although actually within the territory, are not engaged in pastoral work there, and a restricted number[70] of priests[71] and lay persons.

[69] Provost, in CLSA Com, 361; also Read, in CLSGBI Com, 249. The latter prudently adds, "This does not, however, mean that they might not be invited to speak to the assembly if they would wish to do so; on the contrary, at least courtesy would require that they ought to be so invited and, if they accept, that their expressions of opinion or advice be given careful attention."

[70] The method of calculating their number is somewhat cumbersome. One adds the number of bishops, vicars, religious superiors, and academics (but not the number of representatives from cathedral chapters, presbyteral councils, and pastoral councils) and divides the sum by two. Fewer than that number may be invited. Although the commentaries do not analyze the reasons for limiting the number of additional participants, Provost, "Particular Councils," 549, does allude to "the danger of pressure groups attempting to take over a gathering."

[71] Canon 282, §3 of the 1917 code envisaged the invitation of religious or secular clerics—a broader term than

This canon suggests that a particular council will be a sizable gathering. If only those who must be invited are summoned, each diocese would send at least one bishop, one vicar general, two members of the priests' council, and two members of the pastoral council; and there would be religious and some academics as well. Moreover, the heterogeneous makeup of the council makes it evident that the council is a gathering of particular churches, not merely a gathering of the clergy who minister to those particular churches. Such widespread participation ought to ensure that the bishops who actually vote within the council will have a breadth and depth of information that otherwise might not be available to them.

Duties of Participants

Canon 444 — §1. All who are called to particular councils must attend them unless they are prevented by a just impediment, about which they are bound to inform the president of the council.

This canon, for which no exact parallel existed in the 1917 code, specifies two obligations incumbent on all who are invited to a particular council: (1) they must participate; and (2) if unable to participate because of a just impediment, they must inform the president of their reason for being absent.[72] Canon 286, §4 of the former code stated that invited major superiors of exempt religious or monastic congregations were obliged either to participate or to notify the council of their reason for non-attendance. Canon 289 forbade anyone who was obliged to participate in a council from leaving after it had begun unless he had proven either to the legate (in the case of a plenary council) or to the "Fathers" (in the case of a provincial council) his just reason for leaving. With respect to the right and duty to participate, the new code does not discriminate among participants. It thereby implies that the anticipated contributions of all the participants will be of great value. Invitations to a council are not arbitrary. Either the law itself (in the case of those who must be invited) or the bishops who are convoking the council (in the case of those who may be invited) consider the involvement of all the invited participants to be essential to the proper development of the conciliar process.[73]

Although the code's treatment of particular councils says nothing about the style of any member's participation, it may not be amiss to advert to canon 465 on the diocesan synod: "All proposed questions are subject to the free discussion of the members during sessions of the synod." This canon implies that all members of a diocesan synod have the right and the duty to contribute priests, especially within that discipline. According to c. 108, §1 of the former code, anyone who had received at least first tonsure was a cleric. On the assumption that the code does not want to exclude the participation of permanent deacons, one might urge that they, too, could be invited as participants.

[72] The canon provides that one might be excused from the obligation of participation in a council if prevented "by a just impediment." Read, in CLSGBI Com, 249, offers as examples of a "just impediment": "illness, a serious commitment which cannot without harm be abandoned or postponed, [or] an urgent personal or familial situation." The canon says nothing about joining the deliberations after the council has begun (i.e., after the impediment has ceased). Unlike the 1917 code (CIC 298), it has no stipulations with regard to leaving early.

[73] For Arrieta (in Pamplona ComEng, 337), non-voting participants in a council "do not properly exercise a function of governance as such; their votes are merely consultative." Two contrary observations come to mind. (1) Canon 129, §2, states that "lay members of the Christian faithful can cooperate in the exercise of [the] power" of governance. According to c. 445, the particular council (not just certain members of it) enjoys the power of governance. Does not this imply that all of the members of such a council at least "cooperate in the exercise" of this same power? (2) Much more is involved in reaching a decision than simply making the choice. Cf. R. Kennedy, "Shared Responsibility in Ecclesial Decision Making," Stud Can 14 (1980) 5–23. To speak of the participation of non-voting members as "merely consultative" surely undermines the influence of background research, the formulation of proposals, the expression of arguments, and the like. See the balanced exposition in Provost, "Particular Councils," 549–550.

freely and intelligently to the discussion of all issues on the agenda. If the Christian faithful generally enjoy the right "to make known to the pastors of the Church their needs, especially spiritual ones, and their desires" (c. 212, §2), this right becomes particularly urgent within a council whose very purpose is to make "provision... for the pastoral needs of the people of God" (c. 445). Canon 212, §3 goes further: "According to the knowledge, competence, and prestige which they possess, they have the right and even at times the duty to manifest to the sacred pastors their opinion on matters which pertain to the good of the Church." From the fact that they have been invited to a particular council, one must infer that all the participants have the requisite "knowledge, competence, and prestige" and that they therefore have both the right and the duty to contribute freely to the conciliar discussions.[74]

§2. Those who are called to particular councils and have a deliberative vote in them can send a proxy if they are prevented by a just impediment; the proxy has only a consultative vote.

Although the cooperation of all the members of a particular council is important, the role of those whose vote determines the outcome is decisive. As noted above, the only voting members of a council are bishops or those legally equivalent to diocesan bishops. Not only are they presumably exceptionally gifted with faith, zeal, wisdom, and the like (cf. c. 378, §1, 1°), and not only are they endowed by episcopal ordination with a peculiar charism for guiding the flock, but they also, as chief shepherds of particular churches or titular bishops charged with other pastoral responsibilities within the territory, will be responsible for implementing the decisions of the council. This canon accordingly recognizes the special importance of the input from bishops. It allows the bishop who is invited to a council but unable to attend to send a proxy.[75] The proxy may speak and may therefore convey to the council the insights of the absent bishop, but he or she may not vote.[76]

Authority of Particular Councils

Canon 445 — A particular council, for its own territory, takes care that provision is made for the pastoral needs of the people of God and possesses the power of governance, especially legislative power, so that, always without prejudice to the universal law of the Church, it is able to decide what seems opportune for the increase of the faith, the organization of common pastoral action, and the regulation of morals and of the common ecclesiastical discipline which is to be observed, promoted, and protected.

This canon expresses more forcefully than canon 290 of the 1917 code the primary responsibility of a particular council and the authority it enjoys to fulfill that responsibility. The responsibility is stated in general terms: the council "takes care that provision is made for the pastoral needs of the people of God." One might broadly categorize such necessities as the Word, the sacraments, and good order; or one might look at the goods to which the faithful have a legally recognized right (see, for example, cc. 213, 214, 217, etc.). The point is that the purposes of a particular council are conceived in the broadest possible terms. The canon indicates two limitations: (a) the direct concern of the council is the territory for which the council was convoked; and (b) the universal laws of the Church may limit the options the council considers.

[74] Canon 127, §3 appears to be a parallel canon: "All those whose consent or counsel is required [before a superior places a juridic act] are obliged to offer their opinion sincerely."

[75] The canon prescribes no necessary qualifications for serving as a proxy. It does not, in other words, exclude non-bishops or even non-clerics from assuming this function.

[76] In denying a deliberative vote to the proxy, the canon echoes c. 287, §2 of the 1917 code. The coetus apparently agreed with its secretary's fear that it might be somehow dangerous to give proxies a deliberative vote (Comm 12 [1980] 261). The commentaries do not analyze the reason for not allowing proxies to vote. The canon does not distinguish between proxies who are bishops (e.g., a retired auxiliary representing a diocesan bishop) and proxies who are not. Presumably it would make such a distinction if the lack of episcopal character were the reason for not allowing the proxies to vote.

To meet these broad obligations the council has equally broad powers. It enjoys "the power of governance, especially legislative power."[77] Regimen, literally, "governmental power," is that species of the sacred power with which the Church is endowed which functions primarily in the external forum (c. 130) and supports the Church's ministry of ruling/serving.[78] Canon 135, §1 divides governmental power into legislative, executive, and judicial power. Councils have historically fulfilled a variety of governmental functions, including judicial; but they have been especially effective as legislative bodies. According to this canon, a particular council enjoys the sacred power necessary to do whatever seems appropriate: (a) to foster the growth of faith; (b) to coordinate common pastoral action; and (c) to preserve the good order and moral health of the community.[79] This phrasing of the council's aims is considerably more positive than the one found in canon 290 of the 1917 code: "to moderate morals, to correct abuses, to resolve controversies, and to preserve or bring about one and the same discipline." Councils have effectively corrected abuses and resolved controversies; but they might also be summoned, not to fix what is broken, but to foster conditions in which an already healthy community might become still more vital.

Conciliar Decrees

Canon 446 — When a particular council has ended, the president is to take care that all the acts of the council are sent to the Apostolic See. Decrees issued by a council are not to be promulgated until the Apostolic See has reviewed them. It is for the council itself to define the manner of promulgation of the decrees and the time when the promulgated decrees begin to oblige.

This slight revision of canon 291, §1 of the 1917 code[80] contains three somewhat related clauses.

(1) It imposes on the president an obligation to forward to the Holy See all of the acts of the council. This requirement can be viewed as an attempt on the part of the Holy See to oversee the activities of bishops. It can also be seen as a recognition of communion: what happens in every particular [77] It is interesting that c. 447, concerning the nature and purpose of the episcopal conference, speaks of "pastoral functions" (munera...pastoralia) rather than governmental power. By the same token, c. 455 tightly circumscribes the legislative capacity of the conference.

[78] Particular councils have also issued authoritative teachings, as c. 753 recognizes (cf. the commentary), but one may question whether authentic teaching is an exercise of governmental power: "In the church there is an authority to teach, a doctrinal authority; it is the authority to proclaim the Word. In the Church there is also an authority to impose an action, which is mostly known under the name of juridical authority. The task of the former is to communicate knowledge that saves; the task of the latter is to establish well-measured balances in the community...so that all can live, pray, and work in peace.... There is a radical difference between affirming the truth and imposing an action." L. Örsy, "Teaching Authority of Episcopal Conferences," in Episcopal Conferences: Historical, Canonical and Theological Studies, ed. T. Reese (Washington, D.C.: Georgetown University, 1989) 241.

[79] The canons dealing with an ecumenical council (cc. 337–341) contain no description of the scope of that institute's authority. A parallel canon concerning the diocesan synod (c. 460) provides a similarly vague description of its purposes: to "offer assistance to the diocesan bishop for the good of the whole diocesan community."

[80] Canon 290, §2 of the 1917 code was suppressed. Its first clause stated the obvious: that the laws made by a particular council bind everywhere within the territory (cf. c. 12, §3). Its second clause denied to local ordinaries the power to dispense from them "except in particular cases and for a just cause." Canon 87, §1 of the current code already provides that the diocesan bishop, "whenever he judges that it contributes to their spiritual good," can dispense the faithful from such laws."

church is of interest to other particular churches, and particular churches most easily reinforce their communion with each other by tending to their communion with the church of Rome.

(2) The canon requires a recognitio from the Holy See before any laws issued by the particular council can be promulgated.[81] If universal law limits the legislative competence of a particular council, then someone needs to review the proposed legislation of a particular council to ensure that it does not conflict with universal law.[82] Because a particular council does not enjoy the power to legislate against the universal law of the Church, any attempted enactments of this sort would be invalid. Thus, the request for recognitio can eliminate the danger of invalid legislation.

(3) The canon recognizes the right and duty of the particular council to determine how its laws should be promulgated and when (after their promulgation) they should become effective. The act of promulgation gives birth to a law as law (c. 7). Because the council rather than the Holy See promulgates the law, the recognitio does not translate a conciliar decree into papal legislation. A particular council does not propose that the pope legislate on certain questions affecting the pertinent particular churches but prepares such legislation on its own initiative. Once the proper dicastery has given its recognitio, the council promulgates its own decrees. They remain, from first to last, conciliar rather than papal acts.[83]

CHAPTER IV
CONFERENCES OF BISHOPS
[cc. 447–459]

Nearly one hundred fifty years ago Belgium's bishops began meeting regularly at the archbishop's residence in Mechlin.[84] Thus, without further [81] For a balanced and thorough analysis of the recognitio, cf. J. Manzanares, "Papal Reservation and Recognitio: Considerations and Proposals," J 52 (1992) 228–254, especially 234–239. The author argues that the institute ensures that the decrees of a particular council will be free from error and not imprudent or harmful to the universal Church (235).

[82] Provost (in CLSA Com, 362, and "Particular Councils," 554–555) sketches some serious difficulties that have emerged from the recognitio process. "It has also been used," he reports, "for other purposes, including that of imposing on local churches a discipline which they themselves had not voted to assume" (CLSA Com, 362). This would appear to constitute a perversion of the institute. Recognitio can safeguard the communion of the universal Church by preventing one group of particular churches from adopting practices that would be disruptive of the harmony of the whole; such is the value the law seems designed to serve. However, using the process to impose on the faithful practices they did not dream of assuming is likely to provoke disharmony between the universal Church and the pertinent group of particular churches.

[83] The laws would not begin to bind until the vacatio legis has elapsed (i.e., one month from the date of promulgation, unless the law itself determines otherwise). See the commentary on c. 8, §2. Unless the law in question was a personal law or its violation would cause harm in their own territory (cf. c. 13, §2, 1°), travelers are not bound by the council's legislation when they are away from the territory under the council's jurisdiction (cf. c. 12, §3). See the pertinent commentary on the canons on ecclesiastical laws.

[84] Easily accessible histories of episcopal conferences include: Provost, in CLSA Com, 363–364; P. Huizing, "The Structure of Episcopal Conferences," J 28 (1968) 163–176; R. Kutner, The Development, Structure, and Competence of the Episcopal Conference (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1972) 1–64. Good accounts of the particular councils which performed similar functions earlier are: H.-J. Sieben, "Episcopal Conferences in Light of Particular Councils during the First Millennium," J 48 (1988) 30–56; A. García y García, "Episcopal Conferences in Light of Particular Councils during the Second Millennium," J 48 (1988) 57–67; B. Daley, "Structures of Charity: Bishops' Gatherings and the See of Rome in the Early Church," in Reese, Episcopal Conferences, 25–58. Good accounts of the history of the NCCB include E. McKeon, "The National Bishops' Conference: an Analysis of Its Origins," Catholic Historical Review 66 (1980) 565–583; G. Fogarty, "The Authority of the National Catholic Welfare Conference," in Reese, Episcopal Conferences, 85–103; E. McKeon, "The 'National Idea' in the History of the American Episcopal Conference," in Reese, Episcopal Conferences, 59–84.

ado, began what evolved into the episcopal conference. Within a few years the bishops of Germany, of Bavaria, of Austria, of Italy, and of Ireland were following suit. Often with explicit papal encouragement, such national assemblies of bishops became widespread in the late nineteenth century. Changing circumstances—revolutions, economic dislocations, the dominance of secular liberalism, etc.—posed problems for which bishops sought common solutions; and these gatherings provided a convenient forum for exchanging information and opinions on such problems. Given their fortunate experience of this institute which had developed without specific legal warrant, it is not surprising that the Fathers of Vatican II chose to give formal status to the conference:

> Nowadays especially, bishops are frequently unable to fulfill their office suitably and fruitfully unless they work more harmoniously and closely every day with other bishops. Episcopal conferences, already established in many nations, have furnished outstanding proofs of more fruitful apostolate. Therefore, this most sacred Synod considers it supremely opportune everywhere that bishops belonging to the same nation or region form an association and meet together at fixed times. Thus, when the insights of prudence and experience have been shared and views exchanged, there will emerge a holy union of energies in the service of the common good of the churches.[85]

Although there was widespread agreement about the good conferences could do, there was no unanimity about other issues such as their theological status.[86] Good laws should reflect sound theological reflection, but a canonical commentary is not the place to discuss controversies concerning the theological status of the institute[87] or the limits of its teaching authority[88] or other more technical questions.[89] Suffice it to say that two sources of suspicion of the conference have left their fingerprints on the canons of this chapter. On the one hand, there is fear that conferences might become seedbeds of nationalism or other attempts to undermine papal authority over the universal Church. On the other hand, there is [85] CD 37; AAS 58 (1966) 693. ES I, 41, §1 required that conferences be quickly (quam cito) established where they were not in existence.

[86] Cf. A. Antón, "The Theological 'Status' of Episcopal Conferences," J 48 (1988) 185–186: "It can appear paradoxical that on the one hand there is a general consensus . . . in affirming the 'pastoral usefulness' or even more the 'necessity' of episcopal conferences for the Church in the present circumstances and on the other hand there is a great disparity of opinions when it is a question of clarifying their theological status more precisely."

[87] See John Paul II, aplett Apostolos suos, May 21, 1998, Origins 28 (1998) 152. See also R. Lettmann, "Episcopal Conferences in the New Canon Law," Stud Can 14 (1980) 349–355; J. Komonchak, "Episcopal Conferences," CS 27 (1988) 311–328; A. Antón, 185–212, with a comprehensive bibliography on 213–219.

[88] Thoughtful essays on this issue include J. Manzanares, "The Teaching Authority of Episcopal Conferences," J 48 (1988) 234–263; A. Dulles, "Doctrinal Authority of Episcopal Conferences," in Reese, Episcopal Conferences, 207–232; L. Örsy, "Teaching Authority of Episcopal Conferences," in Reese, Episcopal Conferences, 233–252; J. Green, Conferences of Bishops and the Exercise of the Munus Docendi of the Church (Rome: Gregorian University, 1987); T. Green, "The Church's Teaching Mission: Some Aspects of the Normative Role of Episcopal Conferences," Stud Can 27 (1993) 23–57.

[89] The Final Report of the 1985 Second Extraordinary Assembly of the Synod of Bishops called for further study of the nature and authority of episcopal conferences (cf. Origins 15 [1985] 449: "It is hoped that the study of their theological 'status' and above all the problem of their doctrinal authority might be made explicit in a deeper and more extensive way"). In response, the CFB prepared a "working paper" (instrumentum laboris) which was circulated in 1988 (cf. Origins 17 [1988] 731–737). Some sense of the complexity of the questions involved emerges from reviewing this document in conjunction with the excellent collection in Reese, Episcopal Conferences and the papers from the Salamanca colloquium on the nature of episcopal conferences (J 48 [1988] 1–407).

concern that the conferences might unduly limit the divine law authority each bishop enjoys within his own diocese.

The thirteen canons in this chapter are not easy to outline. Canon 447 provides a descriptive definition of the conference. Canon 449 indicates how the conference comes into being. Canons 448 and 450 discuss the makeup of the conference, territorially and personally. Canon 451 requires each conference to prepare its own statutes and provides some guidelines about their contents. Canons 452, 457, and 458 deal with officers each conference must have. Canons 453 through 456 treat the plenary session of the conference, prescribing its minimum frequency, the voting rights of some members, the limits of its legislative authority, and the aftermath of its deliberations. Canon 459 discusses the implications of interactions among conferences.

Christus Dominus 38 is the source from which most of these canons were quarried. Some few modifications were inspired by general legal principles and by attempts to quiet fears of the conference's potential influence. Although the law envisages the participation in the conference by Eastern hierarchs, the institute has evolved as a creature of the Latin church;[90] and although there are certain similarities between conferences and Eastern patriarchal synods, there are no exact parallels for these canons in the Eastern code.

Definition

Canon 447 — A conference of bishops, a permanent institution, is a group of bishops of some nation or certain territory who jointly exercise certain pastoral functions for the Christian faithful of their territory in order to promote the greater good which the Church offers to humanity, especially through forms and programs of the apostolate fittingly adapted to the circumstances of time and place, according to the norm of law.

This canon is derived almost verbatim from Christus Dominus 38, 1: "An episcopal conference is a kind of council in which the bishops of a given nation or territory jointly exercise their pastoral office by way of promoting that greater good which the Church offers mankind, especially through forms and programs of the apostolate which are fittingly adapted to the circumstances of the age."[91] The canon slightly modifies the conciliar text.

(1) Unlike Christus Dominus it classifies the conference as a permanent institution. Canon 449, §2 states that a legitimately erected conference enjoys juridic personality ipso iure, and every juridic person is perpetual by nature (c. 120, §1). During the revision process, there arose a question regarding how an institute that exists only when its members are meeting could be called permanent. The secretary of the drafting committee replied that a conference is permanent because it has a permanent secretariat and standing commissions.[92]

(2) Unlike Christus Dominus, the canon mentions "the Christian faithful of their territory" as the beneficiaries of the bishops' pastoral ministry. Canon 383, §3, however, directs the diocesan bishop to conduct himself with humanitas and love toward his sisters and brothers who are not in full communion with the Catholic Church. Canon 383, §4 commends to his loving attention the unbaptized who live within his territory. At least indirectly, non-Catholics are subjects of an individual bishop's pastoral concern; and canon 447 surely does not intend to deny episcopal conferences the right and duty to minister to them.

(3) The canon qualifies the purpose of the conference with the phrase ad normam iuris—"according to the norm of law." The qualification might have no particular meaning: every legal institute acts according to the law. It might also reflect a concern to prevent the conference from enjoying too broad a governmental competency, especially in legislative areas.[93]

[90] ApS, n. 1, explicitly differentiates between Eastern synods and episcopal conferences: "The Oriental Churches headed by Patriarchs and Major Archbishops are governed by their respective Synods of Bishops, endowed with legislative, judicial and, in certain cases, administrative power... the present document does not deal with these. Hence, no analogy may be drawn between such Synods and episcopal Conferences."

[91] AAS 70 (1968) 693.

[92] Comm 12 (1980) 263. See Arrieta, in Pamplona ComEng, 339.

The canon is a lengthy, densely packed definition. It states what a conference is: a permanent assembly of the bishops from a defined territory. It indicates what the bishops do: they collaborate in meeting the needs of their flocks.[94] It gives the reason for their doing so: they wish to promote, not just the "common good" which earthly governments seek, but the greater good—the salvation of souls (cf. c. 1752)—which the Church offers to all. It prescribes the method they adopt in pursuing their goals: they accommodate their pastoral activities to changing circumstances of time and place. The canon does not describe the nature or the limits of the legislative power of this institute. These matters are dealt with in canon 455.

Territorial Limits

Canon 448 — §1. As a general rule, a conference of bishops includes those who preside over all the particular churches of the same nation, according to the norm of can. 450.

§2. If, however, in the judgment of the Apostolic See, having heard the diocesan bishops concerned, the circumstances of persons or things suggest it, a conference of bishops can be erected for a territory of lesser or greater area, so that it only includes either bishops of some particular churches constituted in a certain territory or those who preside over particular churches in different nations. It is for the Apostolic See to establish special norms for each of them.

The preceding canon left unanswered two important questions about the make-up of the conference: who are included in the term bishops (coetus episcoporum), and what are the limits of the territory from which they come? This canon, inspired by Christus Dominus 38, 2, answers the second question. Canon 450 answers the first.

Paragraph one prescribes a rule to which paragraph two allows an exception. A conference usually consists of the chief shepherds of all and only the particular churches of a single nation. Canon 450, §1 indicates the persons to be included in the category "those who preside over... particular churches."

There are two possible deviations from the general rule: (a) a conference might include some rather than all the diocesan bishops in a given nation; or (b) a conference might include the diocesan bishops of more than one nation. Paragraph two allows the erection of an episcopal conference for only some of the bishops of a nation (e.g., Puerto Rico, England and Wales) and for the bishops of more than one nation (e.g., Gambia, Liberia, and Sierra Leone).[95] Christus Dominus 38, 5 allowed the bishops of more than one nation to establish a single conference with papal approval. The code, by contrast, reserves to the Holy See the authority to establish, suppress, or alter episcopal conferences (cf. c. 449, §1). Hence, this canon attributes to the Holy See rather than to the concerned bishops the prerogative of deciding that the circumstances of the particular churches in question suggest not following national boundaries in determining the membership of the episcopal conference. The canon allows the Holy See wide latitude in making this determination: "si adiuncta id suadeant"—"if the circumstances so suggest"—not a particularly strong condition. The canon does prescribe that the affected bishops be consulted beforehand. This requirement recognizes that these men should be extremely well-informed about the "circumstances of persons or things" which justify the exceptional structuring of the conference in question.

[93] The coetus was unanimous in not wanting the conference to develop into an intrusive bureaucracy—a curia between the diocesan curia and the Roman Curia. Cf. Comm 12 (1980) 263. Even as late as the 1980 schema bishops were worrying that the powers of the conference might unduly limit the legitimate authority of the individual bishops. Cf. Comm 14 (1982) 195–196.

[94] Arrieta, in Pamplona ComEng, 339, writes that "conferences of bishops should not only be conceived as bodies of legislative centralization and collective power of governance..., but as organs enabling bishops to cooperate in their ministry... so that their individual responsibility may be better fulfilled through the counsel and experiences of others." He rightly warns against a preoccupation with issues of power to the exclusion of issues of service. Similarly, Gutiérrez, 356, stresses that the purpose of the conference is to express communio. It facilitates an exchange of views and experiences among bishops so that each might better exercise his own authority in his own diocese.

[95] See Provost, "Particular Councils," 546, n. 33, for a list of conferences transcending national boundaries.

Establishment and Legal Nature

Canon 449 — §1. It is only for the supreme authority of the Church to erect, suppress, or alter conferences of bishops, after having heard the bishops concerned.

The probable inspiration for this canon was canon 251, §1 of the 1917 code: "It is the sole prerogative of the supreme ecclesiastical power to erect, otherwise circumscribe, divide, unite, and/or suppress ecclesiastical provinces, dioceses, abbacies, and prelatures nullius, apostolic vicariates, and apostolic prefectures." The code has described the episcopal conference as a vehicle for the exercise of episcopal munera. Establishing, suppressing, or changing conferences is one way in which the supreme power coordinates the exercise of episcopal power for the good of the universal Church.[96]

§2. A legitimately erected conference of bishops possesses juridic personality by the law itself.

Without a forerunner in the 1917 code, this canon has parallels in canons 432, §2 (concerning ecclesiastical provinces) and 373 (concerning the diocese). The episcopal conference quite clearly fits the definition of a public juridic person: it is established by competent ecclesiastical authority (the Holy See) to fulfill in the name of the Church specific tasks entrusted to it for the public good (cf. c. 116, §1). Unlike such public juridic persons as a diocese or a religious congregation, however, the conference is not always "there"—i.e., it is not permanently in session. Between its assemblies one should think of the conference's legal personality as carried by its president, its general secretariat, its permanent council of bishops, and its various commissions.

Membership

Canon 450 — §1. To a conference of bishops belong by the law itself all diocesan bishops in the territory, those equivalent to them in law, coadjutor bishops, auxiliary bishops, and other titular bishops who perform in the same territory a special function entrusted to them by the Apostolic See or conference of bishops. Ordinaries of another rite can also be invited though in such a way that they have only a consultative vote unless the statutes of the conference of bishops decree otherwise.

§2. Other titular bishops and the legate of the Roman Pontiff are not by law members of a conference of bishops.

Derived from Christus Dominus 38, 2, this canon answers the question, who are included in the term bishops in the definition of the conference (coetus episcoporum)? By law the conference includes all those who preside over particular churches[97] of the Latin church, all coadjutor bishops (auxiliary bishops with the right of succession—c. 403, §3), all auxiliary bishops (titular bishops

[96] Cf. Read, in CLSGBI Com, 251: "Although the origins of the Bishops' Conference lie in the spontaneous collaboration and communication between neighboring Bishops, the authority to establish, suppress, or alter the composition of these Conferences is reserved exclusively to the Holy See." Of course, the law did not recognize the "spontaneous gatherings" as subjects of regimen. Now that the conferences are seen as exercising sacred power, however, the Holy See is understandably concerned with coordinating their activity.

[97] Arrieta, in Pamplona ComEng, 341, following c. 427, §1, notes that the diocesan administrator would be an ipso iure member of the conference.

appointed to assist a diocesan bishop in meeting the pastoral needs of the diocese—c. 403, §1), and all other titular bishops who have been entrusted either by the Holy See or by the conference itself with specific ministries within the territory.[98] Christus Dominus 38, 2 included within the de iure membership the local ordinaries of other rites. The code allows the conference to invite the participation of Eastern hierarchs and to determine their voting status.[99] The code's more circumspect approach[100] seems prudent, especially inasmuch as the conference has certain liturgical responsibilities (cf. cc. 838, §3; 851, 1°; 891; etc.) in the fulfillment of which Eastern pastors[101] might not wish to participate.

With the exception of non-bishops who preside over particular churches and are therefore on the same legal footing as bishops (cf. c. 381, §2), the canon says nothing about participation in the conference by non-bishops. If the conference is a coetus episcoporum, it is logical not to expect non-bishops to be members; but if the conference is, as suggested by the rubric of this title of the code, a coetus ecclesiarum particularium, its membership should include more than just the chief shepherds.[102] According to an authentic interpretation of Christus Dominus 38, §2, priests, religious, and lay persons can be invited to participate in the conference, if the statutes so provide, "but only in individual matters and cases and with only a consultative vote."[103] This interpretation parallels the provisions of canon 443, §§3–5, concerning the kind of participation in particular councils allowed to non-bishops.

Paragraph two does not forbid a conference from inviting the participation of papal legates[104]

[98] Read, in CLSGBI Com, 252 helpfully suggests that two factors determine ipso iure membership in the conference: episcopal ordination and an office involving governing. "Of the two, the more significant is that of pastoral office; some titular Bishops, although obviously in episcopal orders, need not be invited... whereas a non-episcopal, territorial prelate or abbot has a right to attend with a deliberative vote."

[99] According to Article II, a), 1) of the Statutes of the NCCB, all diocesan bishops, coadjutors, and auxiliaries of any rite are de iure members of the conference. Eastern bishops can speak but cannot vote and are not counted as part of the quorum when questions affecting only the Latin church are being decided (Article IV, b). The Statutes of the Bishops' Conference of England and Wales invite the Apostolic Exarch for Ukrainians to accept membership (Article 3), but apparently without vote (cf. Articles 6 and 7). Article 2, 2) of the Statutes of the German Bishops' Conference offers consultative membership to those who preside over particular churches of the various Eastern churches sui iuris.

[100] This canon differs both from the conciliar decree and from the norm concerning episcopal participation in particular councils. According to c. 443, §2, any bishop invited to participate in a council has the right to a deliberative vote.

[101] Read, in CLSGBI Com, 252, sees "no reason why [Eastern] auxiliaries or titular Bishops" should not be invited. He cautions, however, that the conference "is essentially an institution for cooperation among Bishops belonging to the Latin Rite."

[102] J. Zizioulas, an Orthodox metropolitan, would argue to the contrary that the conference would function more clearly as a gathering of particular churches if its voting membership were restricted to diocesan bishops. He points to modern Orthodox synods in which only diocesan bishops take part but which are understood as gatherings of churches through their bishops. Cf. J. Zizioulas, "The Institution of Episcopal Conferences: An Orthodox Reflection," J 48 (1988) 377–378. His argument has many points of contact with the justification R. Castillo Lara offers for not allowing an auxiliary bishop to serve as president of an episcopal conference. Cf. R. Castillo Lara, 95–97.

[103] AAS 62 (1970) 793; CLD 7, 292. Arrieta, in Pamplona ComEng, 341 regards these non-bishops as guests. However, c. 443, §§4 and 6, a parallel canon concerning particular councils (cf. cc. 17 and 19), clearly distinguishes between non-episcopal, non-voting participants, on the one hand, and guests, on the other. Unlike such guests at particular councils, non-episcopal participants in a conference could have a consultative vote.

[104] Arrieta, in Pamplona ComEng, 341 points out that the papal legate "will attend the first meeting of each plenary session... and will be entitled to attend others if he is invited... or is sent by the Apostolic See (cf. Comm 17 [1985] 100)"; but his citation from Comm documents a coetus discussion of the participation of the papal legate in particular councils. Actual practice is diverse. According to Article VII of the NCCB Statutes, the pro-nuncio is welcome to attend all plenary sessions and should be invited to speak. The Statutes of the German Bishops' Conor other titular bishops: the statutes may extend such an invitation and may even endow these prelates with a deliberative vote. The paragraph merely denies that prelates not mentioned in §1 have a legal right to participate in the conference.

Statutes

Canon 451 — Each conference of bishops is to prepare its own statutes which must be reviewed by the Apostolic See and which are to organize, among other things, the plenary meetings of the conference which are to be held and to provide for a permanent council of bishops, a general secretariat of the conference, and also other offices and commissions which, in the judgment of the conference, more effectively help it to achieve its purpose.

Canon 449, §2 provides that every legitimately erected episcopal conference enjoys legal personality. In the light of canon 116, §1, the conference must be a public juridic person: having been erected by competent authority, it has a specific mission concerning the public good which it fulfills in the name of the Church. Hence, in accordance with canon 117, it must have statutes that are approved by the proper ecclesiastical authority. Canon 451 applies to episcopal conferences the general norm of action applicable to all similar legal institutes: each conference is responsible for preparing its own statutes. Canon 454, §§1–2 prescribes that only diocesan bishops, those equivalent to them in law, and coadjutors can vote on proposed statutes or amendments to them.

According to canon 94, §1, statutes define the "purpose, constitution, government, and methods of operation" of an organization. They bind all and only the members of the organization in question (c. 94, §2). Canon 451 specifies more exactly the necessary contents of the statutes of an episcopal conference.[105] The purpose of the conference is already described in canon 447, the provisions of which tend to be echoed in various statutes. The establishment of the conference belongs to the supreme authority in the Church (c. 449, §1). The decree of erection would indicate territorial limits on membership—whether the conference in question included all or only some of the chief shepherds of particular churches within a given country, or whether it included all or only some of the chief shepherds of several neighboring countries (c. 448). The statutes themselves would have to determine whether ordinaries of Eastern sui iuris churches, titular bishops who are not coadjutors or auxiliaries, and papal legates are also members. The statutes would also determine whether auxiliary bishops and other titular bishops should enjoy a consultative or a deliberative vote (c. 454, §2) and whether ordinaries of Eastern sui iuris churches should have a deliberative vote (c. 450, §1). With respect to the government of the conference, canon 451 requires every conference to have a permanent council of bishops and a general secretary.[106] Canon 452, §1 requires the conference to have an elected president and a properly designated person to act in his stead when he is lawfully impeded. The conference may have additional officers and commissions, in which case the statutes must describe them. The statutes would need to determine how these officers are selected, what their terms of office are, what their duties are, and so on. With respect to procedures, canons 451 and 453 insist that the statutes contain provisions governing plenary sessions of the conference.

ference (Article 2, §2) require inviting the papal nuncio to the opening session. The Statutes of the Bishops' Conference of England and Wales provide for the pro-nuncio's attendance at "at least one session" of each plenary assembly (Article 4). Article 7, §2 of the statutes of the CCCB prescribes that "the conference invites the Pro Nuncio to meet the Members and address the meeting."

[105] Article 4 of ApS requires the statutes to take cognizance of that aplett's norms governing the issuing of doctrinal statements.

[106] CD 38, 3 had listed a general secretary, a permanent council of bishops, and episcopal commissions as examples of offices that might aid a conference in fulfilling its mission.

The drafting of these statutes obviously requires considerable care. Canon 451 indicates that the statutes must be reviewed by the Holy See. According to article 82 of Pastor bonus, the Congregation for Bishops is the dicastery responsible for giving the necessary recognitio for conferences in non-missionary territories. Pastor bonus 89 indicates that the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples fulfills this function for conferences in mission territories.[107] The Pontifical Council for the Interpretation of Legislative Texts provides these congregations beforehand with a juridic evaluation of the proposed statutes (PB 157).[108] J. Gutiérrez reports that most conferences receive only a five-year approval for their statutes. The consequent periodic review of the statutes can facilitate a conference's more adequate adaptation to its particular situation.[109]

Officers

Canon 452 — §1. Each conference of bishops is to elect a president for itself, is to determine who is to perform the function of pro-president when the president is legitimately impeded, and is to designate a general secretary, according to the norm of the statutes.

§2. The president of a conference, and, when he is legitimately impeded, the pro-president, preside not only over the general meetings of the conference of bishops but also over the permanent council.

Although universal law allows the conference wide latitude in determining its own structures and procedures, this new canon establishes certain requirements with respect to its officers.

(1) The code requires each conference to have a president. In addition to the prerogatives and responsibilities with which the statutes endow him, he has the right and duty of: (a) presiding at plenary sessions; (b) presiding at sessions of the permanent council of bishops; (c) transmitting to the Holy See, after each plenary session, the minutes of the session and any general decrees issued by that session (c. 456). The canon requires that the president be elected. Unless the statutes provide otherwise, the provisions of canons 164–179 would govern the election. According to a May 23, 1988 authentic interpretation issued by the Pontifical Council for the Interpretation of Legislative Texts, an auxiliary bishop cannot be elected president of an episcopal conference.[110] The statutes would also indicate how the president would legally represent the conference as a juridic person (c. 118).

(2) Lest the work of the conference cease during the president's sickness or other incapacity, the statutes must make provision for someone to exercise his functions when he is legitimately impeded. The canon does not require that the conference have an office of vice-president, much less that its incumbent be elected. A conference could conceivably choose to allow the immediate past president or the senior diocesan (arch)bishop or the general secretary (if otherwise qualified) or the primate to fulfill these tasks.[111] The May 23, 1988 authentic interpretation cited immediately

[107] Gutiérrez, 358 mentions the CEC as well; but is not the episcopal conference an institute of the Latin church?

[108] For a discussion of the procedure, cf. I. Žužek, "Authentic Interpretation," CLSAP 57 (1995) 71.

[109] Cf. Gutiérrez, 358. As of this writing, the process of revising the statutes and by-laws of the NCCB has begun, but no changes will be effective for several years (private communication from Sister Sharon Euart, RSM, Associate General Secretary of the NCCB).

[110] AAS 81 (1989) 388; CLD 7, 292. Cf. also R. Castillo Lara, 94–98. The argument adopted by the council runs roughly as follows. The episcopal conference is by nature concerned with the coordination of the pastoral functions of the bishops of its territory. But an auxiliary bishop as such does not enjoy any personal pastoral responsibility in the diocese. Therefore he is not a "pleno iure" member of the conference (96). Because the president of the conference is the personal representative of the conference, and because he exercises such important responsibilities on its behalf (96), it is inappropriate (97) to allow an auxiliary to occupy that office. For a respectful critique of these arguments, cf. G. McKay, "Episcopal Conferences and Auxiliary Bishops," CLSGBIN 80 (1989) 8–16.

[111] Read, in CLSGBI Com, 253, mentions the possibility of a permanent vice-president.

above prevents an auxiliary bishop from being designated to do so.

(3) The canon does require that there be an official with the title and duties of general secretary. Certain of those duties are prescribed by canon 458. The statutes should specify other responsibilities, his/her qualifications, the method of his/her selection, the term of office, and so on. The canon does not require that the general secretary be a bishop or even a cleric.[112] If a bishop, he would appear to enjoy ipso iure membership in the conference: he would be a titular bishop to whom the conference had entrusted a special function within its territory (c. 450, §1).

Meetings

Canon 453 — Plenary meetings of a conference of bishops are to be held at least once each year and, in addition, whenever particular circumstances require it, according to the prescripts of the statutes.

The canons do not define a plenary session. Pastor bonus 11 distinguishes between plenary sessions of a Roman dicastery (to which all members, wherever they live, must be invited) and ordinary sessions (to which only the members who happen to be in Rome need be invited). Because a conference necessarily involves bishops who are scattered over a country, such a distinction probably does not apply to sessions of an episcopal conference. Thus, the term plenary probably denotes a session of the conference to which all members have the right to be invited, in which voting takes place (cf. c. 454) and general decrees may be issued (cf. c. 455, §2). Such a session must be held at least annually. It may be held more frequently if the statutes so provide or if special circumstances require such a session. The statutes might provide a procedure for convoking a plenary session in the latter case.[113]

Voting Rights

Canon 454 — §1. By the law itself, diocesan bishops, those who are equivalent to them in law, and coadjutor bishops have a deliberative vote in plenary meetings of a conference of bishops.

§2. Auxiliary bishops and other titular bishops who belong to a conference of bishops have a deliberative or consultative vote according to the prescripts of the statutes of the conference. Nonetheless, only those mentioned in §1 have a deliberative vote in drawing up or changing the statutes.

This canon reworks material found in Christus Dominus 38, 2. It makes several important distinctions. In the first place, there is the distinction between a deliberative and a consultative vote.[114] A consultative vote is not the power to vote at all; it is the right to speak about an issue under discussion.[115] A deliberative vote is the power to cast a ballot to determine the outcome of a discussion. The canon therefore distinguishes between those who can address the assembly and those who can vote when the assembly is reaching a decision. All bishops who are members of a conference have the right to speak, but not all of them have the right to vote.

A second distinction is between the right to vote granted (or recognized) by universal law, on the one hand, and the right to vote granted by the statutes of the conference, on the other. All prelates who actually preside over particular churches and all coadjutor bishops have the first, and the statutes cannot deprive them of this right. All other bishops belonging to the conference have the voting status accorded them by the [112] Read, in CLSGBI Com, 256.

[113] Article V of the NCCB Statutes, for example, authorizes the president to convoke a plenary assembly "with approval of the Administrative Committee." The Statutes of the Bishops' Conference of England and Wales allow "the President or, in his absence, the Vice President, after consultation with the Standing Committee, . . . to convene further meetings."

[114] Cf. the commentary on c. 127 for a more detailed discussion of this issue.

[115] Cf. Provost, "Particular Councils," 549–550, on the importance of a consultative vote.

statutes.[116] The statutes may deny them the power to vote or may limit their exercise of the right.[117]

Finally, the canon distinguishes the enacting or amending of the statutes from the resolution of all other issues. This is somewhat analogous to the distinction in the United States of America between drawing up or amending the Constitution and enacting legislation. Only the chief shepherds of particular churches and coadjutor bishops can vote on proposed statutes or amendments.[118]

Authority

Canon 455 — §1. A conference of bishops can only issue general decrees in cases where universal law has prescribed it or a special mandate of the Apostolic See has established it either motu proprio or at the request of the conference itself.[119]

Christus Dominus 38, 4 is the source of this canon: "Decisions of the episcopal conference... are to have juridically binding force in those cases and in those only which are prescribed by common law or determined by special mandate of the Apostolic See, given spontaneously or in response to a petition from the conference itself."[120]

According to canon 29, "General decrees... are laws properly speaking." Canon 455, §1 is accordingly a rule of recognition specifying the extent of the legislative power of the episcopal conference. It is also an invalidating law (cf. c. 10): if a conference has power only in certain cases (tantummodo potest in causis), it invalidly attempts to legislate outside those cases.

Although some (perhaps many) canonists and ecclesiologists would prefer otherwise, neither the council nor the code envisages the conference as a primarily legislative institute.[121] A particular council, by contrast, "possesses the power of governance, especially legislative power" (c. 445). Its legislative authority is a given unless it attempts to act in contravention of universal law or unless the Holy See refuses to grant the requisite recognitio (c. 446). The conference, on the other hand, cannot propose legislation unless some prescription of universal law so requires[122] or so allows, or

[116] ApS 17 cautions that in granting a deliberative vote to these bishops the statutes should take account of "the proportion between diocesan bishops and auxiliary and other titular bishops... in order that a possible majority of the latter may not condition the pastoral government of the diocesan bishops."

[117] For example, the Statutes of the Bishops' Conference of England and Wales, Article 7, allow "only diocesan bishops, those equivalent to them in law and coadjutor bishops" to vote on financial questions. Article XIV of the Statutes of the NCCB has a similar provision (excluding coadjutors): "In the determination of diocesan quotas or of special assessments in individual dioceses, or special collections not prescribed by the Holy See..." The exclusion of coadjutors is curious inasmuch as they are mentioned in canon 454, §1 as having an ipso iure right to vote.

[118] For discussions of reasons for not allowing auxiliaries to vote on these issues see Arrieta, in Pamplona ComEng, 342, and Lettmann, 359, n.19.

[119] ApS, article 1, parallels this canon: "In order that the doctrinal declarations of the conference of bishops referred to in No. 22 of the present letter may constitute authentic magisterium and be published in the name of the conference itself, they must be unanimously approved by the bishops who are members or receive the recognitio of the Apostolic See if approved in plenary assembly by at least two-thirds of the bishops belonging to the conference and having a deliberative vote." Unlike the canon, the aplett does not require the conference to receive authorization either from the law or from the Holy See before considering a doctrinal declaration. In this respect, the teaching authority of the conference is somewhat less circumscribed than its legislative authority. On the other hand, no act of legislation requires the unanimous approval of all members (ApS does not distinguish here between those with and those without ipso iure right to vote). In this respect the conference's teaching authority is more limited than its legislative authority. On this point see c. 753 and its commentary.

[120] AAS 58 (1966) 693.

[121] In the mind of the drafting committee, for example, "the episcopal conference is not understood primarily as a legislative assembly... but is especially an organ of union and intercommunication among bishops." Comm 14 (1982) 199.

[122] Listl, in Handbuch, 313, following Bertrams and Manzanares, distinguishes the conference's proper, ordinary power (i.e., the power to act with which the law endows the conference) from the delegated power it would enjoy if the Holy See empowered it to act in a given case.

unless the Holy See has given prior approval.[123] Thus, the legislative competence of the conference is more tightly circumscribed than that of the particular council.[124]

However limited, the legislative competence of the conference is nonetheless genuine. According to canon 131, §1, governmental power which is attached by law to an office is ordinary. Whenever the conference legislates in the light of provisions of universal law, it is therefore exercising the ordinary power proper to itself. Whenever the Holy See authorizes the conference to legislate, however, the conference would be exercising delegated papal power.[125]

Book I of the code distinguishes between general decrees (c. 29) and general executory decrees, which "more precisely determine the methods to be observed in applying the law or which urge the observance of laws" (c. 31, §1). Relying on this distinction, some authors have argued that canon 455 does not limit the conference's power to issue general executory decrees.[126] However, on July 5, 1985 the Pontifical Commission for the Authentic Interpretation of the Code of Canon Law ruled that "the term general decrees employed in canon 455, §1 includes also the general executory decrees treated in canons 31–33."[127] Hence, an episcopal conference's power to issue general executory decrees is subject to the same limitations as its power to legislate.

Several lists of the cases in which universal law either prescribes or allows the conference to legislate have been published.[128] The differences among them result from some imprecision in the formulation of the universal laws: it is not always clear whether the activity they require or permit is legislative.[129]

[123]The verbs in the canon's subordinate clause (praescripserit and statuerit) are perfect subjunctives. The use of the perfect tense underscores the priority of the action of universal authority: the universal legislator must enact an enabling law or the Holy See must grant the requisite mandate before the conference begins to establish its law. The drafting committee was most emphatic on this point: "An indiscriminate concession of legislative power to the episcopal conference would be detrimental, not only to the authority of the Holy See, but also to the authority which each bishop enjoys in his own diocese, and would also be contrary to the mind and the words of the Second Vatican Council" (Comm 15 [1982] 199).

[124]H. Schwendenwein suggests that the conference also has (limited) judicial power: it can authorize the establishment of regional appellate courts and the use of lay judges. H. Schwendenwein, Das neue Kirchenrecht (Graz: Styria, 1983) 229. This authorization is actually an exercise of administrative rather than judicial power.

[125]So T. Green, "The Authority of Episcopal Conferences: Some Normative and Doctrinal Considerations," CLSAP 51 (1989) 125: "The conferences as such (as distinct from their committees) are permanent collegial subjects of ordinary proper power.... Yet such conferences may occasionally exercise delegated authority if a Holy See mandate is required for their issuing a general decree."

[126]Provost, in CLSA Com, 369 makes a particularly strong case in favor of this conclusion.

[127]AAS 77 (1985) 771.

[128]Most authoritatively, on November 8, 1983 the cardinal secretary of state sent to all presidents of episcopal conferences (1) a list of 22 cases for which conferences could enact particular laws complementing the code and (2) a list of 21 cases for which the conference should enact complementary particular legislation. Comm 15 (1983) 135–139. Listl, in Handbuch, 314–320 lists 80 instances of potential legislative activity by conferences. Provost, in CLSA Com, 370–372 distinguishes 29 clear instances of potential lawmaking ("cases in which the code authorizes [and at times requires] conferences to adopt" particular laws) and 53 cases in which conference activity is less certainly legislative. T. Green ("The Normative Role of Episcopal Conferences in the 1983 Code," in Reese, Episcopal Conferences, 168–175) provides a list of 43 areas of "normative competence for Episcopal Conferences." See the appendix to this section of the commentary for a table documenting the legislative activity of the NCCB and the CCCB.

[129]Cf. Provost, in CLSA Com, 370: "Does canon 1126 authorize the conference to determine how the general law for the declaration and promises in a mixed marriage is to be applied in its territory, or does it make a new particular law for the subject matter?" Cf. also T. Green, "The Church's Teaching Mission," 24, n. 2: "The Code uses diverse legal formulations to specify conference normative competencies. Furthermore, there does not always seem to be a clear consensus among the commentators on the issue if they even address it at all."

§2. The decrees mentioned in §1, in order to be enacted validly in a plenary meeting, must be passed by at least a two thirds vote of the prelates who belong to the conference and possess a deliberative vote. They do not obtain binding force unless they have been legitimately promulgated after having been reviewed by the Apostolic See.

This canon, too, is derived from Christus Dominus 38, 4: "Decisions of the episcopal conference, provided they have been made lawfully and by the choice of at least two-thirds of the prelates who have a deliberative vote in the conference, and have been reviewed by the Apostolic See, are to have juridically binding force."[130] The canon is a rule of recognition: it prescribes the procedures which must be followed, under pain of invalidity, before a general decree enacted by an episcopal conference can be recognized as a law.[131]

In reaching its decisions a particular council would presumably follow, mutatis mutandis, canon 119, 2°: "When an absolute majority of those who must be convoked are present, that which is approved by the absolute majority of those present has the force of law." The decision of a majority of those who (a) are present and (b) have the right to vote would be decisive. However, the conference follows different rules in legislating. As in a particular council, only those who have a deliberative vote can cast votes; but the votes are tallied differently, and a different majority is required. In a council, only an absolute majority is required: 50 percent plus one vote. In a conference, the approval of at least 66⅔ percent is required. In a council, the majority is determined on the basis of those who are present. If fifty shepherds should attend, but only forty actually do so, the requisite majority is twenty-one, not twenty-six. In the conference, the majority is determined on the basis of all members who have a deliberative vote whether or not they are present. If fifty should attend, but only forty actually do so, the necessary majority remains thirty-four, not twenty-seven. Absentee ballots can be critically important.

After the conference has followed the procedure for enacting a general decree, three additional elements (only two of which are explicitly mentioned in the canon) are necessary before it becomes effective.

(1) The decree must receive the recognitio from the Apostolic See. In accordance with Pastor bonus, the proposed legislation would be sent either to the Congregation for Bishops (PB 82) or, if the conference were located in missionary territory, to the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples (PB 89). Before authorizing the recognitio, the appropriate congregation consults with the Pontifical Council for the Interpretation of Legislative Texts to ensure that the proposed law is consistent with universal laws and uses correct legal language.[132] The recognitio does not convert episcopal legislation into papal legislation,[133] but it does guarantee that the proposed particular laws do not conflict with universal legislation and do not threaten the well-being of the universal Church.[134]

(2) In accordance with canon 7, the approved decree must next be promulgated. Until promul-

[130] AAS 58 (1966) 693.

[131] Canon 135, §2 prohibits the valid delegation of legislative power by anyone except the supreme authority of the Church, unless the law provides otherwise. Hence, the conference cannot delegate its law-making power to its committees. See an authentic interpretation on this point dated June 10, 1966, AAS 60 (1968) 361; CLD 7, 131.

[132] Žužek, "Authentic," 71, notes that the conference's use of language is sometimes problematic.

[133] Listl, in Handbuch, 313; also P. Krämer, "Episcopal Conferences and the Apostolic See," J 48 (1988) 137–138. See Provost, "Particular Councils," 552, on the recognitio of laws enacted by particular councils.

[134] D. Murray has a sanguine view of the recognitio process. "The Holy See does not merely confirm the decree but enters actively into its formulation.... This can be seen as heightening the degree of collegiality involved. The unity with the Head of the College which must be at least implicitly present in every truly collegial act is here rendered quite explicit." D. Murray, "The Legislative Authority of the Episcopal Conference," Stud Can 20 (1986) 45. However, the pope's rewriting the text of a decree formulated by several dozen of his brother bishops might seem an odd exercise of collegiality.

gation, the proposed decree is not "established" or "given birth" as a law.

(3) Finally, after the promulgation of the decree a specified time (the vacatio legis) must elapse before the decree begins to bind (c. 8, §2).

§3. The conference of bishops itself determines the manner of promulgation and the time when the decrees take effect.

This canon is in some respects a deduction from and in other respects an adaptation of canon 8, §2: "Particular laws are promulgated in the manner determined by the legislator and begin to oblige a month after the day of [their] promulgation unless the law itself establishes another time period." The conference has the authority to decide how it will promulgate its general decrees. The conference might establish, within its statutes, a routine form of promulgation (just as c. 8, §1 prescribes publication in Acta Apostolicae Sedis as the routine form of promulgation for universal laws);[135] or the proposed decree might contain provisions about its eventual promulgation; or the conference might even defer to another plenary session the decision about promulgation.[136] Similarly, provisions for the vacatio legis could be made in the conference's statutes, in the decree itself, or in the instrument of promulgation. In the absence of any such provisions, canon 8, §2 would presumably come into play, and particular laws would begin to bind one month after the day of their promulgation.

§4. In cases in which neither universal law nor a special mandate of the Apostolic See has granted the power mentioned in §1 to a conference of bishops, the competence of each diocesan bishop remains intact, nor is a conference or its president able to act in the name of all the bishops unless each and every bishop has given consent.

Each bishop enjoys proper, ordinary, and immediate power over the flock entrusted to him (LG 27). He is engraced by ordination with all the authority necessary for him to serve the people whose proper shepherd he is. Some bishops have long expressed the fear that episcopal conferences might usurp this legitimate episcopal power. This canon seeks to allay their fears. The code commission appears to view the legislative authority of the conference as a kind of limit which the supreme authority of the Church has imposed on the exercise of the individual bishop's authority.[137] Apart from the cases specified in canon 455, §1, the individual bishop's power remains intact. The canon emphasizes this by making explicit with reference to the conference and its president the general principle, "What touches all as individuals, however, must be approved by all" (cf. c. 119, 3°). When neither the canons nor the pope has authorized the conference to legislate, the majority of the conference cannot enforce its will upon even a single reluctant bishop.

This is not to say, however, that the "sense" of the conference has no weight at all. Quite the contrary, as the Directory on the Pastoral Ministry of Bishops declares,

> There are other decisions and regulations of the conference which do not have a juridical binding force, and as a rule the bishop makes them his own with a view to unity and charity with his brother bishops unless serious reasons he has carefully considered in the Lord prevent it. He promulgates these decisions and norms in his diocese in his own name and proper authority whenever the conference cannot definitively circumscribe

[135] Cf. article 16, 1 of the Statutes of the German Bishops' Conference; also Schwendenwein, 228 concerning similar provisions for the Austrian episcopal conference.

[136] J. Provost questions the lack of any consistent approach to promulgating conference norms: "The Promulgation of Universal and Particular Law in the Ten Years Since the Code," in Ius in Vita et in Missione Ecclesiae (Rome: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1994) 631–634.

[137] Hence, in the light of c. 18, the conditions c. 455 places on the exercise of the conference's power would require strict interpretation.

the power which each bishop personally discharges in the name of Christ (LG 27).[138]

The Directory states that the fostering of communion among the bishops ("unity and charity") generally requires the individual bishop to act in harmony with the common understanding of the conference, even when that common understanding is not juridically binding, and even when he previously disputed it.[139] Such an interpretation of conference initiatives sees cooperation as enhancing rather than undermining the authority of the individual bishop (cf. CD 37).

Communication with the Holy See

Canon 456 — When a plenary meeting of a conference of bishops has ended, the president is to send a report of the acts of the conference and its decrees to the Apostolic See so that the acts are brought to its notice and it can review the decrees if there are any.

This new canon parallels canon 446 concerning the conclusion of a particular council. Proposed decrees cannot be promulgated and cannot become effective without the recognitio (cf. c. 455, §2); hence, someone needs to forward them to Rome for appropriate review. The fostering of communion likewise requires that other particular churches—especially the Roman church—be kept informed of even non-legislative initiatives. The president as the legal representative of the conference is the appropriate person to further these goals.

The Permanent Council

Canon 457 — It is for the permanent council of bishops to take care that the agenda for a plenary session of a conference is prepared and that decisions made in plenary session are properly executed. It is also for the council to take care of other affairs which are entrusted to it according to the norm of the statutes.

Though a permanent institute, the episcopal conference is not permanently in session. Between sessions its work is supervised by a permanent council of bishops. The statutes of each conference are to specify the composition and responsibilities of this body.[140] This canon prescribes the minimum competency of such a council. The council (not the general secretary) is responsible for preparing for plenary meetings and for overseeing the implementations of decisions of prior meetings. Through the permanent council the conference continues functioning even when not in session.

The General Secretariat

Canon 458 — It is for the general secretariat:

1° to prepare a report of the acts and decrees of a plenary meeting of a conference and

[138] SCB, Directory on the Pastoral Ministry of Bishops, Benedictine Monks of the Seminary of Christ the King, trans. (Ottawa: Canadian Catholic Conference, 1974) 113, n. 212 b.

[139] Article 16 of the Statutes of the Bishops' Conference of England and Wales takes an interesting approach: "Proposals approved by an absolute majority of those present with a deliberative vote at the Plenary Assembly become Official Conference Resolutions. Although lacking juridical binding force, those resolutions will normally be observed by all members in the spirit of collegial unity. Such observance will be presumed unless, on occasion, individual bishops indicate otherwise, either during the Plenary Assembly or later by informing the President." Article XII of the NCCB statutes recommends the observance of similar measures "as an expression of collegial responsibility and in a spirit of unity and charity with their brother bishops."

[140] The Statutes of the CCCB provide for a 14-member board (Articles 10–12) and an Executive [sic] consisting of the president, the vice president, and two councilors. The Statutes of the Bishops' Conference of England and Wales establish a Standing Committee consisting of the president, the vice-president, the metropolitan archbishops, and the chairs of the departments of the conference (Articles 19–21). The NCCB has an Administrative Committee (Article IX) and a smaller Executive Committee "to deal with urgent conference matters when the Administrative Committee is not in session" (Article X).

the acts of the permanent council of bishops, to communicate the same to all the members of the conference, and to draw up other acts whose preparation the president of the conference or the permanent council entrusts to the general secretary;

2° to communicate to neighboring conferences of bishops the acts and documents which the conference in plenary meeting or the permanent council of bishops decides to send to them.

The tasks of the general secretary of the conference are similar to those of the chancellor of a diocese (cf. cc. 482, 484). He/she is responsible for preparing various official documents, taking proper care of them, and communicating them to members of the conference or to the proper officials of neighboring conferences (at the direction of the conference itself or the permanent council). Communicating with the Holy See about legitimate conference business is the responsibility, not of the general secretary, but of the president (cf. c. 456).

Relations Among Conferences

Canon 459 — §1. Relations between conferences of bishops, especially neighboring ones, are to be fostered in order to promote and protect the greater good.

§2. Whenever conferences enter into actions or programs having an international character, however, the Apostolic See must be heard.

Christus Dominus 38, 5 encouraged contacts among episcopal conferences; and Ecclesiae sanctae I, 41, 5 suggested areas in which such contacts would be particularly important:

(a) communicating the principal decisions, especially in pastoral life and action;
(b) sending texts or reports of the decisions of the conference or the acts and documents by the bishops collectively;
(c) reporting the various apostolic enterprises proposed or recommended by the episcopal conference which could be of use in similar circumstances;
(d) proposing those questions of grave import which in our times and in particular circumstances seem of the greatest importance;
(e) indicating the dangers or errors making ground in their own country which might also creep into other nations, so that suitable means should be taken in good time to prevent them or remove or confine them.[141]

Intercommunication between conferences will, at a minimum, foster better understanding among bishops and may lead to common solutions to otherwise intractable problems. Universal legislation therefore strongly encourages it.[142]

Because the Holy See is responsible for the well-being of the entire communion of churches, however, it has a legitimate interest in ecclesiastical undertakings with international implications. Ecclesiae sanctae I, 41, 4 had required that conferences advise the Holy See about such initiatives beforehand (praemoneatur). The canon requires that the Holy See be heard (audiatur). Neither text demands papal approval of the initiative, but both implicitly enable the Holy See to forbid anything that seems particularly unwise[143] and to encourage especially prudent initiatives.

[141] AAS 58 (1966) 774; CLD 6, 283–284.

[142] Because of the complexity of the issue and limitations of space, the reader must look elsewhere for a discussion of the various structures that have developed to foster communications among conferences especially in Europe, Latin America, and Africa. Detailed discussions are available in I. Fürer, "Episcopal Conferences in Their Mutual Relations," J 48 (1988) 153–174; and J. Hortal, "Relationships Among Episcopates," J 48 (1988) 175–180.

[143] Unless the power to impose such restrictions is used cautiously, however, the legitimate initiatives of the bishops might be unduly curtailed.

PARTICULAR LEGISLATION[144] ENACTED BY THE NCCB AND THE CCCB

Reference to the 1983 Code[145]	NCCB Norms[146]	CCCB Norms[147]
c. 8, §2: method of promulgation		SC (21) 210–211: publication in the series "Official Document—Document officiel"; generally, one month vacatio legis
c. 230, §1: ministries of lector and acolyte		SC (22) 222–223: candidates must be 21
c. 236: formation of permanent deacons		SC (22) 462–465
c. 242: program of priestly formation	J 398: 4th edition of Program of Priestly Formation	SC (22) 216–217
c. 276, §2, 3º: permanent deacons and Liturgy of the Hours	J 399: "permanent deacons should not hold themselves lightly excused" from morning and evening prayer	SC (22) 204–205: permanent deacons must pray Lauds and Vespers
c. 284: clerical dress		SC (22) 458–459: clerics must dress in such a way as to be identifiable as clerics
c. 451: statutes		SC (20) 220–229
c. 455, §3: method of promulgation		SC (21) 210–211: publication in the series "Official Document—Document officiel"; generally, one month vacatio legis
c. 496: norms on presbyteral councils		SC (22) 458–461

(continued)

[144] The reader is encouraged to consult the code itself and the relevant commentary for discussion of the norms in question. The table can provide only an overview of the kind and extent of legislative activity on the part of two conferences.

[145] NCCB documentation (cf. the following footnote) recognizes 84 canons authorizing legislative activity by the conference. Neither the NCCB nor the CCCB has issued that many decrees. The table will not take cognizance of canons on which neither conference has yet acted.

[146] The NCCB has promulgated its decrees in various ways. The most recent documentation can be found in S. Euart, "Complementary Norms Implementing the 1983 Code of Canon Law by the National Conference of Catholic Bishops," J 53 (1993) 396–434. In this table, the decree will be cited as J and page number.

[147] As of this writing documentation of 37 decrees is available in various issues of Stud Can. In the table, the decree will be cited as SC (volume number), and page number.

Reference to the 1983 Code	NCCB Norms	CCCB Norms
c. 502, §3: cathedral chapters and diocesan consultors		SC (19) 170–171: where chapters of canons exist, they may be given the responsibilities the code gives to diocesan consultors
c. 522: term of office for pastors	J 399–400: six-year terms, renewable at discretion of diocesan bishop	SC (19) 172–173: after consultation with presbyteral council, bishop can appoint pastors to renewable six-year terms
c. 538, §3: the support of retired pastors	J 400: diocesan bishops may develop policies in accordance with Norms for Priests and Their Third Age	SC (22) 478–481: bishops must establish retirement funds
c. 766: norms on lay preaching		SC (19) 174–177: diocesan bishop can allow lay preaching when there are no clergy, when liturgy of word is celebrated without clergy, when seminarians are learning, in other special circumstances
c. 772, §2: norms on radio or television talks on doctrine	J 401: diocesan bishops can provisionally establish their own guidelines	SC (22) 206–207: only explicitly recognized "Catholic" programs are Catholic; media workers need special training
c. 788, §3: statutes on the catechumenate	J 401: cf. National Statutes for the Catechumenate	SC (22) 218–221
c. 792: programs welcoming people from mission lands		SC (24) 466–467: priests coming to study in Canada need a letter from their ordinary attesting to their good standing; priests from mission countries seeking to work in Canada need letters from the ordinary a quo and the ordinary of the place where they wish to work

Reference to the 1983 Code	NCCB Norms	CCCB Norms
c. 804: Catholic education in schools		SC (22) 472–473: reaffirmed norms already in force
c. 830: a list of censors		SC (22) 476–477: the conference will compile and regularly revise such a list
c. 831: norms governing participation of priests or religious in media	J 402: diocesan bishops can provisionally establish their own guidelines	SC (22) 468–471: regular participants need authorization from their proper superiors and the ordinary of the place; conference should be informed of regular media commitments by clerics or religious; regular participants need proper training
c. 851: norms on adult baptisms		SC (25) 486–489
c. 877, §3: recording baptisms of adopted children	J 402: diocesan bishops can provisionally establish their own guidelines	SC (22) 208–211: generally infants are not baptized before adoption; civil law prescriptions to be followed for registration and issuing of certificates
c. 891: age for confirmation	Origins 24 (1994) 2: "between the age of discretion . . . and 18 years of age, within the limits determined by the diocesan bishop"	SC (21) 200–201: candidates are confirmed "at the age determined in the approved catechetical programs"
c. 961, 2°: criteria for using general absolution	J 404: "a long while" in the canon means "one month"
c. 964, §2: norms concerning confessionals		SC (20) 212–213
c. 1031: age for ordination	J 404–405: minimum age for ordination to permanent diaconate is thirty-five; diocesan bishop can dispense up to one year

(continued)

Reference to the 1983 Code	NCCB Norms	CCCB Norms
c. 1067: norms governing prenuptial investigations	J 405: diocesan bishops can provisionally establish their own norms	SC (25) 492–495
c. 1067: the banns		SC (25) 498–501: banns no longer obligatory, but parties may request them or diocesan regulations may so recommend
c. 1083, §2: age for marriage		SC (21) 202–203: minimum age for liceity is eighteen, but ordinary may dispense
c. 1112: lay witnesses of marriage	J 406: the conference will entertain requests for the faculty to delegate lay witnesses	SC (19) 168–169
c. 1126: promises for mixed marriages	J 406: 1970 norms were reaffirmed	SC (24) 474–477: promises made orally in presence of parish priest or his delegate
c. 1127, §2: dispensations from canonical form	J 407: 1970 norms were reaffirmed	SC (21) 204–207
c. 1236, §1: materials used for fixed altars		SC (22) 214–215: "natural stone, or any solid, worthy material approved by the diocesan bishop"
c. 1246: days of obligation	J 408: six holy days; January 1st, August 15th, and November 1st are not days of obligation if they fall on Saturday or Monday	SC (19) 178–179: Sundays plus Christmas and January 1st
c. 1253: norms for fast and abstinence	J 409: 1966 norms were reaffirmed; J 409–410: the minimum age at which fasting becomes obligatory is eighteen	SC (19) 180–181: Ash Wednesday and Good Friday are days of fast and abstinence; Fridays are days of abstinence, but faithful can substitute other practices
c. 1262: norms governing contributions of the faithful	J 410: diocesan bishops can establish their own norms	SC (24) 470–471

PARTICULAR LEGISLATION ENACTED BY THE NCCB AND THE CCCB (continued)

Reference to the 1983 Code	NCCB Norms	CCCB Norms
c. 1277: the meaning of "extraordinary" administration	J 410–411	SC (19) 184–185
c. 1292: alienation of church property	J 411–414: maximum amount of $3,000,000	SC (19) 188–189; SC (22) 454–455: the "minimum" amount is 10% of the "maximum"
c. 1297: norms concerning leasing church property	J 414; cf. J 410–411	SC (22) 200–203
c. 1421, §2: lay persons as ecclesiastical judges	J 414	SC (19) 164–165
c. 1425, §1: collegiate tribunals	J 415: diocesan bishops can entrust first instance trials to single clerical judges	SC (19) 166–167
c. 1439, §2: tribunals of second instance	J 416: conference will act when petition for such action has been made

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Acerbi, A. "The Development of the Canons on Conferences and the Apostolic See." J 48 (1988) 146–152.

Antón, A. "The Theological 'Status' of Episcopal Conferences." J 48 (1988) 185–219.

Arrieta, J. "Title II—Groupings of Particular Churches." In Pamplona ComEng, 328–345.

Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops. Complementary Norms to the 1983 Code of Canon Law. Ottawa: CCCB, 1996.

Dulles, A. "Doctrinal Authority of Episcopal Conferences." In Episcopal Conferences: Historical, Canonical and Theological Studies, ed. T. Reese, 207–232. Washington, D.C.: Georgetown University, 1989.

Feliciani, G. "Episcopal Conferences from Vatican II to the 1983 Code." J 48 (1988) 11–25.

———. Le Conferenze Episcopali. Bologna: Il Mulino, 1974.

Fogarty, G. "The Authority of the National Catholic Welfare Conference." In Episcopal Conferences: Historical, Canonical and Theological Studies, ed. T. Reese, 85–103. Washington, D.C.: Georgetown University, 1989.

Fürer, I. "Episcopal Conferences in their Mutual Relations." J 48 (1988) 153–174.

García y García, A. "Episcopal Conferences in Light of Particular Councils during the Second Millennium." J 48 (1988) 57–67.

Ghirlanda, G. "De episcoporum conferentia deque exercitio potestatis magisterii." P 87 (1987) 573–604.

Green, J. Conferences of Bishops and the Exercise of the 'Munus Docendi' of the Church. Rome: Gregorian University, 1987.

Green, T. "The Authority of Episcopal Conferences: Some Normative and Doctrinal Considerations." CLSAP 51 (1989) 123–136.

———. "The Church's Teaching Mission: Some Aspects of the Normative Role of Episcopal Conferences." Stud Can 27 (1993) 23–57.

———. "The Normative Role of Episcopal Conferences in the 1983 Code." In Episcopal Conferences: Historical, Canonical and Theological Studies, ed. T. Reese, 137–175. Washington, D.C.: Georgetown University, 1989.

Gutiérrez, J. "Capitulo VI Organización Jerarquica de la Iglesia." In Manual de Derecho Canonico, 291–371. Pamplona: Universidad de Navarra, S.A., 1988.

Hortal, J. "Relationships among Episcopates." J 48 (1988) 175–180.

John Paul II. Mp The Theological and Juridical Nature of Episcopal Conferences. Origins 28 (July 30, 1998) 152–158.

Huizing, P. "The Structure of Episcopal Conferences." J 28 (1968) 163–176.

Iban. I., ed. Gli statuti delle conferenze episcopali II America. Padua: CEDAM, 1989.

Komonchak, J. "Episcopal Conferences." CS 27 (1988) 311–328.

Krämer, P. "Episcopal Conferences and the Apostolic See." J 48 (1988) 134–145.

Kutner, R. The Development, Structure, and Competence of the Episcopal Conference. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1972.

Lettmann, R. "Episcopal Conferences in the New Canon Law." Stud Can 14 (1980) 347–367.

Listl, J. "Plenarkonzil und Bischofskonferenz." In Handbuch, ed. J. Listl et al., 304–324. Regensburg: Pustet, 1983.

Manzanares, J. "The Teaching Authority of Episcopal Conferences." J 48 (1988) 234–263.

Maritz, H. "Die Kirchenprovinz: Provinzialkonzil und Metropolit." In Handbuch, ed. J. Listl et al., 325–329. Regensburg: Pustet, 1983.

McKeown, E. "The National Bishops' Conference: An Analysis of Its Origin." The Catholic Historical Review 66 (1980) 565–583.

———. "The 'National Idea' in the History of the American Episcopal Conference." In Episcopal Conferences: Historical, Canonical and Theological Studies, ed. T. Reese, 59–84. Washington, D.C.: Georgetown University, 1989.

Müller, H. "The Relationship between the Episcopal Conference and the Diocesan Bishop." J 48 (1988) 111–129.

Murray, D. "The Legislative Authority of the Episcopal Conference." Stud Can 20 (1986) 33–47.

NCCB. Implementation of the 1983 Code Complementary Norms. Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1991.

Örsy, L. "Reflections on the Teaching Authority of the Episcopal Conferences." In Episcopal Conferences: Historical, Canonical and Theological Studies, ed. T. Reese, 233–252. Washington, D.C.: Georgetown University, 1989.

Poblete, E. The Plenary Council: A Historical Synopsis and a Commentary. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1958.

Popek, A. The Rights and Obligations of Metropolitans: A Historical Synopsis and Commentary. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1957.

Provost, J. "Particular Councils." In The New Code of Canon Law: Proceedings of the 5th International Congress of Canon Law, ed. M. Theriault and J. Thorn, 1:537–561. Ottawa: Faculty of Canon Law, 1984.

———. "Title II—Groupings of Particular Churches." In CLSA Com, 350–377.

Ratzinger, J., and V. Messori. The Ratzinger Report. San Francisco: Ignatius Press, 1985.

Read, G. "Section II: Particular Churches and Their Groupings." In CLSGBI Com, 209–313.

Reese, T. A Flock of Shepherds: The National Conference of Catholic Bishops. Kansas City, Mo.: Sheed and Ward, 1992.

Schwendenwein, H. Das neue Kirchenrecht. Graz: Verlag Styria, 1983.

Sieben, H.-J. "Episcopal Conferences in the Light of Particular Councils during the First Millennium." J 48 (1988) 68–106.

Sobanski, R. "The Theology and Juridic Status of Episcopal Conferences at the Second Vatican Council." J 48 (1988) 68–106.

Tillard, J. "The Theological Significance of Local Churches for Episcopal Conferences." J 48 (1988) 220–226.

Urrutia, F. "De exercitio muneris docendi a conferentiis episcoporum." P 66 (1987) 605–636.

TITLE III
THE INTERNAL ORDERING OF PARTICULAR CHURCHES
[cc. 460–572]

CHAPTER I
THE DIOCESAN SYNOD
[cc. 460–468]

While varying according to the needs of the age in both purpose and constitution, diocesan synods have been utilized by the Church since the fourth century as vehicles for pastoral governance. In earlier centuries, synods were structured for wide-ranging purposes, from electing bishops to planning strategies for combating threats to the Church's stability from such matters as heresies and clerical misconduct.[1] Previous universal legislation required annual celebrations of diocesan synods for the purpose of local promulgation of provincial council legislation[2] and later for the purpose of ensuring consistent reform and correction of abuses.[3] The 1917 code devoted seven canons to the diocesan synod (CIC 356–362) including one that called for the convocation of a diocesan synod every ten years, a norm that was rarely observed. The current code on this topic (cc. 460–468) provides more episcopal discretion both in the frequency of convening a diocesan synod and in its design and execution. The canons in this chapter address the concept and constitution of a synod as well as its convening and cessation. The most recent document on diocesan synods was a joint instruction[4] by the Congregation for Bishops and the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples.[5] This document provides many details related to preparing for and conducting a synod.[6] In some instances, 1917 code requirements not included in the present law are set forth as required or necessary elements of a synod in this document.[7] In other cases, new "requirements" not mentioned in the code are contained in the document.[8] A careful review of this document would seem to be an important preliminary step in any consideration of convening a synod.

[1] For a fuller study of the history of synods, see L. Jennings, "A Renewed Understanding of the Diocesan Synod," Stud Can 20 (1986) 320–329.

[2] Fourth Lateran Council (1215). See J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, vol. XXII, col. 991.

[3] Council of Trent (1563), sess. XXIV, de ref., c. 2; sess. XXV, de ref., cc. 4, 10.

[4] Canon 34 defines the purpose of an instruction: to "clarify the prescripts of laws and elaborate on and determine the methods to be observed in fulfilling them."

[5] CFB and CEP, Instruction on Diocesan Synods (July 8, 1997). See Origins 27 (October 23, 1997) 324–331.

[6] For example, it discusses the practicalities of observing the liturgical norms of the Caeremoniale Episcoporum for the opening and closing liturgies as well as any other liturgies celebrated during the synod.

[7] For example, under the 1917 code, the bishop was to establish one or more preparatory commissions of clerics to prepare the drafts of synodal texts if opportune (CIC 360, §1). Earlier drafts of the law retained these bodies but the code commission specifically deleted them later (cf. Rel, 111). The 1983 code makes no reference to such commissions, clerical or not, even though the practicality of such would seem unquestioned for the ordering of the material to be discussed and deliberated upon at the synod.

[8] For example, the 1997 instruction refers to the constitution of a preparatory commission as an "obligation" of the bishop and provides extensive detail on its structure, composition, and purpose (Origins 27 [October 23, 1997] 326–327). Likewise the instruction states that the commission is to assist in the preparation of a required synodal directory, again a practical tool but one not mentioned in the code and hence not strictly obligatory. Since an instruction is to "clarify," "elaborate on," and "determine the methods" for observance of law, but not to issue new law, it is difficult to see how this document could add new obligations binding in law.

In the Eastern churches, a parallel institute to the diocesan synod is the eparchial assembly.[9] It, too, is a representative body composed of members of the Christian faithful who are periodically convened at the discretion of the eparch to advise him on matters of import for the eparchy.[10] The eparchial bishop convenes and presides over the assembly, personally or through a representative, and transfers, postpones, suspends, or dissolves it.[11] Like the diocesan synod (c. 463), the eparchial assembly is composed of members who must be convened by reason of office, members who are elected on a representational basis, and members who may be invited by the eparchial bishop.[12] Unlike the norms on diocesan synod members, the eparchial assembly norms make explicit provision for the election of deacon representatives.[13] With due regard for the right of the eparchial bishop to determine the agenda and the right of the faithful to propose questions for consideration at the assembly, he is to establish one or more preparatory commissions to organize matters to be discussed.[14] Like the diocesan bishop in the synod, the eparchial bishop is the sole legislator in the assembly.[15] He communicates the synod results according to particular law.[16]

The Nature and Purpose of a Diocesan Synod

Canon 460 — A diocesan synod is a group of selected priests and other members of the Christian faithful of a particular church who offer assistance to the diocesan bishop for the good of the whole diocesan community according to the norm of the following canons.

This introductory canon describes a diocesan synod, stating in general terms its nature as well as those who comprise it and its basic purpose. The synod is described from the outset in terms of its essential characteristic, namely, that it is a group or assembly (coetus) of the people of God.[17] This primary description of the synod is consistent with our contemporary understanding of the Church as the people of God and the diocese as a portion of the people of God. The synod's functional and organizational elements flow from its basic constitution.

Those who comprise this synodal group are generally designated as "selected priests and other members of the Christian faithful." The following canons provide more specific determinations regarding who must be convened and others who could be called to form the synod, but this initial determination of membership establishes a broad base of representation. Contrary to previous practice and legislation, the synod is no longer an exclusively clerical or presbyteral gathering. The phrase "other members of the Christian faithful" would obviously embrace any and all of those not included in the designation "selected priests." Therefore, the synod composition presumably would include deacons, laity, and members of institutes of consecrated life and/or societies of apostolic life, to the extent that these are present in the diocese.

While this chapter of the code is entitled "Diocesan Synod," canon 460 refers to the ambit of the synod as the "particular church," thus making it and the following norms applicable to other forms of particular churches.[18] These comments, however, will emphasize the diocese rather than other types of particular churches.

The purpose of the diocesan synod is clearly stated: to "offer assistance to the diocesan bishop for the good of the whole diocesan community."

[9] CCEO 235–242.
[10] CCEO 235–236.
[11] CCEO 237.
[12] CCEO 238.
[13] CCEO 238, §1, 8°.
[14] CCEO 240.
[15] CCEO 241.
[16] CCEO 242.

[17] The code commission specifically opted to use the word coetus here, indicating that it is the assembly that is significant, rather than the alternate word, "meeting" (conventus), which would have placed more emphasis on the vehicle used to achieve the purpose of the gathering. See Comm 12 [1980] 315.
[18] Cf. cc. 368–371.

This primary function of the synod reflects a concrete means by which the faithful exercise some of their rights and fulfill some of their obligations as recognized by the code. Among these rights and duties are building up the Body of Christ (canon 208), promoting the growth of the Church (canon 210), making known their spiritual needs (canon 212, §2), and expressing to their sacred pastors their opinion on matters which pertain to the good of the Church (canon 212, §3).

It has been traditional to designate the primary focus of the synod as assisting the bishop in the fulfillment of his legislative function. In discussing this portion of the code, the commission indicated its presumption that legislative activity was a primary synodal function,[19] but the final text does not make explicit this underlying expectation. Therefore, in the years since the promulgation of the code, a wide variety of formats and structures have been utilized for diocesan synods. In some cases, and often shortly after the promulgation of the 1983 code, the synod was the vehicle by which the diocesan bishop prepared a whole range of particular legislation called for in the code. In other cases, the synod process was utilized as a forum for planning, setting strategies, and establishing a unified diocesan vision, with little or no specific legislative activity. In some instances, the synodal activity was largely centralized, with diocesan personnel and agencies preparing texts and agenda items to lead to particular legislation. In other instances, a more decentralized, "grass roots" approach called for the faithful of the diocese to surface key issues for examination by the synod with little or no emphasis on legislation as an end product.[20]

This divergence in approach frequently reflected the episcopal leadership style in the given diocese as well as the needs of the local church. The "offering of assistance for the good of the diocese" was seen to have pastoral implications beyond the issuing of legislation. However, this same divergence may have motivated the July 1997 Instruction on Diocesan Synods issued by the Congregation for Bishops and the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples. Its prologue indicates some concerns about various forms of "diocesan assemblies" which "often include elements of diocesan [s]ynods [but] . . . lack a precise canonical character."[21] It is clear from the instruction and its appendix that these Roman dicasteries are calling for a shift back to the legislative function as the primary synodal focus. The appendix provides a lengthy listing of the various areas in which the code calls for diocesan norms or particular legislation.

The synod's attention is to be directed toward the "good of the whole diocesan community," and it is to this end that those who comprise the synod offer their assistance to the diocesan bishop.[22] The instruction more precisely describes what constitutes this "good of the whole." Within the larger context of the Church's pastoral activity which involves both communion and mission, the following are seen as works of the synod: promoting "acceptance of the Church's salvific doctrine" and encouraging the following of Christ; furthering "apostolic zeal" as a foundation for the Church's pastoral activities; attending to "the continued betterment of clerical life, the formation of clergy and the promotion of [priestly and religious life] vocations"; building up and fostering ecclesial unity through synodal documents that "accurately reflect the universal Magisterium of the Church"; "shaping pastoral activities" within the liturgical, spiritual, and canonical tradition; studying existing diocesan norms and reforming or expanding them as needed; evaluating the adequacy of existing pastoral programs; and proposing "new pastoral plans" as needed.[23]

After defining the diocesan synod, canon 460 indicates that the synod is to be governed by the

[19] Comm 12 (1980) 315.

[20] For other examples of the varying ways synod issues have been raised, see A. Rehrauer, "The Diocesan Synod," CLSAP 49 (1987) 12.

[21] Origins 27 (October 23, 1997) 324.

[22] For possible areas of synodal activity to "offer assistance to the diocesan bishop," see Jennings, 342.

[23] Origins 27 (October 23, 1997) 325.

canonical norms that follow, which will be reviewed in the following comments.

Convocation of a Synod

Canon 461 — §1. A diocesan synod is to be celebrated in individual particular churches when circumstances suggest it in the judgment of the diocesan bishop after he has heard the presbyteral council.

§2. If a bishop has the care of several dioceses or has the care of one as the proper bishop but of another as administrator, he can convoke one diocesan synod for all the dioceses entrusted to him.

As noted above, the 1917 norm (CIC 356, §1) requiring the convening of a synod every ten years was rarely observed. In many dioceses, prior to the 1983 code, there were few who could recall a previous synod having occurred. At various stages in the drafting of canon 461, §1 different norms were proposed on the frequency of a synod. These proposals ranged from the previous ten-year interval with a possible extension of an additional ten years,[24] to deleting any time reference at all and making the convocation of a synod an option for the diocesan bishop to consider.[25]

In the final text, it is expected that a diocesan synod will be a usual part of diocesan life, but the discretion of the diocesan bishop is respected in determining its frequency. The diocesan bishop is to exercise his prudent judgment regarding when "circumstances suggest" the convening of a synod. As part of his judgment process, he must seek the counsel of his presbyteral council. This consultation is consistent with the primary function of that advisory body to "assist as much as possible the bishop in the governance of the diocese... to promote the pastoral good of the [diocese]."[26] Depending on local circumstances and episcopal leadership preferences, the diocesan bishop may choose to widen the circle of consultation regarding the appropriateness of convening a synod. Nothing in this canon precludes his consulting also with the diocesan pastoral council. Since this latter consultative body is designated to "investigate, consider, and propose practical conclusions about those things which pertain to pastoral works in the diocese,"[27] the diocesan bishop might have the pastoral council consider the advantages of a diocesan synod and propose their conclusions in that regard to him. Likewise, the bishop could choose to consult with other advisory groups who assist him. While these various consultations could help the bishop in his determinations regarding a synod, the only canonically required consultation is that of the presbyteral council.

The second paragraph of this canon also provides for some discretion on the part of the diocesan bishop. If two or more dioceses have been entrusted to his care, he may choose to convene a single synod for all of them. Such a situation could occur even if he is appointed as administrator in the additional diocese[s]. He would have to have been named administrator of that diocese in a more or less permanent manner[28] rather than in the situation of a vacant see since in this latter situation a synod ceases (c. 468, §2). Likewise, canon 462, §1 specifically excludes the convening of a synod by one who temporarily governs a diocese.

Prior to convening the joint synod, however, the diocesan bishop would need to make the same determination as for a synod in a single diocese, namely, that circumstances warrant it. Given the variations among dioceses, one may not assume that what is timely in one diocese is necessarily so in another. These same variations may make synodal recommendations which are appropriate in one diocese ineffectual in the next. Perhaps for these reasons the canon does not encourage this type of "corporate synod" but simply allows it.

In determining the timeliness of this alternate form of synod, the diocesan bishop must consult

[24] Comm 12 (1980) 315.

[25] Comm 14 (1982) 210.

[26] Canon 495, §1.

[27] Canon 511.

[28] See, for example, c. 371.

with the presbyteral council of each diocese affected. He will also need to convene members from each diocese in accord with the norms that follow. This latter consideration in itself may advise against this type of synod since the number of members convened could preclude effective interchange.

Canon 462 — §1. The diocesan bishop alone convokes a diocesan synod, but not one who temporarily presides over a diocese.

§2. The diocesan bishop presides over a diocesan synod. He can, however, delegate a vicar general or episcopal vicar to fulfill this responsibility for individual sessions of the synod.

The diocesan bishop is the one to whom the governance of the diocese has been principally committed and it is he who exercises the pastoral function within the diocese with ordinary, proper, and immediate power appropriate to his office.[29] Thus he alone has the authority to convoke a diocesan synod.

A diocesan administrator who presides over the diocese in a temporary fashion, as on the occasion of a vacant or impeded see, does not have the full scope of authority of a diocesan bishop.[30] In various diocesan matters his authority is circumscribed.[31] His ability to act in more significant diocesan administrative issues is even more restricted.[32] Because a diocesan synod is an exceptional event, it is logical that a diocesan administrator lacks the authority to convene a synod. This restriction is consistent with the age-old principle, "Sede vacante, nihil innovetur."[33]

Just as the diocesan bishop convokes the synod, usually by means of a formal decree,[34] so also he normally presides over it. The second paragraph of this canon states this norm and then provides for an exception to it, namely, that for individual sessions of the synod, a vicar general or episcopal vicar can fulfill this function in his stead. The one who substitutes for the diocesan bishop is to do so only for individual sessions; a diocesan bishop would presumably not delegate another to act for him throughout the entirety of the synod. Prior to invoking this exception, it would be advisable to review the synod's primary purpose, that is, to offer assistance to the diocesan bishop. Having another person preside over the synod would seem to run counter to this primary function. This canon specifically designates a vicar general or episcopal vicar as those to whom delegation may be given.

The actual issuing of synodal documents is part of the legislative governance function of the diocesan bishop and cannot, therefore, be delegated.[35] Presiding over the synod, however, is part of the executive governance function of the diocesan bishop and can, therefore, be delegated. As with other forms of delegation, the diocesan bishop should designate in writing the specific person who is to act in his place.[36] In those dioceses with more than one vicar general and/or episcopal vicar, priority should be given to "one already invested with the episcopal dignity (Coadjutor or Auxiliary Bishop)."[37]

This canon presumes that the synod is not a solitary event but rather will consist of a series of

[29] Canons 381, 391.

[30] See c. 427, §1.

[31] The administrator cannot issue dimissorial letters under ordinary circumstances without the consent of the college of consultors (c. 1018, §1), nor can he issue dimissorial letters previously denied by the bishop (c. 1018, §2). He can allow access to the secret archives only in necessity (c. 490, §2). His removal of the chancellor or other notaries from office requires the consent of the college of consultors (c. 485).

[32] For example, during a vacant see the administrator can neither establish public associations of the Christian faithful (c. 312, §1, 3°) nor entrust a parish to a religious institute (c. 520, §1).

[33] Canon 428, §1: "When a see is vacant, nothing is to be altered."

[34] See cc. 48, 50–51. The CFB Instruction indicates that the issuance of this decree is required, usually on the occasion of a significant liturgical feast. Origins 27 (October 23, 1997) 326.

[35] Canon 135, §2.

[36] See c. 131, §3.

[37] Origins 27 (October 23, 1997) 325.

sessions. "The synodal sessions should be arranged over a period of time to study the questions raised during the sessions, as well as to make interventions during the discussions."[38]

Membership of the Diocesan Synod

Canon 463 — §1. The following must be called to a diocesan synod as members of the synod and are obliged to participate in it:

1° a coadjutor bishop and auxiliary bishops;

2° vicars general, episcopal vicars, and the judicial vicar;

3° canons of the cathedral church;

4° members of the presbyteral council;

5° lay members of the Christian faithful, even members of institutes of consecrated life, chosen by the pastoral council in a manner and number to be determined by the diocesan bishop or, where this council does not exist, in a manner determined by the diocesan bishop;

6° the rector of the diocesan major seminary;

7° vicars forane;

8° at least one presbyter from each vicariate forane, chosen by all those who have the care of souls there; also another presbyter must be chosen who, if the first is impeded, is to take his place;

9° some superiors of religious institutes and of societies of apostolic life which have a house in the diocese, chosen in a number and manner determined by the diocesan bishop.

§2. The diocesan bishop can also call others to a diocesan synod as members of the synod; they can be clerics, members of institutes of consecrated life, or lay members of the Christian faithful.

§3. If the diocesan bishop has judged it opportune, he can invite as observers to the diocesan synod other ministers or members of Churches or ecclesial communities which are not in full communion with the Catholic Church.

[38] Ibid., 328.

This canon provides a lengthy list of those who either must or can be called to comprise the synod. The bishop's obligation to convene certain persons is balanced by their obligation to participate in it, and the fact that the diocesan bishop must convene certain persons gives them a right to attend. However, he enjoys a degree of discretion in relation to those he may choose to call to the synod either as members or observers.

The list of synod participants designated in canon 463 can be divided into several categories: members who are called by reason of the office they hold; members who are to be selected by various groups or individuals; members who are designated by the diocesan bishop; those who can be invited to participate as observers.[39]

The first paragraph of this canon indicates those whom the diocesan bishop is obliged to call as members of the synod. First among this group (c. 463, §1, 1°) are the coadjutor bishop and any auxiliary bishops. Their presence at a synod is consistent both with their general diocesan leadership role and the purpose of the synod. Since these bishops are to "assist the diocesan bishop in the entire governance of the diocese,"[40] and the synod is convened to "offer assistance to the diocesan bishop for the good of the whole [diocese],"[41] their presence and participation in the synod are logical. If the provisions of canon 406 were observed, however, namely that coadjutor and auxiliary bishops are to be named vicars general or episcopal vicars, they would be included among those who must be convened by reason of those offices as designated in the following category.

[39] G. Read in CLSGBI Com, 259 observes that the synod is not an open assembly or pastoral congress to which all who wish may be admitted. Such an opinion is consistent with the caution in the CFB Instruction that diocesan assemblies be distinguished from synods. It would not be contrary to the law, however, for the diocesan bishop to invite the entire population of a very small diocese as synod participants; he would have to consider the practicality of such a plan.

[40] Canon 405, §2.

[41] Canon 460.

Because they assist the diocesan bishop in the executive governance of the diocese, either in its entirety or in designated regions or activities, vicars general and episcopal vicars are logically among those who must be called as members of the synod (c. 463, §1, 2°). The judicial vicar exercises a similar role in relation to the bishop's judicial function and, therefore, also is included among those whom the diocesan bishop must convene.[42]

The third group who must participate in the synod (c. 463, §1, 3°) are the canons of the cathedral church. In many dioceses there is no such group and thus this portion of the canon would be inapplicable. Some mention should be made, however, of a change in legislation in this area which does appear to be significant. Under the 1917 code, if there were no cathedral chapter, the diocesan consultors were to be called in their place (CIC 358, §1, 2°). This provision is not found in the current law. Some would say that, because of the fact that the subsequent group mentioned among those who must be called is the presbyteral council (c. 463, §1, 4°), the consultors would necessarily be included.[43] However, the term of office of an individual consultor may exceed his term on the presbyteral council. Thus, he would be a member of the college of consultors without being a member of the council. Under such circumstances, certain members of the college of consultors might not be obliged to participate in the synod or have a right to do so. Obviously, because he may appoint additional members (c. 462, §2), the diocesan bishop could supply for this apparent lacuna in the law by his personal appointment of any such individuals.

As just mentioned, the members of the presbyteral council are among those whom the diocesan bishop must convene. Their presence is also consistent with their role as the preeminent diocesan consultative body. The presbyteral council exists to "assist the bishop in the governance of the diocese . . . to promote as much as possible the pastoral good of [the diocese],"[44] and the purpose of the synod is offering assistance for the good of the diocese. The presbyteral council is the one group which must be consulted by the diocesan bishop prior to his decision to convoke a synod; their presence at the synod is, therefore, logical as well.

All of the aforementioned synod members are necessarily presbyters by reason of the requirements of the offices they hold or the roles they play. Subsequently, the membership of the synod is expanded to include more representation from the whole of the people of God.

Certain lay members of the Christian faithful must be called as members of the synod (c. 463, §1, 5°); the manner in which they are designated for synodal membership may vary from diocese to diocese. If there is a pastoral council[45] in the diocese, it is to be involved in the designation of the lay membership of the synod. While laity are among the members of the pastoral council, this canon does not seem to require that those who serve on it be named to the synod, rather they are simply to be involved in the selection process. It is the bishop's prerogative to determine the manner in which the selection takes place as well as the number of persons selected. If there is no pastoral council, the diocesan bishop is to designate some other means by which these lay members are chosen for membership in the synod.

While the members of the synod need not be the same as those of the pastoral council, the 1997 instruction suggests that the same principles governing the representative membership of the council and the qualities expected of council members be utilized in selecting the members of the synod.[46] Thus they are to be "selected in such a way that they truly reflect the entire portion of the people of God which constitutes the diocese, with consideration given to the different areas of the diocese, so-

[42] Judicial vicars were not included in an earlier version of this canon but were added, without comment or explanation, in the 1980 schema (Comm 12 [1980] 317).

[43] D. Ross, "Participation in the Synod," ME 116 (1991) 464.

[44] Canon 495, §1.

[45] Canons 511–514.

[46] Origins 27 (October 23, 1997) 325–326.

cial conditions and professions, and the role which they have in the apostolate whether individually or joined with others."[47] They are also to be chosen because they are "outstanding in firm faith, good morals, and prudence."[48]

Among the lay participants can be included members of religious and secular institutes. It would appear to be within the authority of the diocesan bishop to indicate a certain number or proportion of the lay members who are to come from such institutes when he designates the manner of selection. Alternately, since he retains the right to name additional members, he could determine that the synod membership does not adequately represent the full scope of that portion of the people of God entrusted to him, and name members of such institutes as well as members of societies of apostolic life who are not specifically included among those listed for potential membership.

Clerical members of institutes of consecrated life or societies of apostolic life are not included under this title of membership. However, they may be members under other titles of mandatory membership or by reason of personal designation by the diocesan bishop to ensure proper representation of the diocese at large.

Given the prescriptions of paragraph three of canon 463, those to be included among these lay members would be Catholics in full communion. The 1997 instruction specifies that these lay members of the faithful are to be "in a canonically regular situation in order to take part in the [s]ynod."[49]

While clerics are also members of the pastoral council, their membership in the synod is based on other reasons. Deacons may also serve on the pastoral council. However, neither in this provision for synod membership nor in the other categories of obligatory synod members does it appear to be required that any deacons be called to membership in the synod. However, the diocesan bishop could designate such clerics as members of the synod.

Also to be named to the synod is the rector of the diocesan major seminary if such exists in the diocese (c. 463, §1, 6°). Rectors of other seminaries, either those of religious institutes or minor seminaries or interdiocesan seminaries, are not mandatory participants in the synod. The presence of the seminary rector is appropriate because of his significance in the formation of those who will assume positions of leadership in the diocese.

Given their role in the coordination of pastoral activity in a region of the diocese,[50] the presence of the vicars forane as members of the synod (c. 463, §1, 7°) contributes to the fulfillment of its purpose. While each vicar exercises his coordinating function only within a portion of the diocese, the cumulative presence of all of these vicars provides a representation of the needs and conditions of the diocese as a whole before the synod.

The next category of persons to be selected for membership in the synod are the priests of the diocese (c. 463, §1, 8°). In order to ensure a presbyteral representation from the whole of the diocese similar to that of the lay representation, at least one priest from each vicariate forane is to be selected for membership. This provision states the minimum number of priests from each vicariate, but the diocesan bishop could designate a larger number or, in fact, in dioceses with fewer priests he could designate the whole of the presbyterate as synod members.[51]

If there is to be a selection process, the canon does not specify the manner of selection, merely those who are to be selected and those who do the selecting. Obviously, from the very wording of the canon, those to be selected under this provision are priests, but the canon does not designate them as diocesan, secular,[52] or members of insti-

[47] Canon 512, §2.

[48] Canon 512, §3.

[49] Origins 27 (October 23, 1997) 326. As an instruction this document is not making new law. It may be clarifying the meaning of "full communion" in this context.

[50] Canon 555, §1, 1°.

[51] Origins 27 (October 23, 1997) 326.

[52] The category "secular" includes members of personal prelatures (c. 294).

tutes of consecrated life or societies of apostolic life. Therefore, a priest from any of these categories would appear to be eligible for synod membership.

Those who do the selecting are "those who have the care of souls" in each vicariate forane. Priests, deacons, and laity can have the "care of souls." There is a distinction, however, between those who hold offices entailing "full care of souls," which offices are restricted to priests, and those who hold other offices entailing partial care of souls and are not required to be priests.[53] The context of this canon would seem to indicate that "those who have the care of souls" and are involved in the selection process for priest representatives from each vicariate forane to the synod are themselves priests of that territory. Again, the selectors are not restricted to diocesan priests but to all priests of the vicariate.

The selection process is to be designated by the diocesan bishop. It could include an election which follows the norms for canonical elections[54] or some other process for choosing synodal representatives. Since the presbyteral council of a diocese is also to be a representative body[55] whose selection process and criteria are designated in its statutes, that already established selection process could be reviewed as a possible model for the manner of synod selections.

While elsewhere in the synod legislation[56] synod members are prohibited from sending a substitute if they are impeded from attending, there is a contrary provision for these presbyteral synodal representatives. In the vicariate forane selection process, a second priest is also to be designated should the originally selected one be impeded from participation. The canon addresses the situation in which the original representative, impeded from participation in one session of the synod, becomes capable of participation in subsequent sessions.

The final category of members who must be called to the synod are superiors of religious institutes and societies of apostolic life (c. 463, §1, 9°). The manner of selection for these synod members is not determined in the law but rather by the diocesan bishop who also specifies the number of individuals.

There are two prerequisites for those who are eligible for selection under this title: they must be superiors and their institute or society must have a house in the diocese. The canon neither designates the individual as a major superior[57] nor requires that the superior be domiciled within the diocese. An institute could have a house within the diocese, and the major superior of that institute, residing elsewhere, could be selected for synod membership. The diocesan bishop should take such considerations into account as he designates the manner in which the selection process is to proceed.

The superiors mentioned in the canon are those of religious institutes and societies of apostolic life; there is no distinction here between those which are clerical and those which are lay. Nor are secular institutes included in this canon even though they may be present within the diocese. The diocesan bishop could include a representative from this category under the provisions of paragraph two.

Regardless of the title under which these synodal representative are called, their designation as members should be communicated in writing by the diocesan bishop. Likewise, their acceptance of membership should be communicated to him in writing. The canon does not address a situation in which an individual is designated for membership either by reason of office or representative selection yet later loses the foundation upon which the membership was based, either prior to or during the course of the synod. For example, a priest could have been selected as a vicariate representative during the preparatory stages, and at some point prior to the actual gathering of the synod he has been transferred to an assignment which takes [53] See Ross, 473.

[54] Canons 164–179.

[55] Canon 499.

[56] Canon 464.

[57] Canon 620.

him out of the vicariate he is chosen to represent. He would not appear to be impeded as such, but the basis for his selection no longer exists. Such could also be the case of a vicar general or episcopal vicar who ceases from such office during the course of the synod.

Having completed in paragraph one the designation of those who must be called to synod membership, the canon leaves to the discretion of the diocesan bishop the designation of additional members. While these additional members are not mandated, once named to the synod, they are full members with the right to full participation. In naming additional members, the diocesan bishop will want to take into account "those ecclesial vocations or the various apostolic works not sufficiently represented among elected members, to give adequate expression to the true make-up of the diocese."[58] It is under the auspices of this free selection process that the diocesan bishop will want to consider those categories of persons noted already as not being included under a mandatory title, such as deacons, superiors of secular institutes, or members of societies of apostolic life. Again, both selection and acceptance should be communicated in writing.

The final paragraph of this canon provides for an additional category of persons to attend the synod. They are distinct from those already mentioned since they are not formally members of the synod but are rather observers. These observers can be designated at the discretion of the diocesan bishop from among the ministers and members of other Christian churches or ecclesial communities not in full communion with the Catholic Church. As observers they lack the right to participate in consultative votes, but they could be given the right to a voice in the discussions. Their presence would add an ecumenical dimension to the matters under consideration by the synod, thus reflecting the experience of Vatican II itself.[59] A practical recommendation in the 1997 instruction is that these observers be selected in consultation with the leadership of the churches or ecclesial communities involved.[60]

The canon does not seem to provide for the selection of non-Christians as synod observers. However, such a selection would appear to be within the discretion of the diocesan bishop.[61] An interfaith component could be a significant factor, especially in those regions where there is a large number of non-Christians or significant interaction with members and leaders of non-Christian religions such as Judaism or Islam.

Canon 464 — If a member of the synod is prevented by a legitimate impediment, the member cannot send a proxy to attend it in his or her name. The member, however, is to inform the diocesan bishop of this impediment.

With the exception noted above regarding the substitute for the presbyteral representative from a vicariate forane, other members of the synod may not send a substitute or proxy in their place if they are impeded from attending. This restriction applies to all members of the synod, both those who must be convened and those whom the diocesan bishop chooses to convene. While individual members who are impeded are not permitted on their own authority to send a substitute or proxy, the diocesan bishop could establish a manner of designating a substitute, and he himself could admit that person to the synod. Since certain individuals, such as lay persons chosen by the pastoral council (c. 463, §1, 5°) or superiors (c. 463, §1, 9°), are to be selected in a "manner determined by the diocesan bishop," this manner could include a means of designating an alternate whom the diocesan bishop could admit to the synod.[62]

The individual who is impeded from participation is to inform the diocesan bishop of this fact.

[58] Origins 27 (October 23, 1997) 326.

[59] Ibid.

[60] Ibid.

[61] J. Alesandro, in CLSA Com, 381.

[62] Since this canon applies only to those who are "members," unless the diocesan bishop has determined otherwise, observers (c. 463, §3) may send substitutes if unable to attend personally. See Alesandro, in CLSA Com, 381.

Such a communication would ordinarily be in writing but the canon does not require this. Informing the bishop in a timely fashion would be important if he intends to name a substitute. The canon does not distinguish between absence from the synod as a whole or from an individual session.

Finally, it should be noted that all synod members must make a profession of faith before the synod discussions commence (c. 833, 1°). Ordinarily the profession takes place after the first solemn session. The bishop makes his profession in the presence of the gathered synod. The other members are to do so in the presence of the diocesan bishop as president of the synod or his delegate. Obviously this same requirement cannot be imposed on those who are merely observers. The formula for the profession of faith is that issued in 1989.[63]

Synod Participation and Outcomes

Canon 465 — All proposed questions are subject to the free discussion of the members during sessions of the synod.

The matters to be studied at the synod arise from and are shaped by the experience of the local church. Even in those situations in which the synod is engaged in a process of drafting particular legislation in compliance with universal law, there will be variations among the churches in adapting the directives of that law. In order that the fullest experience of the synodal process might be possible, this canon assures that the members of the synod have the right to discuss freely the matters before the synod. Such free discussion would preclude the devolution of the synod into merely a perfunctory gathering to rubber stamp decisions already made.

Once called to the synod, the members have a concrete opportunity to exercise several of their rights as members of the Christian faithful. They can make known their needs and desires,[64] and express their opinions[65] based on their individual knowledge and competence. For example, parents who have experienced a need for more coordinated sacramental preparation for their children could raise that concern during discussions of diocesan educational directions. Those who have special expertise in religious education could, likewise, help frame issues surrounding age-appropriate catechetics. The synod participants can also further their education into Christian maturity[66] or engage freely in theological discussions according to their expertise.[67]

Free discussion and the exercise of one's rights in the context of a synod should not result, however, in any sense of disorder or disharmony. Careful preparation of general rules of order or procedural norms can produce sessions which are well ordered and yet allow for interaction and discussion.[68] While, as noted above, the diocesan bishop or his delegate presides over the synodal sessions, the presider need not be the one who coordinates or facilitates the discussion. In his presiding role, however, the diocesan bishop has the ultimate responsibility to see to the good order of the synod. Such good order would obviously include managing the manner in which interventions are made, questions are raised, and issues are discussed. The presider's responsibility would include seeing to it that mechanisms are in place to achieve these ends while not necessarily having to manage them personally. Additionally, the good order of the synod would include the responsibility of seeing to it that the synod deliberations contribute to or at least do not detract from the good of the diocese.[69]

[63] AAS 81 (1989) 104–105.
[64] Canon 212, §2.

[65] Canon 212, §3.
[66] Canon 217.
[67] Canon 218.
[68] Origins 27 (October 23, 1997) 328.
[69] The CFB Instruction states that, in light of the diocesan bishop's concern for the bonds which unite the particular and the universal Church, he is to exclude from the discussion any matters "discordant with the perennial doctrine of the Church or the Magisterium or concerning material reserved to Supreme ecclesiastical authority or to other ecclesiastical authorities." Like-

Canon 466 — The only legislator in a diocesan synod is the diocesan bishop; the other members of the synod possess only a consultative vote. Only he signs the synodal declarations and decrees, which can be published by his authority alone.

Within the diocese entrusted to his care, the diocesan bishop exercises his pastoral governance role with legislative, executive, and judicial power.[70] Unlike the latter two powers, legislative power cannot be delegated but must be exercised personally.[71] Canon 466 is consistent with this principle and highlights the bishop's central role within the synod as the only legislator.

As with other areas of diocesan governance, the bishop exercises his episcopal office not in isolation but in consultation with other members of the Christian faithful. The other members of the synod, in assisting the diocesan bishop, play a consultative role. This role, however, is a significant one. While the final decision on matters before the synod rests with the diocesan bishop, the entire decision-making process is a consultative one involving all the members of the synod.[72]

The opinions of the members of the synod may be sought by the bishop even by means of consultative votes on various issues before them. "Since the [s]ynod is not a college with decisional capacity, such votes are not intended as a binding majority decision.... [R]ather... their purpose is to indicate the degree of concurrence among the synodal members with regard to a given proposal."[73] Remaining free in his ultimate decision, the diocesan bishop "may wish to accept the view expressed by the members of the [s]ynod, unless there should exist [in his prudential judgment] some grave obstacle."[74]

The issuance and publication of the synod decrees are legislative acts of the diocesan bishop. Since he is the sole legislator, it is appropriate that he alone sign the decrees and authorize their publication. With this promulgation of synodal legislation, the diocesan bishop may either establish a specific suspensive period (vacatio legis) before it takes effect or allow the general norm of one month from the promulgation date to be the effective date.[75]

Canon 467 — The diocesan bishop is to communicate the texts of the synodal declarations and decrees to the metropolitan and the conference of bishops.

Synodal legislation applies only within the diocese. Nonetheless, the sharing of the results of the synod with the metropolitan and the conference of bishops promotes ecclesial communion at the provincial and conference level. However, the legislation need not be confirmed at these other levels.[76] Nor is there a need for Roman review (recognitio) as is true for episcopal conference (c. 455, §2) or particular council (c. 446) norms.

Earlier drafts of this canon had also required that the synodal legislation be communicated to the Apostolic See. This requirement was eventually omitted because the consultors judged that it evoked an ecclesiology that was too centralized.[77] However, the 1997 instruction reintroduces a call for the communication of the synodal documents to the Apostolic See, either to the Congregation for Bishops or to the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples, through the appropriate pontifical representative in the region.[78] The rationale for the inclusion of this "requirement," particularly in wise the bishop is cautioned not to allow the use of the synod as a vehicle to transmit similarly contrary opinions or polls to higher authority. Origins 27 (October 23, 1997) 328.

[70] Canon 391, §1.

[71] Canons 391, §2; 135, §2.

[72] For more on consultative decision-making, see R. Kennedy, "Shared Responsibility in Ecclesial Decision-Making," Stud Can 14 (1980) 5–23.

[73] Origins 27 (October 23, 1997) 328.

[74] Ibid.

[75] Canon 8, §2.

[76] Alesandro, in CLSA Com, 382.

[77] Rel, 111.

[78] Origins 27 (October 23, 1997) 328–329.

light of the reasons for its previous omission, is not mentioned in the document and may indicate renewed efforts toward centralization. Again, the instruction mentions communication and does not imply the need for confirmation or approval of the synodal documents.

Cessation of a Synod

Canon 468 — §1. The diocesan bishop is competent to suspend or dissolve a diocesan synod according to his prudent judgment.

§2. When an episcopal see is vacant or impeded, a diocesan synod is interrupted by the law itself until the succeeding diocesan bishop has decided that it is to be continued or has declared it terminated.

Just as the diocesan bishop is the competent authority to convene a synod, so also is he capable of suspending or dissolving the synod. He is to do so based on his own prudent judgment, that is, based on some reasons that are at least as serious as the fact of ending the synod. Because of the presbyteral council's consultative role in more important matters of diocesan governance, such as holding a synod,[79] the council would be an appropriate source of advice before the bishop decides to suspend or dissolve a synod.[80] The decision to suspend or dissolve the synod should be communicated in writing unless such a step is impossible. If the decision is for suspension of the synod, rather than its dissolution, and the suspension is not indefinite, a resumption date should also be communicated.

In addition to the bishop's suspension or dissolution of the synod, the law itself decrees its interruption during the time a see is vacant or impeded. A see becomes vacant with the diocesan bishop's death, his resignation accepted by the pope, his transfer, or his removal from office once notice has been communicated to him.[81] The inability of the diocesan bishop to communicate with and therefore care for the people entrusted to him, either by reason of his captivity, banishment, exile, or incapacity, results in an impeded see.[82]

Only the succeeding diocesan bishop is able to continue or terminate the synod; a diocesan administrator of a vacant see or the individual who assumes governance of an impeded see may not do so. The new diocesan bishop remains free to reconstitute the synod or to dissolve it. In his reconvening of the synod he is also free to alter its membership, procedures, or agenda.

[79] Canon 500, §2.

[80] Origins 27 (October 23, 1997) 328.

[81] Canon 416.

CHAPTER II
THE DIOCESAN CURIA
[cc. 469–494]

A diocese is entrusted to the diocesan bishop for his pastoral care.[83] He is not alone, however, in fulfilling the responsibilities entrusted to him. One of the vehicles available to assist him in his administration of the diocese is his curia. The five canons that introduce this chapter provide general norms on the operation and coordination of the curia. The subsequent articles in this chapter address specific institutes and persons who comprise the curia.

The corresponding article in the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches consists of only two canons. The first provides a lengthier, but still not comprehensive, list of curial members than does the corresponding canon under our consideration.[84] Like his counterpart, the diocesan bishop, the eparchial bishop is free both to appoint those who will serve in the eparchial curia and to remove them from office.[85] Members of the eparchial curia are bound to take an oath of office and

[82] Canon 412.

[83] Canons 369, 381.

[84] Compare CCEO 243, §2, which lists ten specific curial offices or institutes, with the more generic statement of c. 469.

[85] CCEO 244, §1.

make a promise of secrecy similar to that of their Latin colleagues.[86]

Meaning, Purpose, and Composition of the Curia

Canon 469 — The diocesan curia consists of those institutions and persons which assist the bishop in the governance of the whole diocese, especially in guiding pastoral action, in caring for the administration of the diocese, and in exercising judicial power.

This initial canon defines the diocesan curia as consisting of both persons and institutions. The curia consists of those individuals as well as those structures which exist to assist the diocesan bishop in his governance responsibilities. The canon highlights a threefold focus for the function of the diocesan curia: guiding pastoral action, conducting general administration, and exercising judicial power.

Beyond these general designations, however, the diocesan bishop has broad discretion in determining the structure and composition of the diocesan curia. Subsequent articles in this chapter will provide more specific norms on certain required officers of diocesan administration such as vicars, chancellors, and finance officers. Even within these required areas the diocesan bishop has a great degree of latitude in specific applications of the law. He is free to make his own determinations in such matters as: the areas of concern assigned to vicars, if and how many vice chancellors shall be appointed, how the finance officer should relate to others involved in financial matters such as development directors or fund raisers. The size and complexity of the diocesan curia will vary with the needs of different dioceses.

Common components of the diocesan curia will include "pastoral, social-charitable, and liturgical departments."[87] Among the usual divisions of that portion of the diocesan curia responsible for pastoral matters are such areas as schools and religious education.

[86] CCEO 244, §2.

[87] Directory 200.

The overall purpose of the curia is to assist the diocesan bishop in discharging his pastoral governance responsibilities. The curial offices exist "to be the means for studying, planning and carrying through the pastoral program which the bishop weighs and ponders together with his [presbyteral and pastoral] councils."[88]

Canon 470 — The appointment of those who exercise offices in the diocesan curia pertains to the diocesan bishop.

Consistent with the purpose of the diocesan curia, namely, to assist the diocesan bishop in discharging his governance role, this canon designates him as the one authorized to make appointments to curial offices. While every diocese, using tools and processes developed within the human resources field,[89] will have established its own practical means of surfacing, interviewing, and presenting candidates for various offices, the final appointment to office rests with the diocesan bishop.[90] There are some specific provisions in law for appointment to certain offices; for example, the bishop must consult the finance council and college of consultors prior to appointing the finance officer.[91]

Some curial positions clearly exist as ecclesiastical offices, that is, "function[s] constituted in a stable manner by divine or ecclesiastical ordinance to be exercised for a spiritual purpose."[92] They are established as such by universal law. Universal

[88] Ibid.

[89] The National Association of Church Personnel Administrators (NACPA), headquartered in Cincinnati, Ohio, can serve dioceses in their development and evaluation of personnel systems. NACPA attempts to integrate good management and human resources principles with pastoral values.

[90] See c. 157 on free conferral of offices in the diocese.

[91] Canon 494, §1. See also Read, in CLSGBI Com, 262.

[92] Canon 145, §1. A complete review of the general norms on ecclesiastical office would be useful prior to establishing or realigning any curial offices.

law, however, is not the only source of ecclesiastical office; the diocesan bishop can establish ecclesiastical offices by means of particular law.

With the establishment of an office its rights and obligations are defined.[93] Certain criteria, such as one's being in the communion of the Church and capable of discharging the office[94] must be met before an individual can be provided with an office. In some cases being an ordained presbyter is a prerequisite for an office, for example when it entails the full care of souls[95] as in the case of a pastor,[96] or when the law establishes such a prerequisite as in the case of a vicar general or episcopal vicar.[97]

The appointment to office can be for a designated or an indefinite period of time. Once the office is conferred on a person, there is a presumption of stability. However, the degree of stability will vary. A vicar general can be removed freely at the bishop's discretion; a pastor, however, can be removed only after a formal process. Because of this stability in office, an individual can be removed from the office only for cause, and in some instances according to established procedures.[98] Furthermore, even removal from office does not necessarily terminate a financial responsibility toward the individual.[99] Civil contract provisions[100] as well as the demands of social justice[101] will dictate financial arrangements to be made upon termination.

Although not required for validity, appointments to curial offices should be made in writing[102] and notarized by the chancellor or another ecclesiastical notary.[103]

While it is important to apply the norms on ecclesiastical offices to some curial members, it is not always easy when viewing diocesan organizational charts or management systems, to determine which, if any, curial positions have been constituted as ecclesiastical offices by particular law. Not every position within the diocesan curia needs to be established as an office in order to contribute to the ministry and work of the diocese.

Canon 471 — All those who are admitted to offices in the curia must:

1° promise to fulfill their function faithfully according to the manner determined by law or by the bishop;

2° observe secrecy within the limits and according to the manner determined by law or by the bishop.

Once it has been determined which curial positions are truly constituted as ecclesiastical offices, the norms of this canon are applied to them. It imposes two obligations on the officeholder: one, to promise faithful fulfillment of the obligations of the office and two, to preserve the confidentiality required by the office. The means by which the promise is communicated and the person to whom it is communicated are not specified in the canon. The promise of fidelity to the obligations of the office would presumably be made to the diocesan bishop or his delegate. Since it is the diocesan bishop who appoints to office and, in the case of offices established under particular law, defines the office, this conclusion seems appropriate.[104] The promise should be made in writing and a written record of it kept on file.

[93] Canon 145, §2.
[94] Canon 149, §1.
[95] Canon 150.
[96] Canon 521, §1.
[97] Canon 478, §1.
[98] Canons 192–195.
[99] Canon 195.
[100] Canon 1290.
[101] See NACPA, Just Treatment for Those Who Work for the Church (Cincinnati: NACPA, 1986). See also CLSA, "Canonical Standards in Labor-Management Relations: A Report," CLSAP (1987) 311–335, for a correlation between the Church's social teaching and its institutional responsibility toward church workers.

[102] Canon 156.
[103] Canon 474.
[104] This conclusion is also consistent with c. 833, 5° which determines that the vicar general, episcopal vicar, and judicial vicar, all curial officers, make their profession of faith in the presence of the diocesan bishop or his delegate.

The obligation of observing the necessary level of secrecy could be seen as an expectation of faithful fulfillment of the office, and, therefore, it could be included as an element of the promise noted above. The level of secrecy to be maintained is that which is defined in the law[105] or by the bishop himself. Obviously, if an office holder is to be held accountable, the confidentiality expected of the person must be clearly communicated, preferably in the written position description or in a general policy manual or personnel handbook.

Canon 472 — The prescripts of Book VII, Processes, are to be observed regarding cases and persons which belong to the exercise of judicial power in the curia. The prescripts of the following canons, however, are to be observed regarding those things which pertain to the administration of the diocese.

As noted in the canon which introduced this chapter, the work of the diocesan curia is pastoral, administrative, and judicial. For judicial matters the norms of Book VII, devoted to procedures, are to be applied. For all other curial activity, the norms in the remainder of this chapter are to be observed. The fact that there are different canonical norms to govern the judicial function as opposed to the pastoral or administrative does not mean that the tribunal is completely separated or isolated from the rest of the curia; tribunal personnel are truly part of the curia as stated in canon 469. When personnel or other matters distinct from the internal working of the judicial processes are being considered within the curia, input from and communication with tribunal personnel or their representative would be important.

[105]In some cases the law determines the degree of confidentiality to be observed. For example, members of the presbyteral council are not to divulge the contents of their meetings (c. 500, §2), and judges and other tribunal personnel are bound to varying degrees of secrecy based on the nature of the case before them (c. 1455).

Coordination of Curial Activity

Canon 473 — §1. A diocesan bishop must take care that all the affairs which belong to the administration of the whole diocese are duly coordinated and are ordered to attain more suitably the good of the portion of the people of God entrusted to him.

§2. It is for the diocesan bishop himself to coordinate the pastoral action of the vicars general or episcopal vicars. Where it is expedient, a moderator of the curia can be appointed who must be a priest and who, under the authority of the bishop, is to coordinate those things which pertain to the treatment of administrative affairs and to take care that the other members of the curia properly fulfill the office entrusted to them.

§3. Unless in the judgment of the bishop local circumstances suggest otherwise, the vicar general or if there are several, one of the vicars general, is to be appointed moderator of the curia.

§4. Where the bishop has judged it expedient, he can establish an episcopal council, consisting of the vicars general and episcopal vicars, to foster pastoral action more suitably.

Regardless of the simplicity or complexity of the curial structure, whenever two or more persons or offices are functioning to serve a common end, as they are intended to do within the curia as a whole, coordination of their activities is essential. Likewise, the diocesan bishop is obliged to see that all the works of the apostolate are coordinated (c. 394, §1). This canon provides a variety of ways in which that coordination can occur. It is to be noted that, while none of the means of coordination proposed in the canon is mandatory, the practice of coordination is an expectation.

As the one ultimately responsible for the ministry of the diocesan curia, the diocesan bishop is also ultimately responsible for the coordination of the activities of the curia. While different management styles and structural configurations will result in more or less direct episcopal involvement in the daily activity of the various curial offices, the diocesan bishop remains the chief pastor and leader of the diocese. Hence, his coordination of the activities of those whom he appoints to curial offices is truly an integral component of his episcopal office.

One model of curial organization includes the appointment of various vicars to assume ordinary, executive authority over the whole diocese or over various parts of the diocese or apostolic functions within the diocese.[106] As vicars, they act in the name and stead of the diocesan bishop. Hence, it is proper that the diocesan bishop himself be designated as responsible for the coordination of their pastoral activities.

In those circumstances in which the diocesan bishop deems it appropriate, rather than coordinating all of the curial activities himself, he can designate someone, provided it is a priest, to coordinate the work of other members of the curia. This individual, aptly named a moderator of the curia, functions under the authority of the diocesan bishop to assist him in his coordination of the administrative activities of the curia.

This section of the canon seems to distinguish between the curial activity of the vicars, designating it as "pastoral," and the curial activity of others, indicating that it is "administrative." Should the diocesan bishop determine that it is in the best interests of the diocese to name a moderator of the curia, therefore, it would seem that the coordination function of this individual would be in relation to administrative activities rather than pastoral ones. There will be situations, however, in which the two realms of activity are so interrelated as to be virtually indistinguishable. Furthermore, the moderator of the curia would not direct the work of the vicars but that of others in the curia.[107] It needs to be kept in mind, however, that, in many dioceses, the heads of the various curial departments are designated as episcopal vicars. In such a case, the coordination of the departmental activities within the curia would be appropriate to a moderator of the curia. Clear lines of authority, accountability, and responsibility would be essential whatever design of coordination is enacted.

Having designated very generically the function of the moderator of the curia and set one prerequisite, presbyteral orders, the canon sets an additional, though not mandatory, standard, namely that the moderator of the curia be a vicar general (§3). The fact that the moderator also holds the office of vicar general does not mean that he automatically, as moderator, assumes a directive role over all other vicars, either general or episcopal. As noted above, the coordination of the pastoral activity of these vicars is primarily an episcopal function. As also noted above, however, there may be situations in which the administrative functions of the vicars would come under the direction of the moderator of the curia.

One final, optional vehicle for curial coordination is found in the last paragraph of the canon. Paragraph two established the principle that the diocesan bishop is responsible for the coordination of the pastoral activity of the vicars; paragraph four presents him with a means to exercise that responsibility. If he judges it to be useful in the context of his own curia, the diocesan bishop could establish a council composed of his vicars general and episcopal vicars. The purpose of this episcopal council seems clear. It exists as a means to examine and promote the coordination of the pastoral activities entrusted to the vicars.

The coordination of the work of the curia is essential if it is to provide true pastoral and administrative service to the diocese and not devolve into simply a series of bureaucratic structures with a life of their own divorced from the mission of the diocese. The means of coordination, however, can be many and varied based on a diocese's structural complexity, size, location, geographic spread, and praxis. Those vehicles for coordination that are suggested but not mandated in this canon can serve as a starting point for the diocesan bishop to determine the most appropriate means for curial coordination in his own diocese. He is also free to determine some of his own.

[106] For more on the roles of vicars, see the comments on cc. 475–481.

[107] Alesandro, in CLSA Com, 385.

For example, some bishops have found it helpful to meet regularly, monthly or weekly depending on the size and complexity of the curial structure, with those individuals, whether they be vicars or others,[108] charged with the management of various aspects of the curia. This group often forms a kind of "cabinet" for the diocesan bishop, ensuring that he is kept informed of the programs and projects being developed as well as the issues of concern being raised from or about various groups in the diocese. These meetings also provide the bishop with the opportunity to chart the course of the work of the curia, seeing that it is consistent with his own vision of the mission of the diocese.

Other forms of coordination can include annual or more frequent meetings of the entire staff of the curia with the diocesan bishop. Such meetings can provide the opportunity for an annual "state of the diocese" report from the diocesan bishop and can be a source of spiritual support and pastoral encouragement for those who serve the bishop and the diocese in various capacities, including administrative and support staff. These types of meetings will often include announcements of specific goals toward which all will strive in a concerted effort for the good of the diocese.

Canon 474 — For validity, acts of the curia which are to have juridic effect must be signed by the ordinary from whom they emanate; they must also be signed by the chancellor of the curia or a notary. The chancellor, moreover, is bound to inform the moderator of the curia concerning such acts.

For the diocesan bishop and his curia, written records of actions serve not only as proofs that something occurred but also as historical signposts of the diocese's evolution. This canon is deceptively simple; documents are to be signed, notarized, and communicated appropriately. However, beneath the surface of this simplicity, some technical canonical points need to be addressed.

The phrase "acts of the curia" (acta curiae) has a specific meaning. It does not refer to all of the daily, physical actions taken by the members of the curia. Nor does it refer to those actions called "juridic acts."[109] Rather, it refers to the formal, written documents which emanate from some members of the curia. While we are usually more accustomed to referring to judicial documentation as acts ("acts of the case" or "publication of the acts"), the administrative arena also generates "acts."

The acts, or documents, referenced in this canon are, even more specifically, those which are to have a juridic effect, that is, those which make something legally effective. These kinds of documents must be signed by the ordinary who issued them and countersigned or notarized by the chancellor or another ecclesiastical notary. The signature of the ordinary is for the validity of the curial act. Because the canon does not expressly state that the signature of the chancellor or notary is also required for the validity of the act, failure to obtain this countersignature would not invalidate it.[110] Examples of such curial acts would be incardination or excardination documents,[111] letters of appointment to office,[112] decrees establishing parish churches or chapels,[113] or other types of decrees,[114] dispensations,[115] or rescripts.[116]

This canon specifically refers to those curial acts issued by ordinaries. While they are not the [108] Various organizational structures exist in dioceses. In some cases the works of the curia are divided into departments or secretariats. Heads of these divisions are called, variously, delegates, directors, secretaries. Such persons do not necessarily have to be priests. See J. Provost, "Canonical Reflection on Selected Issues in Diocesan Governance," in The Ministry of Governance, ed. J. Mallet (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1986) 230.

[109] See cc. 124–128.

[110] See c. 10 for an expression of this principle.

[111] Canon 267, §1.

[112] Canon 156.

[113] Canon 1215, §1.

[114] Canon 51.

[115] Canon 85.

[116] Canon 59.

only persons who could issue such acts,[117] this canon governs only their acts. Therefore, if a curial act emanates from someone other than an ordinary, it would appear to be valid even if not properly signed or notarized. However, prescinding from issues of validity, good practice would dictate that such important acts be signed and notarized. Obviously, if the chancellor is the agent of the act, it should be notarized by another notary.

The signature of the chancellor would seem to serve two purposes. First, the chancellor attests by signature to the authenticity of the document. Second, as the one charged with the responsibility of gathering, arranging, and safeguarding curial acts,[118] the chancellor would need to be made aware of the issuance of such acts and serving as notary provides the opportunity for such an awareness.

While the chancellor is responsible for the coordination of curial acts, the moderator of the curia is responsible for the coordination of activity affected by such acts. Therefore, the final clause in this canon is appropriate. The chancellor is to inform the moderator of the curia of the issuance of any such acts so that the latter may assess their impact on the administrative activities of the curia as a whole. In those dioceses where there is no moderator of the curia, the chancellor would need to be aware of who would hold a parallel position, such as a vicar general, and provide the same information to that individual.

Article 1: Vicars General and Episcopal Vicars [cc. 475–481]

This article begins a description of a series of curial offices, some of which are mandatory. While the office of vicar general had existed under the previous code (CIC 366–371), it was not a required office as it is now. A new office, that of episcopal vicar, introduced through the teaching of Vatican II[119] and postconciliar norms,[120] is also incorporated into the law through the canons of this article. The offices of both vicar general and episcopal vicar are addressed also in canon 134 which includes them among those designated as ordinaries and local ordinaries who possess ordinary general executive power of governance. The scope of their power is circumscribed in the same canon whereby those administrative actions which are attributed directly to the diocesan bishop in the law are understood to pertain to him alone; vicars general and episcopal vicars require a special mandate for such actions.

Two similar offices are designated in the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches.[121] The titles are different, "protosyncellus" for vicar general and "syncellus" for episcopal vicar, but the roles are parallel. With minor variations,[122] the norms between the two codes are almost identical. Provisions specific to the Eastern churches[123] can be found, but the type and scope of power, the manner of appointment to office, and the means of ceasing from office are the same.

Vicar General: Definition

Canon 475 — §1. In each diocese the diocesan bishop must appoint a vicar general who is provided with ordinary power according to the norm of the following canons and who is to assist him in the governance of the whole diocese.

§2. As a general rule, one vicar general is to be appointed unless the size of the diocese, the number of inhabitants, or other pastoral reasons suggest otherwise.

[117] Certain members of the curia, such as a chancellor, may be delegated to issue acts which have a juridic effect.

[118] Canon 482, §1.

[119] CD 27.

[120] ES I.14.

[121] See, for example, CCEO 245–251.

[122] For example, among the qualifications for the office, celibacy is indicated as an expectation, admitting of particular law exceptions (CCEO 247, §2). Because celibacy is the norm for priests in the Latin church, such a requirement is not stated here.

[123] For example, the issue of the insignia of such offices is addressed in CCEO 250.

This canon introduces the first of the mandatory curial offices, that of the vicar general, whom every diocesan bishop must appoint. By reason of his office, a vicar acts in the name of another authority, exercising the executive authority of the diocesan bishop. The vicar general has ordinary power, attached to his office,[124] but it is vicarious, not proper,[125] because he exercises it not in his own name but in the name of the diocesan bishop. The power of the vicar general is executive in nature[126] and its scope is designated as the whole diocese. The main function of the vicar general is broadly described as being of assistance to the diocesan bishop in his executive governance role.

The second paragraph of this canon expresses a general principle but also allows for an exception. Ordinarily there is to be a single vicar general in the diocese. The reason for this general rule would flow logically from the nature of the office itself. The possibility of confusion of roles and overlapping functions increases when more persons exercise the same authority with the same scope of action, in this case ordinary executive power for the entire diocese. The potential for conflict and confusion can be reduced by an effectively functioning episcopal council[127] and well established expectations for and lines of communication among those who exercise the same authority.

While presumably only one vicar general will be appointed in the diocese, the diocesan bishop may name more than one, prompted by the size, population, or the pastoral needs of the diocese. In deciding to name more than one vicar general, the diocesan bishop will want to weigh these needs over and against the disadvantages of overlapping positions of authority.

It was not uncommon in the past to utilize the office of vicar general as an honorific title for priests or bishops, frequently retired bishops. There was often a tacit understanding, if not an explicit agreement, that the individual would not function in that capacity. Under the norms of the code such a designation would seem inappropriate. To vest someone with such broad executive power with the expectation that it not be exercised seems to be an empty gesture. Likewise, it seems inappropriate to appoint an individual as an additional vicar general with the understanding that he will act only in the absence of the diocesan bishop and the vicar general who regularly exercises that office.

In addition to those matters attributed in law to an ordinary or local ordinary, a vicar general may also be designated by mandate of the diocesan bishop to exercise authority which the law accords exclusively to the diocesan bishop. Examples of functions that are, at times, delegated to a vicar general include appointing individuals to pastoral offices,[128] issuing incardination or excardination documents,[129] issuing dimissorial letters,[130] permitting the establishment of a church or relegating it to secular use.[131]

Episcopal Vicar: Definition

Canon 476 — Whenever the correct governance of a diocese requires it, the diocesan bishop can also appoint one or more episcopal vicars, namely, those who in a specific part of the diocese or in a certain type of affairs or over the faithful of a specific rite or over certain groups of persons possess the same ordinary power which a vicar general has by universal law, according to the norm of the following canons.

Among the curial offices which can be established at the discretion of the diocesan bishop is that of episcopal vicar. In deciding whether or not to operate with a curial system which includes episcopal vicars, the diocesan bishop will take

[124] Canon 131, §1.
[125] Canon 131, §2.
[126] Canon 135, §1.
[127] Canon 473, §4.

[128] Canons 524 and 539.
[129] Canon 267, §1.
[130] Canon 1018, §1, 1°.
[131] Canons 1215, §1 and 1222.

into account what is required for effective governance in his particular diocese.

The role of the episcopal vicar is described as parallel to that of the vicar general. However, whereas the vicar general's executive authority is exercised in relation to the entire diocese, an episcopal vicar's similar authority is more circumscribed. He exercises his authority within a more restricted range in relation to a specific territory of the diocese, a specific type of activity, such as education, clergy, or health care, or a specific category of persons designated by rite or by some other characteristic such as language or culture.

In establishing the office of episcopal vicar, the diocesan bishop will need to "define accurately the area of [the episcopal vicar's] authority lest the jurisdiction of several persons should overlap or become doubtful."[132] Once the scope of authority is specified, an episcopal vicar exercises ordinary, vicarious, executive power in that distinct arena. In assigning areas of responsibility to the episcopal vicar, the diocesan bishop could also specify those actions, ordinarily reserved to himself, which are to be delegated by mandate to the episcopal vicar. Again, if a system of episcopal vicars is established in a diocese, the management of their activities is essential and should be handled within an episcopal council or a similar vehicle of coordination.

Appointment to Office

Canon 477 — §1. The diocesan bishop freely appoints a vicar general and an episcopal vicar and can freely remove them, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 406. An episcopal vicar who is not an auxiliary bishop is to be appointed only for a time to be determined in the act of appointment.

§2. When a vicar general is absent or legitimately impeded, a diocesan bishop can appoint another to take his place; the same norm applies to an episcopal vicar.

[132] Directory 202.

The diocesan bishop freely appoints both vicars general and episcopal vicars without necessarily having to consult anyone.[133] Likewise, he has the authority to remove them from the same offices[134] but within some limits. A coadjutor bishop and an auxiliary bishop endowed with special faculties must be appointed vicar general.[135] Other auxiliary bishops are to be named vicars general or at least episcopal vicars.[136]

The office of vicar general or episcopal vicar is not reserved to bishops, however. A priest may, and in those dioceses without a coadjutor or auxiliary bishop must, likewise be appointed as vicar general. In the case of appointment of a priest as vicar general, it is for an indefinite period of time. In the appointment of a priest to the office of episcopal vicar, there must be a designated term of office, not specified in the universal law. The priest could be renewed in office repeatedly. The term of office in either case should be designated when the office is established by the diocesan bishop or at least when the office is conferred. Because the offices of both the vicar general and the episcopal vicar are ecclesiastical offices, the general norms on office must be observed, such as making the appointment in writing, for liceity.[137]

Circumstances such as illness or required presence outside the diocese could cause a vicar general or episcopal vicar to be absent or impeded. In such a situation the diocesan bishop may appoint a substitute, just as he is free under any circumstances to name additional vicars. The canon does not state that such absence from the diocese or other impediment results in a loss of office for the original designee; an additional vicar is simply named. The "substitute" vicar must meet the requirements for a vicar and exercises his full authority. Likewise, his appointment should be made in writing, and his scope of authority, additional

[133] Canon 157.
[134] Canons 192–195.
[135] Canon 406, §1.
[136] Canon 406, §2.
[137] Canon 156.

mandates, or restrictions as well as the period for which the appointment is effective should be specifically stated.

Qualifications of Vicars

Canon 478 — §1. A vicar general and an episcopal vicar are to be priests not less than thirty years old, doctors or licensed in canon law or theology or at least truly expert in these disciplines, and recommended by sound doctrine, integrity, prudence, and experience in handling matters.

§2. The function of vicar general and episcopal vicar can neither be coupled with the function of canon penitentiary nor be entrusted to blood relatives of the bishop up to the fourth degree.

The previous canons having set forth some basic premises regarding vicars, this canon designates the positive qualifications of the office holders as well as restrictions regarding who can be appointed to the office. The qualifications listed include canonical status, personal qualities, and professional credentials and are the same for both vicars general and episcopal vicars.

Questions have been raised regarding the validity of the appointment of someone who lacks any or all of the listed qualifications.[138] This issue involves the application of canon 10 which states: "Only those laws must be considered invalidating or disqualifying which expressly establish that an act is null or that a person is unqualified." Also to be considered is the statement of canon 149, §2 that the conferral of an ecclesiastical office on someone who lacks the required qualities for the office "is invalid only if the qualities are expressly required for the validity of the provision." One could argue that there is no expressly stated, invalidating condition attached to canon 478. On the other hand, while not containing an explicit reference to validity, the canon's use of the subjunctive form of the verb "to be" (sint) could be an example of an implicit requirement for validity.[139] Both the role of the vicar, namely acting in the person of the bishop, and the expressly stated requirement of orders in this canon would seem to give more weight to the opinion that priesthood is required for the validity of the appointment. Without definitively resolving these issues of validity or invalidity, however, we can proceed with an analysis of these expected qualifications for office as expressed in the canon.

Both a vicar general and an episcopal vicar are to be priests. Obviously, a bishop is also qualified for such an appointment (see c. 406). The requirement of priestly orders for vicars is usually related to their significant representative role in relation to the diocesan bishop as his executive "alter ego." Also given as a reason for this qualification is their exercise, by office, of executive power of governance and the restrictive provision that only clerics can be named to offices which require the exercise of the power of governance.[140]

In addition to their priestly status, vicars general and episcopal vicars are also to possess certain personal qualities. These include the minimum age of thirty and personal characteristics deemed appropriate to the fulfillment of the office. Given the broad range of authority exercised by vicars general and episcopal vicars, there is an expectation that they be held to and have demonstrated a high standard of behavior described in terms of their doctrinal soundness, personal integrity, and prudence.

The nature of their role also requires certain professional qualifications, e.g., an advanced degree, either a licentiate or doctorate in canon law or theology. If this degree is lacking, there should be some demonstrated expertise in these areas of study.

[138] For a detailed discussion of this matter see J. Provost, "Canonical Reflection," 224–230.

[139] Ibid., 225–226.

[140] Canon 274, §1. Although all "clerics" including deacons are theoretically eligible for such offices, c. 478 speaks specifically of priests (bishops) as vicars, unlike c. 1421, §1 which speaks generically of clerics as judges. One should also note the need to reconcile the restrictive provision of c. 274, §1 with c. 1421, §2 which allows lay persons to be appointed judges in collegiate tribunals, an office requiring the exercise of governance.

While the first paragraph states expectations of the office holder in a positive way, the second paragraph restricts those who can be appointed to these offices. In line with the prohibition on appointing persons to incompatible offices,[141] the same person cannot fulfill the role of canon penitentiary (c. 508, §1) and vicar general or episcopal vicar. The vicar general is to function in the external forum whereas the canon penitentiary's role is in internal forum matters. Conflicts between the fora could arise if one person were to serve in both roles.[142]

Lest there be any appearances of favoritism or conflict of interest, the diocesan bishop is not to name any of his close relatives to these offices. The degree of blood relationship is computed canonically; there are as many degrees as there are blood relatives on each side excluding the common ancestor. By this computation, brothers, nephews, or uncles of the diocesan bishop, his second and third degree relatives, are excluded from the office of vicar general or episcopal vicar. The prohibition arises from a blood relationship "up to" the fourth degree; it does not say "up to and including."[143] Therefore, a fourth degree relative of the diocesan bishop, a first cousin, would be eligible to be a vicar.[144]

The Power of Vicars

Canon 479 — §1. By virtue of office, the vicar general has the executive power over the whole diocese which belongs to the diocesan bishop by law, namely, the power to place all administrative acts except those, however, which the bishop has reserved to himself or which require a special mandate of the bishop by law.

§2. By the law itself an episcopal vicar has the same power mentioned in §1 but only over the specific part of the territory or the type of affairs or the faithful of a specific rite or group for which he was appointed, except those cases which the bishop has reserved to himself or to a vicar general or which require a special mandate of the bishop by law.

§3. Within the limit of their competence, the habitual faculties granted by the Apostolic See to the bishop and the execution of rescripts also pertain to a vicar general and an episcopal vicar, unless it has been expressly provided otherwise or the personal qualifications of the diocesan bishop were chosen.

Both the type and scope of the authority of the vicars are detailed in this canon, beginning in paragraph one with a vicar general's power and moving in paragraph two to that of the episcopal vicar. After addressing the vicars' ordinary power, the canon, in paragraph three, covers an area of delegated power.

The type of power exercised by a vicar general is ordinary because it is attached to the office itself[145] and vicarious because it is exercised in the name of the diocesan bishop.[146] It is further specified as being executive power as distinct from legislative or judicial power.[147] His executive power allows a vicar general to place administrative acts such as issuing decrees, precepts, or rescripts.[148]

The scope of a vicar general's power is quite extensive, encompassing the entire diocese and being almost equivalent to that of the diocesan bishop. There are limits on this power, however. In addition to its being restricted to the executive arena, there are two further limitations. As noted above, when the law specifically mentions the diocesan bishop in the executive arena, a vicar general is constrained from acting without an episcopal mandate.[149] Likewise, the diocesan bishop

[141] Canon 152.
[142] Alesandro, in CLSA Com, 389.
[143] For comparison see c. 1091, §2.
[144] For a variant opinion, namely, that first cousins of the bishop are also excluded from this office, see Alesandro, in CLSA Com, 389.

[145] Canon 131, §1.
[146] Canon 131, §2.
[147] Canon 135.
[148] Canon 35.
[149] Canon 134, §3.

may reserve additional matters to himself. In those cases, even though the law does not use the words "diocesan bishop," the vicar general still cannot act.

Obviously, any matters which are entrusted to a vicar general by mandate should be clearly specified. In the mandate the diocesan bishop should either list all areas being delegated to a vicar general or make a general statement delegating him to act in all administrative matters and then listing, if any, those matters he reserves to himself.

Consistent with the scope of an episcopal vicar's office is the scope of his power. While it is parallel in type to that of a vicar general, its range of exercise is more restricted. An episcopal vicar exercises his power only in relation to the territory, activity, or persons entrusted to him by office. The same additional limitations noted above in relation to a vicar general's power also apply to an episcopal vicar; he cannot act where the law specifies "diocesan bishop" or where the diocesan bishop has reserved certain matters to himself. In addition to reserving certain functions to himself, a diocesan bishop may also restrict them to a vicar general, another possible limit on the scope of an episcopal vicar's power.

The final paragraph of this canon addresses certain delegated power that may be applicable to vicars general or episcopal vicars. If, by some special concession, habitual faculties are granted to a diocesan bishop by the Apostolic See, vicars general and episcopal vicars are understood to enjoy them as well. Again, the scope of the exercise of these faculties is consistent with the differing roles of the vicars; a vicar general exercises them anywhere in the diocese and an episcopal vicar within the parameters of his office.

Finally, unless the diocesan bishop has been specifically empowered to execute a rescript because of his personal qualifications, a vicar general or episcopal vicar can also execute them. This canon appears to be parallel to canon 43 which describes the execution of administrative acts in general: "unless . . . the executor has been chosen for personal qualifications," another person can be substituted for the named executor. The exclusion of a vicar, however, must be clearly stated in the document naming the diocesan bishop as executor. Such an exclusion is not presumed.

Canon 480 — A vicar general and an episcopal vicar must report to the diocesan bishop concerning the more important affairs which are to be handled or have been handled, and they are never to act contrary to the intention and mind of the diocesan bishop.

Because of their close connection with the diocesan bishop, acting in his person and stead, vicars general and episcopal vicars must maintain a close relationship with him. This relationship encompasses both regular communications and ongoing harmony of action. Despite the extensive executive power of vicars general and episcopal vicars, the diocesan bishop remains ultimately responsible for all diocesan affairs. Therefore, an appropriate reporting relationship between him and his vicars is essential.[150]

In determining both the means and frequency of communication, the size and complexity of the diocese will need to be considered. There will also need to be a balance between so little communication that the diocesan bishop becomes removed from important dimensions of diocesan governance and so much communication that he becomes encumbered with nonessential details. Use of the option of an episcopal council may be an effective means of ensuring sustained communication regarding the more important matters already undertaken or anticipated by vicars.

Again, because of their close connection with the diocesan bishop, vicars will have to ensure that their actions are not in conflict with his intentions. The regular communication noted in this canon, effected either by means of an episcopal council or some other vehicle, will serve also to keep vicars informed about the mind and will of the diocesan bishop. It will likewise present an opportunity to report on favors which may have been refused by the diocesan bishop and which, therefore, cannot validly be granted by vicars.[151]

[150] A similar collaborative relationship is expected between the diocesan bishop and his auxiliary or coadjutor bishops (c. 407) as well as between a pastor and parochial vicar (c. 548, §3).

Cessation from Office

Canon 481 — §1. The power of a vicar general and an episcopal vicar ceases at the expiration of the time of the mandate, by resignation, by removal made known to them by the diocesan bishop, without prejudice to cann. 406 and 409, and at the vacancy of the episcopal see.

§2. When the function of the diocesan bishop is suspended, the power of a vicar general and an episcopal vicar is suspended also unless they are bishops.

A number of the general norms on loss of office are applied here to the offices of vicar general and episcopal vicar. Therefore, the applicable provisions of canons 184 to 196 need to be considered. Also to be kept in mind is the special stability of these offices when they are held by coadjutor or auxiliary bishops.[152]

Both the power attached to the office of vicar general or episcopal vicar as well as any of their delegated power expires when either the term for which they were appointed or the time period for the exercise of the mandate expires. Such an expiration takes effect when it is communicated in writing to the episcopal vicar by the diocesan bishop (c. 186).

A second means by which the office of vicar is lost is resignation. The resignation is to be submitted to the one who has the authority to appoint to the office, in this case the diocesan bishop. The resignation is to be in writing or, if given orally, before two witnesses (c. 189, §1). There is no provision in this canon that the resignation must be accepted by the diocesan bishop as is true for pastors (c. 538, §1). Therefore, upon its communication, the resignation becomes effective.

Finally, priest vicars can be removed from the office of vicar. A simple auxiliary bishop can be removed as a vicar general but must then be named an episcopal vicar. The general provisions for removal from office are to be observed here. The competent authority to issue the decree of removal[153] is the diocesan bishop. Since they serve at his discretion, vicars can be removed for a just cause by the diocesan bishop without any prescribed procedure.[154] Consistent with the general norm on removal from office,[155] the removal is valid only after the proper issuance and communication of the decree.

In addition, vicars also cease from office when a see is vacant through the death, resignation, transfer, or removal of the diocesan bishop (c. 416). This fact applies to coadjutor and auxiliary bishops as well as priests who hold these offices. With a vacant see, a coadjutor automatically assumes the office of diocesan bishop and, therefore, ceases from the office of vicar general. With a vacant see, an auxiliary bishop ceases from his office as vicar but retains the powers and faculties attached to the office and exercises them, delegated by law, under the authority of the diocesan administrator.[156] With the filling of the office of diocesan bishop, new appointments of vicars general and episcopal vicars must be made.

If the diocesan bishop is suspended from office, priest vicars also have their power suspended, consistent with their significant dependence upon him. However, bishops who hold these offices retain them and all power attached to them even during the suspension of the diocesan bishop.

[151] Canon 65, §3.
[152] Canon 406.

[153] Canon 192.
[154] Canon 193, §3.
[155] Canon 193, §4.
[156] Canon 409, §2.

ARTICLE 2: THE CHANCELLOR, OTHER NOTARIES, AND THE ARCHIVES [cc. 482–491]

The canons in this second article on the diocesan curia provide general descriptions of how records of administrative activity within the diocese are to be authenticated and maintained and under whose responsibility. They also indicate the levels of security to be exercised in relation to record storage and treat issues of access to such records.

The three topics of chancellor, notaries, and archives are also addressed in the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches (CCEO 252–261). The subject matter is almost identical to that of the Latin code. There are two significant differences however: the office of chancellor is restricted to a presbyter or deacon (CCEO 252, §1); the protosyncellus rather than the moderator of the curia joins the chancellor in granting access to the archives (CCEO 257, §1).[157]

The Chancellor, Vice-Chancellor, and Notaries

Canon 482 — §1. In every curia a chancellor is to be appointed whose principal function, unless particular law establishes otherwise, is to take care that acts of the curia are gathered, arranged, and safeguarded in the archive of the curia.

§2. If it seems necessary, the chancellor can be given an assistant whose title is to be vice-chancellor.

§3. By reason of being chancellor and vice-chancellor they are notaries and secretaries of the curia.

The office of chancellor is a mandatory office within the diocesan curia (§1). According to this introductory canon, the primary function of the chancellor is to maintain the curial records. However, the history and practice indicate otherwise, especially in the United States.[158] The chancellor's records management function entails gathering, arranging, and safeguarding such materials. The size and complexity of a given diocese and its activities will dictate the procedures to be used in fulfilling these tasks. The canon itself allows for local adaptation of the role of the chancellor. In larger dioceses with many curial offices, the chancellor may play a supervisory role in relation to the records generated in the various offices. Such supervision would include the establishment of records management as well as retention and access guidelines. The volume of records generated by a multi-faceted office, for example Catholic Charities, could make it unreasonable for the chancellor personally to manage the records. A records policy, however, would designate what records are of such significance that they should be maintained indefinitely and transferred to the diocesan archives in accord with a determined schedule.

While the chancellor has the responsibility to see that the curial records are properly maintained, the actual task of systematic arrangement and preservation will often be assumed by a professional archivist if the chancellor is not trained [157] There is no provision for a moderator of the curia in the Eastern code.

[158] It has been the practice in the United States, for many years, to assign to the chancellor additional functions beyond those designated in the canons on this office. Not infrequently, the chancellor is also named a vicar general with ordinary power of governance or is delegated broad governance responsibilities through the issuance of faculties from the diocesan bishop. By reason of the office of vicar or as a result of these faculties, chancellors frequently grant dispensations from marriage impediments. In other cases, while not being appointed to an additional office or given delegated faculties, the chancellor, if appropriately qualified, functions as a canonical advisor to the bishop and/or within the curia. For purposes of this commentary, however, the chancellor's role and function will be addressed as stated in the canons. For more on the diverse functions of chancellors in the United States, see G. Mesure, The Diocesan Chancellor in Law and Praxis in Archdioceses in the United States, CanLawStud 551 (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1997).

or skilled in these areas. In fact, the drafters of this canon assumed that such a professional would be available especially for maintenance of historical records.[159]

While this canon does not delineate which "acts of the curia" are to be gathered and maintained by the chancellor, other canons give guidance in this regard. For example, canon 1053, §1 states that documents relating to ordination are to be carefully preserved and records maintained in the curial archives. Canon 1208 makes a similar reference to the document which attests to the blessing or dedication of a church or the blessing of a cemetery. Additional considerations regarding the contents of the curial archives will be addressed below.[160]

The size and nature of a given diocese may necessitate the appointment of an assistant to the chancellor who is designated as a vice-chancellor (§2). The role of the vice-chancellor in a specific diocese will be determined by the tasks given to its chancellor. Likewise, the vice-chancellor assists in fulfilling the responsibilities designated in paragraph one of this canon. In some dioceses more than one vice-chancellor is appointed and there is no canonical prohibition against this practice. However, practically speaking, the tasks of the various persons assigned to the chancery should be clearly delineated and properly coordinated.

Besides the offices of chancellor and vice-chancellor, the canon also treats of the offices of notary and secretary of the curia. The function of a notary is addressed in the following canon. Certain events require the action of the chancellor as notary. The presentation of apostolic letters by a newly appointed diocesan bishop, as well as a coadjutor or auxiliary bishop, is to be recorded by the chancellor.[161] The chancellor is to notify the moderator of the curia, if one is appointed in a given diocese, of the issuance of curial acts which have a juridic effect and, in some instances, will also notarize those acts.[162]

The stable functions mentioned in this canon are clearly ecclesiastical offices. Therefore, the general norms on office should be reviewed for their application to these offices.[163] Canon 482 does not specify who makes the appointment to the offices of chancellor or vice-chancellor. However, canon 470, which states that the diocesan bishop appoints those who exercise offices within the diocesan curia, would apply in this case.

Canon 483 — §1. Besides the chancellor, other notaries can be appointed whose writing or signature establishes authenticity for any acts, for judicial acts only, or for acts of a certain case or affair only.

§2. The chancellor and notaries must be of unimpaired reputation and above all suspicion. In cases in which the reputation of a priest can be called into question, the notary must be a priest.

While the appointment of a chancellor is mandated, the appointment of additional notaries is an option that can be exercised by the diocesan bishop. In contrast to the chancellor and vice chancellor who, by the law itself, are notaries authorized to authenticate by signature all acts of the curia, these additional notaries may have more circumscribed roles. They may be appointed as notaries for judicial acts[164] alone or for certain other specified acts or types of cases or even for an individual event. The areas of competence for these notaries should be indicated in their letters of appointment.

The general function of an ecclesiastical notary is similar to that of a civil notary or notary public.

[159] Comm 14 (1982) 214. See also NCCB, "A Document on Ecclesiastical Archives," November 22, 1974, in Pastoral Letters of the United States Catholic Bishops, III, ed. H. Nolan (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1983) 470–471, and D. Morrow, "The Chancellor as Archivist," CLSAP (1988) 225–227.

[160] For a sample listing of materials for archival preservation, see S. Holland, "Archives: In Service of Culture and Learning," J 46 (1986) 630–631.

[161] Canons 382, §3 and 404, §§1, 2.

[162] Canon 474.

[163] Canons 145–196.

[164] See c. 1437 for the role of a notary in judicial processes.

By the act of signing a document the notary attests to its authenticity. The range and variety of acts and documents that a notary will encounter and authenticate will depend on the nature of the diocese and the position description for the individual.

Since the notary's signature authenticates documents, there must be no hint of dishonesty or taint of suspicion regarding his or her character. Therefore, the chancellor and other notaries are to be people of unimpaired reputation. Other qualifications for ecclesiastical office in general are applicable to these offices. Hence, the chancellor and other notaries must be in communion with the Church and capable of fulfilling the requirements of the office.[165] Upon their appointment, which should be committed to writing,[166] the chancellor and other notaries are obliged to promise to discharge the obligations of the office faithfully.[167] The qualifications for appointment to office within the curia would also be applicable. Hence, the person must be able to maintain the levels of confidentiality required of the position.[168]

Other than the personal qualities noted above and the qualifications for all office-holders, the canons state no additional requirements for the office of chancellor or notary. The chancellor need not be a priest as in the 1917 code (CIC 372, §1). However, in those cases which involve the reputation of a priest, the notary must be a priest, although the law does not specify the reasons for such a requirement.[169] The canon itself speaks of the "reputation of a priest" and there may be the presumption that only another priest would be prepared to deal with the facts of such cases and maintain the required level of confidentiality. Examples of such cases in the administrative sphere would be the declaration of an impediment to the exercise of orders,[170] the instruction or notarizing of documents for a laicization case[171] or the removal of a pastor.[172] In the judicial sphere, an example would be a penal process involving a priest.[173] If there is no priest notary, an ad hoc appointment is possible. Also, since this requirement of priestly orders is not expressly stated as being for validity, a lay person could serve in this role. The required confidentiality binding all notaries (c. 471, 2°) should be sufficient to guarantee that the priest's reputation would remain unharmed.[174]

Functions of Notaries

Canon 484 — It is the duty of notaries:

1° to draw up the acts and instruments regarding decrees, dispositions, obligations, or other things which require their action;

2° to record faithfully in writing what has taken place and to sign it with a notation of the place, day, month, and year;

3° having observed what is required, to furnish acts or instruments to one who legitimately requests them from the records and to declare copies of them to be in conformity with the original.

In addition to their role in authenticating documents, notaries also have the responsibility of drawing up documents, such as decrees, in their correct form. Therefore, they must be sufficiently familiar with the norms affecting such documents.

Notaries are also to provide written records of transactions, records that include the pertinent date and place. The notary's signature on such a document authenticates it. Examples of such records would be minutes of required episcopal consulta-

[165] Canon 149.

[166] Canon 156.

[167] Canon 471, 1°.

[168] Canon 471, 2°.

[169] Commentaries on the previous and current law do not address the reasons for this restriction; it is simply stated as a fact.

[170] Canon 1044, §2, 2°.

[171] Canon 290, 3°. See also CDF, "Procedural Norms Regarding a Dispensation from Priestly Celibacy," October 14, 1980, AAS 72 (1980) 1132–1137; CLD 9, 92–99.

[172] Canons 1740–1747.

[173] Canons 1717–1731.

[174] Alesandro, in CLSA Com, 394.

tions such as those with the presbyteral council regarding parish modifications[175] or with the college of consultors or finance council to obtain their consent for the alienation of property.[176]

In addition to creating documents, notaries also have certain responsibilities regarding documents contained in the archives. Notaries are authorized to show to those who legitimately request them documents or other records from the archives. The canon does not indicate who determines that the request for documents is legitimate. The legitimacy of such a request could be based on the person's right to documents which pertain to his or her personal status or which are public in nature.[177] This canon does not give notaries who are not the chancellor the right to have full access to the archives or to permit others such access. Not only do notaries authenticate original documents, they also verify the fact that copies conform to the original. One reason for the chancellor to be both archivist and notary seems to be that the one who cares for the storage of documents can also retrieve and authenticate them.[178] This authentication can be by means of a signature with the notation "conforms with the original." Some authenticated documents or verified copies may be necessary during ecclesiastical processes since such documents can have probative value before an ecclesiastical court.[179]

Failure to fulfill the obligations attached to the office of notary can have serious consequences. For example, the falsification of documents could make the notary liable to a just penalty.[180]

[175] Canon 515, §2.

[176] Canon 1292, §1.

[177] Canons 487, §2; 1540, §§1–2. See also Holland, 626–628.

[178] J. Price, The Diocesan Chancellor, CanLawStud 167 (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1942).

[179] See cc. 1539–1546 on the use of documents as proofs in a trial. Canon 1544 in particular states that "documents do not have probative force in a trial unless they are originals or authentic copies."

[180] Canon 1391.

Removal from Office

Canon 485 — The chancellor and other notaries can be freely removed from office by the diocesan bishop, but not by a diocesan administrator except with the consent of the college of consultors.

Chancellors or notaries can be appointed for a definite or an undetermined period of time. Chancellors and notaries are freely appointed to office and removed from it by the diocesan bishop. This canon, however, is deceptively simple. While they hold office at the will of the bishop, they cannot lose office merely at his whim. Canon 193, §3 requires that there be a just cause for their removal from office. Dioceses should have established procedures for such removals to ensure that justice and equity are served.

A decree of removal is to be issued in writing for validity.[181] Since it is a document which has juridic effect, it should also be notarized. Removal from the office of chancellor or notary does not necessarily sever the diocese's financial obligations to the individual.[182] Minimal support may still be due the individual if it is not provided in some other form, e.g., unemployment compensation or a severance package. When chancellors or notaries are employed under a contract, care will need to be taken that those contractual arrangements are consistent with the canonical provisions for removal or other type of loss of office. In addition to being lost through removal from office by episcopal decree, these offices can also be lost by the law itself.[183]

The diocesan bishop himself may remove these individuals from office. When the see is vacant, a diocesan administrator can remove them only with the consent of the college of consultors. Such a provision is consistent with the principle of keeping changes to a minimum when the see is vacant. The diocesan administrator is not prohibited from appointing a new chancellor if that office becomes vacant during the time of his administration. It would be prudent, however, that such an appointment be made in consultation with the college of consultors and only for the time that the see is vacant.[184]

[181] Canon 193, §4.

[182] Canon 195.

[183] See c. 194.

The Archives

The remaining canons in this article (cc. 486–491) focus on the structure and maintenance of the diocesan archives which are divided into three categories: general, secret, and historic. Three norms apply to the general archive, two to the secret, and one to the historical.

General Archive

Canon 486 — §1. All documents which regard the diocese or parishes must be protected with the greatest care.

§2. In every curia there is to be erected in a safe place a diocesan archive, or record storage area, in which instruments and written documents which pertain to the spiritual and temporal affairs of the diocese are to be safeguarded after being properly filed and diligently secured.

§3. An inventory, or catalog, of the documents which are contained in the archive is to be kept with a brief synopsis of each written document.

The first paragraph of this canon states the general principle that the preservation of documents is a serious diocesan and parish responsibility. While these canons emphasize the diocesan archive,[185] there can be a connection with the parish if the diocesan archive also contains copies of some relevant parish documents. To safeguard valuable documents and provide insurance against the possibility of destruction of important parochial records, many dioceses maintain back-up copies of parish registers or other important documents such as titles to parish property. These diocesan records are often maintained in microfilm or microfiche form. Computer or digital files are also being employed for such back-up purposes.

The establishment of a diocesan archive or records storage area in the curia is mandatory. The canon requires that it be in a safe place but does not provide more detail on the provisions used for such safety. Professional archivists will be of assistance in assessing the appropriateness of the selected site, taking into consideration such conditions as temperature stability, humidity levels, lighting, and storage containers. Unless the chancellor is a trained archivist, such consultation would be important in fulfilling his or her role. As the volume of records increases in a diocese, some dioceses maintain more than one physical location for the contents of the archive. Provided each site in the curia is safe and able to be secured according to canonical standards, this practice would not violate the norms.

The canon describes the contents of the archive very generically as "instruments and written documents which pertain to the spiritual and temporal affairs of the diocese" (§2). Other canons specify certain documents and records which must be maintained.

For example, canon 1053, §1 states that documents relating to ordination are to be carefully preserved and records maintained in the curial archive. Canon 1208 makes a similar reference to the document which attests to the blessing or dedication of church or the blessing of a cemetery. Canon 1283, 3° requires administrators of ecclesiastical goods to maintain an inventory of property, updating it as needed, a copy of which they are to preserve in the diocesan archive. These same administrators are to maintain copies of property deeds and titles in the diocesan archive provided it can be done conveniently (c. 1284, §2, 9°). Canon 1306, §2 requires that copies of charter documents for pious foundations are also to be preserved in the diocesan archive.

The acts and records of judicial processes are also to be retained, but the canons are not clear on whether they are maintained in the general diocesan archive or in a separate tribunal archive.

[184] R. Pagé, Les Églises particulières (Montreal: Les Éditions Paulines, 1985) 101.

[185] For the required parish archive, see c. 535, §4.

Arguments can be made for either opinion. Canon 469 includes the tribunal within the institutes and persons of the diocesan curia. However, canon 472 applies the norms of Book VII, "Processes," to the cases and persons involved in judicial processes. The site for the final depository of tribunal records is not specified in Book VII. Canon 1475, §1 simply states that copies of documents belonging to private persons are to be retained without indicating the site; and canon 1475, §2 addresses access to these records but does not state where they are found. Interestingly enough, the latter canon mentions the chancellor in describing the process of according such access. The chancellor cannot provide copies without a mandate from the judge but, provided this requirement is met, access to these records by the chancellor seems legitimate. Therefore, one could conclude that the records of the tribunal archive are assimilated into the diocesan archive. The chancellor would preserve them with the special security their nature would demand and be bound by special norms on access. However, other commentators would maintain that tribunals are expected to preserve their judicial acts and records separately from the diocesan archive.[186]

Records affecting the temporal affairs of the diocese would include deeds and titles to property as well as civil, corporate documents. Finance offices will generate volumes of records, many of which are maintained in accord with accounting standards and civil law requirements. For such records, retention schedules and maintenance policies should be established respecting distinctly financial and archival concerns. The roles and responsibilities of the finance officials and the archivist should be clear. The same considerations are also pertinent to personnel records. Records retention and access policies should comply with standards within the human resource field as well as with civil law requirements.

In properly filing and storing the contents of the archive, one will need to address such issues as the transfer of active files from various departments and offices to the archive for permanent storage. This type of transfer will involve the purging of unnecessary or duplicate records as well as assessing the value of records either to serve historical purposes or to produce proof of certain acts in the future. The archivist determines the value of records based on their administrative, legal, fiscal, historic, or sacramental uses.

The securing of records is an important dimension of their safeguarding. Securing includes the physical placement of the records in a site that can be closed off from general access, an issue addressed in the following canon, as well as providing for their long-term security by proper storage techniques.

The secure storage of records and documents is not an end in itself. They are stored in order to serve as documentary proofs of facts. These records can also provide historical evidence regarding decisions made and actions taken. Storage of records and documents without a means of retrieval would be meaningless. Therefore, the third paragraph of canon 486 addresses this concern. A well ordered inventory of archival holdings is essential if records are to be retrievable and usable. Chancellors should consider the standards within the archival profession for such catalogs and inventories. Computer programs have been developed in the field and can be invaluable in maintaining these types of catalogs and inventories, but manual systems based on standard archival descriptive practices can provide adequate access to records. Consideration should be given to providing electronic access to catalogs of records of archival holdings which have historical significance and could serve researchers. Access to the catalog of such holdings would not appear to violate the expectation that the records themselves be secured.

Security and Access

Canon 487 — §1. The archive must be locked and only the bishop and chancellor are to have its key. No one is permitted to enter except with the permission either of the bishop or of both the moderator of the curia and the chancellor.

[186] L. Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 965.

§2. Interested parties have the right to obtain personally or through a proxy an authentic written copy or photocopy of documents which by their nature are public and which pertain to their personal status.

This canon addresses both security and access issues. Because of the significance of the documents and records contained therein, the archive is to be secured and access to the documents limited. The canon refers to the archives as "locked," but there are various means by which security can be maintained in addition to the traditional lock and key approach. Security can be maintained by means of a vault whose combination is confidential. Other highly technological means of security have been developed, such as card-key access, computer identification, etc., and their viability for potential diocesan use will need to be assessed at the local level. When the canon refers to possession of the "key" to the archive, it should be understood to apply to these other means of access as well.

Only two persons are mentioned as being authorized to hold the key to the archive: the bishop (presumably the diocesan bishop) and the chancellor. With due regard for their essential obligations regarding the security of diocesan records, it may be necessary to provide a means of access when neither person is available. The bishop could, for example, allow the moderator of the curia, if one exists in the diocese, or the vicar general to be entrusted with a key for use when the bishop and chancellor are absent, especially if their absence is foreseen to extend for some length of time.

Access to the archive is limited. However, the statement in this canon regarding such access must be carefully interpreted. The responsibilities of the chancellor obviously demand ongoing access to the archive. Therefore, the phrase "no one" cannot be taken literally. Likewise, if a professional archivist is to assist the chancellor in organizing and maintaining the archive, reasonable access must be permitted that person. Policies and procedures can be developed at the local level to govern this type of access. Such policies would include provisions for obtaining access as well as restrictions on such access for the archivist.

While access to the archive is to be controlled, it is not absolutely forbidden. The diocesan bishop can allow access on his own authority. Likewise, he can delegate someone else to grant such permission. Because the canon does not refer to "ordinary" or "local ordinary" but rather to "bishop," a vicar general or episcopal vicar cannot permit access without a special mandate.[187] The moderator of the curia cannot grant access on his own authority; he can do so only jointly with the chancellor. Again, the diocesan bishop could delegate either of them to grant access in his name, and then each could act independently of the other.

The permission for access to the archive can be granted for one occasion only, for a limited amount of time, or for general, ongoing access. Chancery secretaries, for example, may be granted ongoing access to assist in the general clerical work involved in maintaining the archive. Each diocesan bishop will need to assess his curial needs to determine those persons who should be granted permission for temporary or ongoing access to the archive. Issues related to access to the historical archive for legitimate purposes such as research will be addressed below.

Separate from the issue of access to the archive itself is the issue of access to documents or records contained therein. This matter is handled in the second paragraph of the canon. Those persons whose personal status is addressed in the document have a right to access to it provided its nature is public. Public ecclesiastical documents are those which have been drawn up by an ecclesiastical official according to legal formalities.[188] Individuals can exercise their right to access such documents by requesting an authenticated copy, either written or electronically produced. Examples of such documents would include sacramental records which may be retained in the diocesan archive, decrees which affect individuals' personal status such as a decree establishing an ecclesiastical office which they hold, and rescripts such as laicization documents. Individuals may exercise this right personally or through a proxy.

[187] Canon 134, §3.
[188] Canon 1540, §1.

Lest there be any inference of preferential treatment or an infringement of a right to access, a bishop should establish a diocesan policy describing which records shall be considered under the canon's category of "documents which by their nature are public and which pertain to.... personal status." In the absence of such a policy, individual decisions would be in the hands of the chancellor. It can be argued that all sacramental records are public in nature, since those sacraments for which records are kept are all public in nature and affect one's ecclesiastical status. However, questions can be raised regarding which of these records pertain to the individual's personal status. Given an increased interest in genealogical studies, more requests for sacramental records of ancestors have been forwarded to chanceries. Some researchers maintain that one's ancestors' records do, by extension, affect one's own personal status. Others hold that general access to sacramental records could result in violations of the right to privacy and personal reputation[189] given the forthrightness with which some annotations in records, such as illegitimacy, have been made. To avoid conflicts, it would be helpful for dioceses to establish policies on access which address potentially conflictual matters.[190]

Removal of Documents

Canon 488 — It is not permitted to remove documents from the archive except for a brief time only and with the consent either of the bishop or of both the moderator of the curia and the chancellor.

[189] Canon 220.

[190] For issues to be addressed, see M. Breitenbeck, "Practical Addendum on Policy-Making," in Confidentiality in the United States (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1988), 163–165.

The holdings of the archive are to be maintained in their integrity. Therefore, documents generally are not to be removed. However, this canon does provide standards by which documents can temporarily be removed from their usual place of storage. The time constraints on such removal are not specified beyond the reference to a "brief time." Local policy and custom should determine the length of time. The chancellor should establish a system of tracking documents temporarily out of their usual place of storage; requiring an "out-card" specifying the document removed, the date of removal, and the person into whose custody it was transferred is a simple system to utilize.

Authorization for removal of documents parallels authorization for access to the archive. The same principles noted above regarding permissions can be applied here.

The Secret Archive

Canon 489 — §1. In the diocesan curia there is also to be a secret archive, or at least in the common archive there is to be a safe or cabinet, completely closed and locked, which cannot be removed; in it documents to be kept secret are to be protected most securely.

§2. Each year documents of criminal cases in matters of morals, in which the accused parties have died or ten years have elapsed from the condemnatory sentence, are to be destroyed. A brief summary of what occurred along with the text of the definitive sentence is to be retained.

In addition to the general archive, each diocese must maintain a secret archive. The documents contained in the secret archive are held under even greater security than those in the general archive. This security is ensured through special means used to store the material and special norms authorizing access to the secret archives.

The secret archive can be a distinct site or a specially secured portion of the general archive. A permanent safe or other type of self-contained and securely locked depository is to be used if there is no separate site.

The first paragraph of this canon provides a general description of the contents of the secret archives, "documents to be kept secret," but does not list such documents. One example of its contents, "documents of criminal cases in matters of morals," is found in the second paragraph of this canon. An illustrative list could be constructed by reference to other parts of the code. For example, a book or registry for recording dispensations from occult marriage impediments in the non-sacramental internal forum is to be maintained in the secret archive (c. 1082). Likewise, the secret archive is to contain a register for noting of secret marriages (c. 1133). Proofs of rebukes or warnings issued in the form of a penal remedy are to be kept in the secret archive (c. 1339, §3) as are pre-investigative and investigative materials or documents relating to any penal process (c. 1719). In addition to those items delineated in the code, the diocesan bishop may determine that other materials or documents[191] be stored there because of their sensitive or secret nature or because dissemination or revelation of them could seriously damage an individual's reputation or cause scandal within the community.[192] While it is the responsibility of the chancellor to maintain the secret archive, it is the diocesan bishop who in part determines the contents. He may delegate the chancellor to share this task.

Certain documents maintained in the secret archive have a distinct retention schedule (§2). Any documents relating to criminal cases involving matters of morals are to be destroyed under two circumstances: the death of the accused or the lapse of ten years from the condemnatory sentence. However, even though the full documentation is destroyed, a summary of the acts and a copy of the sentence are to be retained.[193]

Access to the Secret Archive

Canon 490 — §1. Only the bishop is to have the key to the secret archive.

§2. When a see is vacant, the secret archive or safe is not to be opened except in a case of true necessity by the diocesan administrator himself.

§3. Documents are not to be removed from the secret archive or safe.

Because the secret archive contains documents which are of their nature confidential or highly sensitive, access to it is extremely guarded. The bishop alone holds the key or, in the case of a separate vault or safe, the combination or electronic access (§1). The canon does not specify who may use this key but, in keeping with the chancellor's responsibilities, the bishop could logically allow him or her access to the secret archive as necessary to store documents, make notations in the registers retained there, and destroy documents (c. 489). The diocesan bishop would not seem to be personally responsible for discharging these functions but would need to make such access possible.

[191] Examples of documents not required by law to be stored in the secret archive include records of dispensation from impediments or irregularities for orders (cc. 1047–1048) or decrees of dismissal from religious institutes (c. 700). See J. Alesandro, in CLSA Com, 397 and E. Rinere, "The Confidentiality of Written Documents in Canon Law," in Confidentiality in the United States, 131.

[192] Pagé, 104–105.

[193] Relying on a 1941 reply from the code commission (CLD 2, 132), Read concludes that the retention of a summary of the acts and a copy of the sentence applies only to the ten-year provision, not the death of the accused (CLSGBI Com, 273). The ten-year peremptory time limit for a complaint of nullity against a sentence (c. 1621) appears to be the basis for the retention of the full acts during that time period. If that were the only basis for the retention, then complete destruction would seem to be appropriate at that time. The fact that they are retained, even in summary form, beyond the ten-year period would seem to indicate that their retention also has a value for historical purposes, even though access to such records is tightly controlled. Therefore, an argument can be made for keeping a summary of the acts even upon the death of the accused.

The diocesan bishop could allow a second copy of the key or other means of access to be held by the moderator of the curia or vicar general and to be used in their presence by the chancellor. Such a provision would maintain the higher level of security appropriate to the secret archive but still allow for reasonable and necessary access.[194] This latter provision would neither violate the secret nature of the archive nor provide unlimited perusal of its contents even by the chancellor.

During a vacant see, given the limited authority of the diocesan administrator, he is permitted to open the secret archive only when it is truly necessary. Since there are to be no innovations during a vacant see and the destruction of documents according to canon 489, §2 could be interpreted as such an innovation, access by others to the secret archives would seem unnecessary and not permissible.

Because of the sensitive nature of the documents contained in the secret archive, the removal of materials, either in their original form or copied, is prohibited (§3). This prohibition, however, is not absolute. Some documentation may licitly be removed from the secret archive. For example, if materials from a preliminary penal investigation are to be used in the process itself, they will need to be accessed.[195] In the case of a secret marriage, if the secret should cease because maintaining it would cause scandal or harm to the sanctity of marriage (c. 1132), any records relating to the marriage could be transferred from the secret archive to a public register in the diocesan curia or parish.[196]

The Historical Archives

Canon 491 — §1. A diocesan bishop is to take care that the acts and documents of the archives of cathedral, collegiate, parochial, and other churches in his territory are also diligently preserved and that inventories or catalogs are made in duplicate, one of which is to be preserved in the archive of the church and the other in the diocesan archive.

§2. A diocesan bishop is also to take care that there is an historical archive in the diocese and that documents having historical value are diligently protected and systematically ordered in it.

§3. In order to inspect or remove the acts and documents mentioned in §§1 and 2, the norms established by the diocesan bishop are to be observed.

This final canon in the article addresses parish and other church records, the diocesan historical archive, and the issue of access to these various records. Canon 535, §4 requires that each parish maintain an archive; canon 491, §1 extends this requirement to other churches as well. The diocesan bishop is to see that such archives are maintained. He could also designate the types of records and documents to be retained there. Furthermore, he could require that, in addition to the copies of inventories and catalogs that are to be stored in the diocesan archive, copies of more important documents also be kept in the curial archive for safekeeping against destruction. Canon 535, §5 requires that older parish documents be guarded with special care. The diocesan bishop could require that they also be copied or stored in the diocesan archive.

Archival science has developed as a specialized field. Experts in this area are invaluable to a diocese in fulfilling its responsibility for the preservation of important historical records. It is not feasible that every parish retain the services of a professional archivist. Therefore, if one is employed by the diocese, or if the chancellor is such a professional, that person's position description should include consultative services to parishes and other diocesan institutions. Since the bishop is obliged to inspect such records personally or through a delegate (c. 535, §4), he could delegate such a professional archivist to assist him in the inspection and assessment of the quality of parochial archives. Diocesan archivists may also provide regional in-service programs for those charged with maintaining parochial or other ecclesial records. If a diocese employs a professional archivist, such an individual should have professional contact with other ecclesiastical archivists.[197]

[194] See Read, in CLSGBI Com, 272 and Alesandro, in CLSA Com, 397 for similar opinions. The 1977 schema on the people of God also enabled the chancellor to hold a second copy of the key.

[195] Canon 1719.

[196] For a similar interpretation, see D. Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 639.

The preservation of parochial and other church records is also a significant issue when parishes are merged or suppressed or churches are closed. Clearly established norms and procedures should ensure that such records are not destroyed or lost and that access to them is provided for.

This issue is even more critical regarding sacramental records. In some cases, dioceses have determined that the records of merged parishes will be maintained at the new parish that results from the merger. In cases of suppression, records of the former parish are often maintained by the parish which assumes responsibility for the suppressed parish's previous territory, or, if there is more than one, a designated parish. In other cases, dioceses have determined that all documents and registers from merged or suppressed parishes will be maintained in the diocesan archive. Regardless of the option chosen, there should be consistency in practice and carefully maintained indications of where documents and registers can be located.[198]

Besides parochial documents that may have historical value, other material significant to the history of the diocese is to be maintained in an historical archive. Such material will often require special treatment for preservation.[199] Again, specialists in archival science should be employed either to assume such tasks or advise other diocese personnel who will perform them. Smaller dioceses where human or financial resources are more lacking may be able to obtain the services of professional archivists or at least individuals with some training in historical preservation through local historical societies. Such individuals may find it beneficial to aid dioceses, since many early records of events in a region may exist only within the diocesan curia. It might be possible to provide a catalog of the diocesan historical holdings to local historical societies as well.

The material held in the historical archive should be readily available for purposes of research. The diocesan bishop is to issue norms regarding access to and removal of material from church and historical archives (§3). In establishing such norms, the bishop will need to balance issues of security with those of scholarly research. He can use standards established for access to government archives as well as those for access to ecclesiastical ones, such as the Vatican archives.[200] Professional diocesan archivists have discussed this issue and developed sample access policies.[201]

ARTICLE 3: THE FINANCE COUNCIL AND THE FINANCE OFFICER [cc. 492–494]

This article, with two canons devoted to the finance council and one to the finance officer, is de-

[197] For example, such professional contact takes place through the Association of Catholic Diocesan Archivists, which holds regular national meetings for the purpose of exchange and continuing education in this specialty.

[198] It is especially helpful to make a notation in the Official Catholic Directory, where one can locate records for parishes that no longer exist.

[199] Professional archivists regularly consider such issues as the use of acid-free containers for storage of documents and the removal of metal fasteners, as well as provision for handling particularly fragile documents.

[200] John Paul II, allocution to the College of Cardinals, December 22, 1978, in CLD 9, 169–171.

[201] For further reflections on the issue of access from the perspective of professional diocesan archivists, see M. Hussey, "Access to Diocesan Archives: Some Historical Reflections," T. Slavin, "Diocesan Archives and the Question of Access," R. Patkus, "ACDA and the Question of Access," and D. Ward, "Confidentiality in Archival Files in the Code of Canon Law," in Preparing for the 90's: Strategies for Diocesan Archivists and Records Managers (Chicago: Association of Catholic Diocesan Archivists, 1993) 38–69. See also the ACDA project "Guidelines for Access to Diocesan Archives" (1991).

ceptively simple. It must be read in conjunction with the correlative canons in other books of the code, especially those in Book V, "The Temporal Goods of the Church," and Book I, "General Norms." While the Church has an essential spiritual dimension, it is not removed from the material world, including the world of property and finances. "It is, therefore, totally impossible to make a sharp division between the theology of the nature of the Church and the Church's behavior in economic and financial affairs."[202] The canons in this article need to be read and understood in light of larger issues, such as the credibility of the Church's proclamation of stewardship, honesty, justice, and integrity reflected in its internal management as well as its spoken message. The roles of the finance council and finance officer include not only their administrative and financial expertise, but also their participation in the mission of the Church itself.

Eastern Churches: The Eparchial Finance Officer and Finance Council

The Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches in only two canons (CCEO 262 and 263) provides more detail than the Latin code on these topics. The two topics are also addressed in opposite order from the Latin code. The term of office of the finance officer is not defined in common law but is to be determined by particular law (CCEO 262, §2); canon 263 establishes no term of office for finance council members.

The eparchial bishop must consult the same two bodies as his Latin church counterpart, the consultors (CCEO 271) and finance council, prior to the appointment or removal of the finance officer (CCEO 262, §1); and his or her removal prior to the expiration of the term of office requires a serious cause. Instead of submitting the annual report to the finance council, the eparchial finance officer submits it to the eparchial bishop but through that council (CCEO 262, §4). A cross-reference to canon 232 provides more detail on the role of the finance officer during a vacant see. Like his counterpart in the Latin church, the eparchial bishop presides over the eparchial finance council and appoints its members. Unlike a Latin diocesan bishop, however, the eparchial bishop must first consult the college of eparchial consultors or another group designated by particular law before appointing finance council members (CCEO 263, §1). Their function, i.e., fulfilling the duties assigned by common law as well as preparing a budget and reviewing the annual report, is the same as in the Latin code (CCEO 263, §5). Unlike the Latin code, canon 262, §2 designates the eparchial finance officer as a member of the finance council.

Constitution and Membership of the Finance Council

Canon 492 — §1. In every diocese a finance council is to be established, over which the diocesan bishop himself or his delegate presides and which consists of at least three members of the Christian faithful truly expert in financial affairs and civil law, outstanding in integrity, and appointed by the bishop.

§2. Members of the finance council are to be appointed for five years, but at the end of this period they can be appointed for other five year terms.

§3. Persons who are related to the bishop up to the fourth degree of consanguinity or affinity are excluded from the finance council.

The finance council is an obligatory consultative body in the diocese and is established by the diocesan bishop. The diocesan bishop need not preside over the financial council personally; he may delegate another to preside in his place. Given his ultimate responsibility for the financial administration of the diocese, however, it would be advisable for the bishop to preside himself. Whenever the diocesan bishop is required to hear or receive consent from the finance council, his personal attendance at the meetings would be even more appropriate.

[202] W. Bayerlein, "The Role of the Laity," in The Finances of the Church, ed. W. Bassett and P. Huizing, Con 117 (New York: Seabury, 1979) 89.

The finance council is to have at least three members. Its size is determined by the diocesan bishop himself. Given the importance of some of its actions, such as considering issues of extraordinary administration or alienation of property, it would seem advisable to consider a larger body for more diverse expertise among the members.[203] However, too large a body could become unwieldy for discussion and deliberation. Since in some instances its consent is required, if more members are to be appointed, an uneven number will make the outcome of a decisive vote clearer.

The members of the finance council are taken from among the "members of the Christian faithful."[204] Since this term comprises all categories of persons, the finance council could consist of all bishops, priests, deacons, or laity including religious in each category. Or it could include a variety of such persons. While the finance council is not required to be representational,[205] it would seem advisable that it include both clergy and laity.

Regardless of the categories of persons who constitute the finance council, what is essential is that they be experts in the matters that come before them. Their financial and civil law expertise rather than their ecclesiastical status is what recommends their place on the council. While not excluding the possibility that priests may be experts in these fields, in many dioceses the finance council will be an excellent arena to utilize the gifts of the laity, or even of deacons whose secular professions include these fields. Canon 228, §2 states that "lay persons who excel in necessary knowledge, prudence, and integrity are qualified to assist the pastors of the Church as experts and advisors, even in councils." Accordingly, the diocesan bishop will be well served to draw on their talents for his finance council.

In addition to having technical expertise, the members of the finance council are also to possess certain personal characteristics that recommend them for such an important ecclesial responsibility. They are to be noted for their integrity, which will assist the Church in its dedication to principles of administrative honesty and forestall any implications of scandal in relation to the Church's patrimony.

In light of canon 228, they should possess the prudence necessary to deliberate properly and make wise decisions in light of the larger ecclesial context. Their prudential judgment will be required for decisions that take into account not only the best financial or legal results but also fundamental ecclesial principles.

Since they may be involved in investment matters, they will need to be aware of certain ethical standards by which investment decisions are made.[206] If they are consulted about major build-

[203] Expertise in such matters as civil law, investing, and real estate would be valuable to the bishop.

[204] Opinions vary as to whether or not the members of the finance council, as well as the diocesan finance officer, must be Catholic. The basis for these varying positions is the interpretation of c. 149, §1 which states the requirements for holding an ecclesiastical office. That canon states that office holders must be "in the communion of the Church." Canon 205 describes those who are Catholic or in full communion. Full communion is stated as a requirement for some but not all offices; members of the diocesan pastoral council, for example, must be in full communion (c. 512, §1). Some commentators hold that full communion is intended in c. 149, §1 and, therefore, the members of the finance council must be Catholic. Others maintain that only baptism is required for members of the finance council. For more on this issue, see J. Provost, "Canonical Reflections," 224–227; N. Cafardi, "Religious Affiliation of the Diocesan Finance Officer," in CLSA Advisory Opinions: 1984–1993, ed. P. Cogan (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995) 99–102; T. Green, "Shepherding the Patrimony of the Poor," J 56 (1996) 714.

[205] Both the presbyteral council (c. 495, §1) and the pastoral council (c. 512, §2) do have such a requirement.

[206] In their pastoral letter, "Economic Justice for All: Catholic Social Teaching and the U.S. Economy" (Origins 27 [November 27, 1986] 409–455) the U.S. bishops stated: "Although it is a moral and legal fiduciary responsibility...to ensure an adequate return on investment for the support of the work of the church, . . . stewardship embraces broader moral concerns. . . . We . . . praise efforts to develop alternative investment policies, especially those which support enterprises that promote eco-ing or construction projects, they will need to be cognizant of the Church's social teaching on just wages and the right of laborers to organize. These principles are as important as financial or legal expertise.

Therefore, the diocesan bishop, or a member of his diocesan curia who has studied the Church's social teaching, should provide some type of orientation for members of the finance council. Ethical standards of financial administration should also be delineated. The diocesan pastoral council could also draw up guidelines for the diocesan bishop to apply to diocesan and parochial finances.

The members of the finance council are appointed by the diocesan bishop. As with all ecclesiastical appointments, this should be done in writing[207] and notarized,[208] although the appointments would be valid nonetheless. The requirement of a promise of service and confidentiality[209] would apply to the members of the finance council.

Paragraph two of this canon provides that the members of the finance council are to be appointed for a five-year term. There is no limit to the number of terms that a member can serve on the finance council. In determining whether or not to renew terms, which he can do indefinitely, the diocesan bishop should weigh the advantages of stability over and against the value of new ideas and insights brought by new members. There is some value in retaining existing members and adding new ones periodically. Members of the council may resign from their positions,[210] but they can be removed before the expiration of their term only for a grave reason.[211]

Lest there be any hint of scandal or perceptions of personal financial gain on the part of the diocesan bishop, the members of the finance council are not to be his close relatives. Excluded are blood or legal relatives up to the fourth degree, i.e., brothers/sisters, nieces/nephews, uncles/aunts, as well as their spouses. The canon states that the exclusion arises from a relationship "up to" the fourth degree; it does not say "up to and including" that degree.[212] Therefore, a fourth degree relative of the diocesan bishop, such as a first cousin or that individual's spouse, could serve on the finance council.

Although it is not stated in this canon, the finance council remains in place even during a vacant see,[213] unlike other consultative bodies such as the presbyteral council[214] and the diocesan pastoral council.[215] Such a conclusion is clear from the fact that if the finance officer is chosen as the diocesan administrator, the finance council is to select an interim finance officer since he cannot fulfill both roles simultaneously (c. 423, §2). If the finance council ceased to exist with the vacant see, it could not fulfill such a function.

Function of the Finance Council

Canon 493 — In addition to the functions entrusted to it in Book V, The Temporal Goods of the Church, the finance council prepares each year, according to the directions of the diocesan bishop, a budget of the income and expenditures which are foreseen for the entire governance of the diocese in the coming year and at the end of the year examines an account of the revenues and expenses.

This canon specifies the function of the finance council.[216] While always operating under the direction of the diocesan bishop, the finance council bears a great deal of responsibility for nomic development in depressed communities and which help the church respond to local and regional needs" (446).

[207] Canon 156.

[208] Canon 484, 2°.

[209] Canon 471.

[210] See cc. 187–189 for the prescriptions on resignation.

[211] Canon 193, §2.

[212] For purposes of comparison, see c. 1091, §2.

[213] Pagé, 109.

[214] Canon 501, §2.

[215] Canon 513, §2.

[216] For a more detailed description of the functions of the finance council in light of Book V, see A. Farrelly, "The Diocesan Finance Council," Stud Can 23 (1989) 149–166.

proper management of the finances and administration of the diocese itself as well as other ecclesial entities within the diocese.

In addition to the reference to the relevant norms of Book V, this canon designates specific tasks for the finance council. It is responsible for the annual preparation of the diocesan budget and an annual review of the diocesan financial report prepared by the finance officer. The manner in which the budget is prepared and the financial review conducted is left to the bishop's discretion. In many cases, the available resources for the upcoming fiscal year are calculated so as to set forth from the outset a benchmark for achieving a balance between income and expenses.

The size and complexity of the diocesan curia and other agencies or institutions which are financially supported by the diocese will dictate more or less sophisticated procedures for budget preparation. Consistent with the principle of subsidiarity, it would be appropriate that the various offices, departments, institutions, and agencies which are supported by diocesan funds be involved at least in the initial stages of budget preparation.

In many dioceses, office or department budgets are submitted to an individual, frequently the finance officer or the moderator of the curia, who makes adjustments to arrive at a preliminary balanced budget for presentation to the finance council for its final adjustments.

In other dioceses, a team approach is taken in preparing a preliminary budget from the individual ones submitted by various constituents. Those who comprise an administrative cabinet or other type of "senior management" group within the diocesan curia work together to coordinate the financial needs of the various offices and agencies into a coherent whole from which a preliminary budget is prepared for submission to the finance council. An advantage of this second approach is the degree of ownership for the work of the diocese as a whole which emerges. Also, when the end-product is a corporate effort, there is less possibility of resentment among curial offices or departments based on necessarily uneven financial allocations. A spirit of cooperation in maintaining a solid financial base for the mission of the diocese can replace a more competitive atmosphere, especially as resources are limited.

Regardless of the approach taken in preparing an initial draft of a budget for the finance council, the diocesan budget should be based on the priorities of the diocese as a whole. The diocesan bishop should undertake a regular, if not annual, review of diocesan needs and priorities and share his vision with all of those involved in budget preparations.

The final responsibility for preparing the budget to be submitted to the diocesan bishop rests with the finance council. In reviewing the annual budget, it may be involved not only in allocating funds but also in making recommendations regarding fund-raising.[217] In some dioceses a development or stewardship committee may exist to coordinate the raising of funds, but the finance council could offer a valuable service to this group from its perspective of budget preparation and annual review.

A second annual function of the finance council is examining the finance report for the year's income and expense activities. The finance officer is responsible for the preparation of the annual finance report[218] and usually utilizes the services of a professional auditing agency in doing so. However, the finance council is to examine the report carefully in light of both the finances and the mission of the diocese. As the chief financial advisors of the diocesan bishop, they should call to his attention any matters that seem to need more immediate attention, such as consistent over-spending in a particular area of the budget. They should also raise concerns for the long-term financial welfare of the diocese if deficit spending occurs or if other fund balances appear to be in question.

The annual review will also be the occasion for the finance council to ensure that funds designated for restricted purposes have been allocated only to those purposes.[219] It may also use that opportunity to review the status of various endowments or foundations.[220]

[217] Farrelly, 154.

[218] Canon 494, §4.

Upon completion of its review of the annual finance report, the finance council may also assist the diocesan bishop in preparing his required public financial accounting report to the faithful of the diocese.[221] It may also use that opportunity to review and possibly alter the various diocesan procedures and standards, both financial and ethical.

Besides the annual budget and financial review obligations of the finance council, it has additional responsibilities that may arise at various times during the year, e.g., pursuant to the prescriptions of Book V.

At times the diocesan bishop must seek the advice of the finance council and at other times its consent. The obligation to consult is not easily dismissed. Canon 127 makes it clear that the validity of certain of the diocesan bishop's actions depends on his observance of the aforementioned requirements. When counsel is to be sought, he must listen to the opinions of those convened regarding the matter under consideration; even though he is not bound to observe their recommendations, he should not lightly dismiss them, especially when there is a consensus. When consent is required, the diocesan bishop cannot act validly without the vote of an absolute majority of those present.

The following decisions of the bishop require his consulting the finance council:[222]

(1) the imposition of a moderate tax on public juridic persons subject to his authority (c. 1263);
(2) the imposition of an extraordinary tax on other juridic and physical persons (c. 1263);
(3) the performance of more important acts of administration (c. 1277);
(4) the determination of limits of ordinary administration of those subject to him (c. 1281, §2);
(5) the designation of appropriate investment strategies for goods assigned to an endowment (c. 1305);
(6) the diminishment of obligations arising from a foundation when their fulfillment becomes impossible (c. 1310, §2).

The following decisions of the bishop require the consent of the finance council:[223]

(1) the performance of acts of extraordinary administration (c. 1277);
(2) the alienation of property beyond a stipulated amount determined by the conference of bishops (c. 1292, §1);
(3) the completion of any transaction, in addition to alienation, which could worsen the financial condition of the diocese (c. 1295).

In addition, the diocesan bishop must consult the finance council before selecting or removing the diocesan finance officer (c. 494, §§1–2). Finally, as noted above, the finance council itself selects a new finance officer if he is chosen as diocesan administrator at the time of a vacant see.

The diocesan finance council, through its wide range of responsibilities and activities, is an important advisory group to the diocesan bishop and to the diocese as a whole as it assists him in his pastoral office. "Material goods are a necessary part of the Church's mission. Diocesan management of such goods is to be in harmony with that mission. The diocesan finance council plays a vital role in this work."[224]

219 Canon 1267, §3.
220 Canon 1305.
221 Canon 1287, §2. See also Farrelly, 158.
222 For a more detailed examination of these norms from Book V, see the pertinent commentary.
223 Ibid.
224 Farrelly, 166.

The Diocesan Finance Officer

Canon 494 — §1. In every diocese, after having heard the college of consultors and the finance council, the bishop is to appoint a finance officer who is truly expert in financial affairs and absolutely distinguished for honesty.

§2. The finance officer is to be appointed for a five year term but can be appointed for other five year terms at the end of this period. The finance officer is not to be removed while in this function except for a grave cause to be assessed by the bishop after he has heard the college of consultors and the finance council.

§3. It is for the finance officer to administer the goods of the diocese under the authority of the bishop in accord with the budget determined by the finance council and, from the income of the diocese, to meet expenses which the bishop or others designated by him have legitimately authorized.

§4. At the end of the year, the finance officer must render an account of receipts and expenditures to the finance council.

Among the more stable offices in the diocesan curia is that of the finance officer. Unlike other curial officials, such as episcopal vicars, whose appointments are optional, the finance officer holds a mandated office. Unlike other curial officials, such as vicars, who cease from office during a vacant see, the finance officer remains in office. Unlike other curial officials, such as chancellors or vicars, who can be freely removed from office for just cause, the finance officer can be removed only for grave cause.

Under normal circumstances, the finance officer is appointed by the diocesan bishop. However, when a see is vacant, if the finance officer is chosen as diocesan administrator, he is to be replaced by someone appointed by the finance council, a rare example of a significant diocesan appointment by someone other than the bishop. If during a vacant see the finance officer resigns or dies, the diocesan administrator may appoint a finance officer, because he generally has the rights and obligations of a diocesan bishop.[225] Therefore, except for very brief intervals, a diocese would never be without a finance officer.

Prior to appointing the finance officer, the diocesan bishop must consult both the college of consultors and the finance council. However, he does not need their consent for the appointment. This consultative process is understandable, especially because of the close working relationship the finance officer will need to have with the finance council. The finance officer will frequently be required to prepare reports for consideration of the consultors and the finance council members on matters of extraordinary administration or alienation.

Since the canons on ecclesiastical office apply in this case, the individual appointed needs to meet the general requirements for office, namely communion with the Church[226] and suitability for the position, i.e., possession of the qualities required for the office.[227] The qualifications of the finance officer are twofold: professional and personal. Not only must the lay person or cleric have expertise in the area of finances, usually as a certified public accountant or a member of a similar profession, but he or she must also be noted for personal honesty and integrity.

A further indicator of stability in office for the finance officer is the requirement of a term of office. The diocesan bishop appoints the finance officer for a five-year term which is renewable without limit. As with all ecclesiastical appointments, this should be done in writing[228] and notarized,[229] although the appointments would be valid nonetheless. The requirement of a promise of service and confidentiality[230] applies to the finance officer as well as to other curial officials.

[225] Canon 427, §1.
[226] See above at note 204 for discussion of the appointment of a non-Catholic.
[227] Canon 149, §1.
[228] Canon 156.
[229] Canon 484, 2°.
[230] Canon 471.

The diocesan bishop can remove the finance officer prior to the fulfillment of his or her term only for grave cause. Even with such a cause, such as misappropriation of funds, the bishop must seek the advice of both the college of consultors and the finance council for validity. The diocesan bishop himself judges the seriousness of the cause and actually executes the decree of removal in writing. However, such a removal from office might not sever all diocesan responsibility for the finance officer. Any civil contractual obligations must be met[231] as well as requirements of financial support unless there are other provisions for such support.[232]

The function of the finance officer is stated in broad terms in paragraph three of this canon. Serving under the authority of the diocesan bishop, and operating within the scope of the budget prepared by the finance council, the finance officer administers the goods of the diocese. The diocesan bishop himself remains the administrator of such goods, but the finance officer provides the administrative services. The finance officer serves as a comptroller and disburses or authorizes the disbursement of funds to cover expenses according to diocesan policies.

Besides carrying out the functions stated in this canon, the finance officer may also serve the diocesan bishop by providing administrative services, such as assisting in budget preparation or the annual financial review, in relation to other juridic persons subject to the diocesan bishop or those which do not have their own administrator.[233] In such cases, the role and responsibility of the finance officer should be clearly understood by those entities.

The final responsibility assigned to the finance officer is the preparation of an annual report to the finance council. This report will usually be prepared under the direction of the finance officer but actually rendered by outside auditors. While the finance officer is not a member of the finance council, he or she may attend its meetings as staff to the council. The finance officer should at least attend the meeting at which the annual report is examined.

[231] Canon 192.

[232] Canon 195.

[233] Canons 1278; 1276, §1; 1279, §1.

CHAPTER III
THE PRESBYTERAL COUNCIL AND THE COLLEGE OF CONSULTORS
[cc. 495–502]

Among the consultative bodies required by the code are the presbyteral council and the college of consultors. Both are advisory groups composed of priests[234] who are to assist the diocesan bishop in his pastoral governance of the portion of the people of God entrusted to him. While the two groups have a connection with one another, they also have separate and distinct functions.[235] As with other consultative groups in the code, these two bodies serve an important role in the process of decision making within the diocese.[236]

Under the 1917 code diocesan consultors were to be appointed provided the diocese had no cathedral chapter (CIC 423–428).[237] The present code requires the establishment of a college of consultors in every diocese. The presbyteral council had no parallel in the 1917 code but finds its roots in the Vatican II mandate to reorganize the existing diocesan consultative groups according to contemporary needs.[238] Because of the close connection between the diocesan bishop and his [234] It appears that presbyteral orders is a constitutive element of membership in either body. Therefore, the diocesan bishop could not dispense from this provision to allow deacons or lay persons to be members of either body.

[235] For the relationship between the two bodies and their distinctive functions, see J. Provost, "Presbyteral Councils and Colleges of Consultors: Current Law and Some Diocesan Statutes," CLSAP (1987) 194–211.

[236] For a summary of the importance of consultation in decision making, see J. Provost, "Canonical Reflections," 232–235.

[237] See below on chapters of canons (cc. 503–510).

[238] CD 27.

presbyterate, Vatican II called for them to constitute "one priesthood" composed of different functions.[239] Based on this close communion, Vatican II counseled bishops to "listen to [the priests], indeed, consult them, and have discussions with them about those matters which concern the necessities of pastoral work and the welfare of the diocese."[240] The vehicle for such consultation was described as "a group or senate of priests to represent the presbytery" and its purpose set forth as giving "assistance to the bishop in his governance of the diocese."[241] This conciliar directive was further refined in the implementing legislation of Ecclesiae sanctae,[242] in which the establishment of such an assembly of priests was made a requirement for dioceses.

The current canonical legislation on presbyteral councils is consistent with these conciliar and postconciliar foundations. It develops in more detail some of the previous legislation but still allows for considerable diversity based on local ecclesial circumstances. While the canons set forth general principles on the council's form, membership, and manner of functioning, it is the local diocesan bishop who shapes the council according to the needs of the particular church. This chapter consists of seven canons on the presbyteral council and one canon on the college of consultors.

Eastern Churches: Presbyteral Council and College of Eparchial Consultors

The Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches addresses these two canonical institutes in canons 264 to 271. In both the sequence of topics and content, these canons basically parallel those of the Latin code.

[239] LG 28.

[240] PO 7.

[241] Ibid.

[242] ES I, 15, 1. The SCC circular letter, De consiliis presbyteralibus, April 11, 1970 (AAS 62 [1970] 459–465; CLD 7, 383–390) provided additional clarification and detail regarding these councils.

Establishment and Purpose of the Presbyteral Council

Canon 495 — §1. In each diocese a presbyteral council is to be established, that is, a group of priests which, representing the presbyterate, is to be like a senate of the bishop and which assists the bishop in the governance of the diocese according to the norm of law to promote as much as possible the pastoral good of the portion of the people of God entrusted to him.

§2. In apostolic vicariates and prefectures, the vicar or prefect is to establish a council of at least three missionary presbyters whose opinion, even by letter, he is to hear in more serious matters.

The establishment of a presbyteral council is required in every diocese.[243] Whereas the 1917 code referred to the chapter of canons and, by analogy, the diocesan consultors as the "senate" of the bishop, this canon reserves that description to the presbyteral council. This title, "senate," accurately describes the role of the council and its style of interaction with the diocesan bishop. While there are certain matters that the law requires the diocesan bishop to take to the presbyteral council, there is also a wide range of pastoral concerns about which the diocesan bishop will want to seek the counsel of this group of priests who are to act as his collaborators in the pastoral care of the diocese.[244] The presbyterate as a body always acts in relation to the bishop.[245] Thus, as a "senate" this group serves a representational as well as an advisory role. The entire presbyterate functions as collaborators with the diocesan bishop in his pastoral care of the diocese;[246] this council symbolizes, represents, and concretizes that collaboration by its direct interaction with the diocesan bishop in a manner that [243] It is also required in every eparchy (CCEO 264).

[244] See comments below on c. 500, §2.

[245] For a summary of the theological relationship between the presbyterate and the episcopal office, see Pagé, 116–119.

[246] Canon 384.

ordinarily would not be feasible with the entire presbyterate of a diocese. The council members do not supplant the role of the entire presbyterate as "assistants and counselors"[247] to the diocesan bishop but rather facilitate the process by which he attends and listens to them.

Some councils employ a committee structure within their organization with each committee charged with a specific area of concern, such as spirituality or social concerns. These committees meet to address certain issues, undertake background research for council discussion, and study various proposals that have come to the council. Even broader representation from among the presbyterate is possible when committee membership extends to priests not sitting on the council.

Paragraph two of this canon takes into account the special situation found in apostolic vicariates and prefectures. The law's accommodation to their circumstances allows for a smaller council. However, it must be composed of at least three members. The canon also provides an alternate means of obtaining their advice, namely by letter rather than by formal meetings. Nonetheless, the purpose of the council, providing counsel in matters of importance to the particular church, remains the same.

Statutes of the Presbyteral Council

Canon 496 — The presbyteral council is to have its own statutes approved by the diocesan bishop, attentive to the norms issued by the conference of bishops.

Each presbyteral council is to have its own governing documents, referred to in this canon as "statutes."[248] While these documents are not technically statutes in the sense of canon 94,[249] the elements found in formal statutes could be used to shape these presbyteral council documents; formal statutes define the purpose, constitution, government, and methods of operation of a body such as the council.

The canon does not designate who has the responsibility to draft the statutes of the council. Since a council does not exist until its statutes are established, the council itself does not write the statutes. In reality, in many dioceses, initial statutes have been drawn up by a task force or committee charged with that mission. Regardless of the source of the text of the statutes, it is the diocesan bishop who must approve them for them to have juridic effect. As with any document having legal effect, the statutes must be signed by him and notarized by the chancellor or another notary.[250]

While the content of presbyteral council statutes may vary greatly from diocese to diocese, taking into account local circumstances, subsequent canons determine certain elements that they must contain. These elements include: the manner of election of members,[251] the designation of ex officio members,[252] election rights of certain priests,[253] election procedures,[254] and terms of office of members.[255]

The canon indicates that the presbyteral council statutes are to be attentive to the norms issued by the conference of bishops. Earlier provisions for presbyteral council statutes appeared to expect more uniformity among the councils within the territory of a conference. They went so far as to refer to "common regulations" for these councils.[256] Were a conference of bishops to issue such norms and were they to receive a Vatican recogni-

[247] Ibid.

[248] See also CCEO 265.

[249] Canon 94 uses the term statutes to refer to the governing documents of juridic persons, and the presbyteral council is not a juridic person. See Pagé, 124–125. However, other commentaries differ in their interpretation of this canon and see c. 94 as applicable. See, for example, Alesandro, in CLSA Com, 402; J. Arrieta, in Pamplona ComEng, 365.

[250] Canon 474.

[251] Canon 497, 1°.

[252] Canon 497, 2°.

[253] Canon 498, §2.

[254] Canon 499.

[255] Canon 501, §1.

[256] ES, I, n. 17.

tio, the individual bishops would be bound to observe them.[257]

Presbyteral Council Membership and Election of Members

The following three canons address various issues relating to membership on the presbyteral council.[258] While deferring to local statutes in some cases, the canons set forth some universal expectations. These universal norms are consistent with the expectations of the role of the council: to be a representative body of the presbyterate and to assist the diocesan bishop in his governance function. Thus, there is provision for electing members from among the presbyterate at large, seating those who have specific functions within the diocese, and naming members by episcopal discretion. A manner of election must be part of the statutes and must be formulated in such a way as to guarantee the representational nature of the council. The rights of certain members of the presbyterate in relation to council elections are also designated by universal law.

Canon 497 — In what pertains to the designation of members of the presbyteral council:

1° the priests themselves are freely to elect about half, according to the norm of the following canons and of the statutes;

2° according to the norm of the statutes, some priests must be ex officio members, that is, members who are to belong to the council by reason of the office entrusted to them;

3° the diocesan bishop is freely entitled to appoint others.

This canon provides three means of attaining membership on the presbyteral council: by election, by office, or by episcopal appointment. Approximately half of the members are to be chosen by the presbyterate in a manner prescribed in the council statutes. The following canon will designate specifics regarding electoral rights. Regardless of the means of designation, once priests are on the council, there does not appear to be any distinction among the members; they share an equality of place on the council even though some, by statute, may be designated for certain organizational functions, such as moderator or secretary.

Free election is the means for designating approximately half of the members on the council. The phrase "about half" appears to be a compromise and lacks the legal precision one would expect. Previous documents on presbyteral councils had specified that the majority of the membership should result from election.[259] It will be for the statutes to make more precise the specific meaning of "about half" the membership.

The second category of membership is ex officio. By reason of the office they hold, certain members of the presbyterate are appropriate members of the council. Again, the statutes should specify which offices constitute the basis for council membership in light of the role the council plays. Since the council is to serve the diocesan bishop in his governance function, those who hold significant governance offices in the diocese would be suitable for council membership. The vicar general and episcopal vicars, especially if there is one designated in relation to the priests of the diocese, would be among those individuals to be considered for ex officio membership. Likewise, to facilitate the interaction between the council and the diocesan curia in aiding the bishop in diocesan governance, the moderator of the curia, especially if he is not a vicar general, would be an appropriate ex officio member of the council.

The presbyteral council is to serve as a key advisory body to the diocesan bishop. Thus, if, after considering the membership of the council achieved [257] At the time of this writing, the NCCB has not issued any norms on this matter. It did, however, issue theological, canonical, and pastoral reflections on such councils. See "United in Service: Reflections on the Presbyteral Council," Origins 21 (December 5, 1991) 409, 411–421.

[258] See also CCEO 266–268.

[259] De consiliis presbyteralibus 7.

by these two previous means of designation, the diocesan bishop should determine that additional members would enhance the function of the council, he remains free to name them. He is not required to do so, nor do the statutes necessarily have to make such a provision since this right of appointment is contained in the universal law. In making any such appointments, the diocesan bishop would not be permitted, however, to override the provision that "about half" the membership be elected.

Canon 498 — §1. The following have the right of election, both active and passive, in constituting a presbyteral council:

1° all secular priests incardinated in the diocese;

2° secular priests not incardinated in the diocese and priests who are members of some religious institute or society of apostolic life, who reside in the diocese and exercise some office for the good of the diocese.

§2. To the extent that the statutes provide for it, the same right of election can be conferred on other priests who have a domicile or quasi-domicile in the diocese.

This canon provides more specific determinations regarding election rights. It addresses both the right to elect council members and the right to be elected as a council member. The first paragraph provides a universal norm for the right to active and passive voice and the second allows the statutes of the particular council to extend the right to others.

The first category of priests possessing active and passive voice in council elections are those who are incardinated in the diocese. While incardination occurs with diaconal ordination,[260] incardination alone is an insufficient basis for these election rights since only priests, not deacons, are eligible to vote and be elected members of the council. It is incardination which is the foundation upon which this right rests, not office, domicile, or residence. Thus, as long as a priest remains incardinated in the diocese, active or retired, resident or not, he retains his rights regarding council elections. Since ecclesiastical authority can regulate the exercise of rights in light of the common good,[261] there may be some cases in which a priest, though still technically incardinated in a diocese, may not be permitted to exercise his electoral rights. For example, a priest who, though not laicized, has left the active ministry or one who is absent from the diocese without authorization for a considerable period of time may be so restricted.[262] The exercise of rights should never be regulated arbitrarily. Therefore, to help avoid any abuse of discretionary authority, it would be appropriate for the council statutes to delineate carefully those ineligible to participate in the election process.

The second category of priests who have the right to active and passive voice in council elections is found in part two of paragraph one. It actually consists of several different categories of priests. What they have in common is that, unlike the priests noted above, they are not incardinated in the diocese; likewise, they reside in the diocese. Neither domicile nor quasi-domicile is a prerequisite for council membership in this case. Residence alone, however, is not sufficient. It is required that they exercise some "office for the good of the diocese." This requirement is consistent with the purpose of the council, to assist the bishop in promoting the pastoral welfare of the people of the diocese. Because the canon does not clarify what constitutes an "office for the good of the diocese," the statutes should more clearly define the meaning of this phrase as it is applied in the individual diocese.

The first group under this heading is made up of secular priests. This category would include diocesan priests incardinated in another diocese and members of personal prelatures.[263] The second

[260] Canon 266, §1.

[261] Canon 223.

[262] Alesandro, in CLSA Com, 403.

[263] In its Declaration Regarding the Prelature of the Holy Cross and Opus Dei (August 23, 1982) the SCB specificategory of those resident in the diocese and possessing electoral rights consists of members of institutes of consecrated life, both members of religious institutes and members of secular institutes. This latter group would include those incardinated either into another diocese or the institute itself.[264] The final category of priests mentioned in this section is made up of members of societies of apostolic life who may be incardinated in another diocese or the society itself.[265]

The second paragraph of the canon proposes the possibility of extending electoral rights to other priests who are not in any of the categories already noted. The council statutes would need to make provision for such an extension of rights and clearly delineate to whom such rights are to be accorded. Unlike those priests who exercise an office for the good of the diocese, who need merely reside in the diocese, the members of this latter group must have a domicile or quasi-domicile there. However, they need not be providing any ministry for the benefit of the diocese. This category could include priests who remain incardinated in their own dioceses but have a retirement home in the diocese where they now maintain domicile. Likewise, it could include priests who have established a quasi-domicile by reason of a program of extended studies within the diocese.

Canon 499 — The manner of electing members of the presbyteral council must be determined in the statutes in such a way that, insofar as possible, the priests of the presbyterate are represented, taking into account especially the different ministries and various regions of the diocese.

The preceding canon established the criteria for electoral rights; this canon addresses the exercise of those rights by determining how elections are to be conducted. The canon allows broad discretion in the manner in which elections are held, requiring, however, that election procedures be established in the council's statutes. The council is, of its nature, to be representative of the presbyterate. Within the latitude allowed for diverse electoral procedures, the code encourages that the election results contribute to the representative nature of the council. This canon points out two bases of representation in particular, ministry and geography. In establishing electoral procedures, the statutes could specify other criteria for a representative council, such as age or membership in institutes of consecrated life or societies of apostolic life.

In some dioceses, elections are conducted primarily along territorial lines with the priests of each deanery, vicariate, or district having the right to elect a representative. In other dioceses, consideration is given to electing age-group representatives or representatives from various ministerial groupings, such as parochial ministry, educational ministry, or health-care ministry. A combination of both methods is employed in yet other dioceses. The canon, however, while encouraging that the elections result in a representative council, does not require elections by regional or ministerial groupings. Consideration could be given to general elections among the presbyterate for their determination of membership from among all eligible priests. The diocesan bishop could then assure appropriate representation by means of his own appointments to the council. More broadly based elections help avoid a sense of members' representing a distinctive constituency.[266] Their counsel to the bishop is to take into account the good of the entire diocese, not merely a given territory or segment of the population they "represent." A council that is reflective of the presbyterate of the whole diocese can assure that legitimate interests of various groups or areas, such as urban, rural, or ethnic cally referred to the clergy of the prelature as belonging to the secular clergy. With regard to presbyteral councils, in the same document the SCB stated: "As regards the constitution of presbyteral councils, they [priests of the prelature] enjoy active and passive voice" (AAS 75 [1982] 464; CLD 10, 129). This canon would, however, place the additional requirement of exercising an office for the good of the diocese as noted above.

[264] Canon 266, §3.

[265] Canon 266, §2.

[266] Alesandro, in CLSA Com, 403–404.

concerns, are brought before the council in its deliberations.

Manner of Operation of the Presbyteral Council

Canon 500 — §1. It is for the diocesan bishop to convoke the presbyteral council, preside over it, and determine the questions to be treated by it or receive proposals from the members.

§2. The presbyteral council possesses only a consultative vote; the diocesan bishop is to hear it in affairs of greater importance but needs its consent only in cases expressly defined by law.

§3. The presbyteral council is not able to act without the diocesan bishop who alone has charge of making public those things which have been established according to the norm of §2.

In addressing how the presbyteral council is to function, this canon[267] necessarily concentrates to a great degree on the relationship between the council and the diocesan bishop. Since the council is "to be like a senate of the bishop,"[268] its function cannot be seen apart from the bishop. He convenes the council, presides over it, and sets its agenda.[269] The council's proper role is that of an advisory body to the bishop. As such, it is more than an association of priests with its own agenda. The council's very existence is dependent on the diocesan bishop.[270]

The manner in which the aforementioned three roles of the diocesan bishop are exercised is not delineated in the canon. The frequency with which he is to convoke the council is not stated. Commentators differ on whether or not council statutes could legitimately state the frequency of meetings.[271] However, the statutes could set a standard for the frequency of meetings and, since the bishop approves the statutes, his freedom is duly protected. Obviously such a schedule could be modified at the discretion of the diocesan bishop. He could cancel meetings which are not seen as necessary or convene the council for additional meetings if there is a pressing need for the council's input on a matter requiring more immediate attention. The canon does not specify the manner in which the diocesan bishop convenes the council. To assure a legitimate convocation, the statutes should specify the procedure for convening the council. This provision takes on added importance when the counsel of the group is required for the validity of the bishop's actions.[272]

There are, likewise, no provisions for the manner in which the diocesan bishop presides over the council. He may do so personally or through another.[273] Should he elect to preside through another, the statutes should designate who (such as the vicar general) is eligible and the bishop should issue an episcopal mandate designating the individual as the council presider.[274] Given the role of the council and its relationship with him, the diocesan bishop should normally preside with [267] See also CCEO 269.

[268] Canon 495, §1.

[269] This role of the bishop is comparable to that of the pope vis-à-vis the synod (cc. 342–348), presiding, setting agenda, etc.

[270] For more on this relationship see comments below under c. 501.

[271] Pagé maintains that the statutes could determine the frequency or regularity of the meetings but cautions against meetings for the mere sake of meeting without sufficient cause or agenda (141). Arrieta, in Pamplona ComEng, holds that such statutory regulation of the frequency of meetings would violate the bishop's right to convoke the council (367).

[272] Canon 127, §1 states that, for the validity of an action that requires counsel, the one required to seek such counsel must convoke the group either in the same manner as convening a group for elections (c. 166) or in accord with particular law. The council statutes could state the manner of convoking the group. The diocesan bishop would be bound to follow such a procedure if his consultation of the council were to be valid. Some matters require such counsel, e.g., establishing or suppressing parishes (c. 515, §2). Failure to convene the council legitimately could result in an invalid consultation and hence an invalid action in relation to the parish.

[273] For a more extended discussion of the various meanings of "presiding" and arguments favoring the conclusion that the bishop need not preside personally, see Pagé, 142–144.

[274] Canon 134, §3.

other provisions available for exceptional cases. The fact that the bishop is to preside does not preclude others fulfilling tasks such as chairing or facilitating meetings.

An additional role of the bishop is determining the questions to be treated by the council or receiving proposals from members. This action would usually be referred to as "setting the agenda." Again, the diocesan bishop may do so personally or utilize the services of an individual or committee to assist in this process. Certain matters must be brought to the council[275] for their consultation. When circumstances warrant, these issues would be part of the agenda for a council meeting. However, the council will almost certainly meet far more often than such matters would dictate. These other meetings will involve a broad range of matters in which the input from the council will assist the bishop in his governance of the diocese. Agenda items in this category can arise either from the bishop or from the council members. Many councils have developed processes by which issues or proposals generated from the presbyterate at large or from other members of the faithful can be directed to the council for their consideration. Likewise, the diocesan bishop may find it helpful at times to utilize the services of his diocesan pastoral council to surface issues for the consideration of the presbyteral council.

The second paragraph of canon 501 specifies the role and authority of the council in relation to the diocesan bishop. While the diocesan bishop must take certain matters to the council for its consideration, ultimately the bishop himself must decide about taking action on these matters. He makes his decision in light of the advice given by the council, but it does not make the decision for him given its role as advisory to the bishop. Thus council members are said to have a consultative vote only. However, their consultation helps shape the decision since the bishop is to come to them prior to making a decision, and their input must be considered by him. As his council, the members assist him in the decision-making process and thus are an essential part of the decision even though they do not actually make it.

Some of the "affairs of greater importance" about which the diocesan bishop is to consult with the council are defined by law; other such matters will be at his own discretion. This paragraph indicates that the bishop needs the consent of the council "only in cases expressly defined by law." Commentators differ regarding whether or not any such cases exist in the universal law.[276]

The final paragraph of the canon is also consistent with the advisory nature of the council. Since the council members do not have an existence apart from the one whom they advise and since they do not convene themselves or establish their own agenda, they can never act without or apart from the bishop. Likewise, since the decisions are ultimately the diocesan bishop's, so also is the right to make public those deliberations and decisions. The manner in which he publicizes them is also at his discretion. He need not do so personally;

[275] The diocesan bishop must bring the following matters to the presbyteral council for their consultation: the decision to convene a diocesan synod (c. 461, §1); the establishment, suppression, or notable alteration of parishes (c. 515, §2); the allocation of offerings made by the faithful for parochial services and the remuneration of clerics for the same (c. 531); the determination that there should be a pastoral council in each parish (c. 536, §1); the decision to build a new church (c. 1215, §2); the decision that a church, no longer able to be used for worship, be relegated to profane use (c. 1222, §2); the exercise of his right to impose a moderate tax on juridic persons subject to him (c. 1263). He must also propose names to the council for its establishment of a standing group of pastors from whom he will choose two to assist him in removing or involuntarily transferring a pastor (cc. 1742, §1; 1745, 2°; 1750).

[276] See Read, in CLSGBI Com for the opinion that no such cases exist in universal law but that the diocesan bishop could issue particular law which would establish certain matters requiring consent (277). See Arrieta, in Pamplona ComEng for the opinion that selection of the pastor consultors (c. 1742, §1) is a matter in which the consent of the presbyteral council is required rather than merely counsel (367). CCEO 269, §2 refers to the bishop's needing consent only in cases expressly determined in common law.

he may use the services of others to prepare and disseminate the information. The statutes may define the manner in which minutes and other council materials are published and distributed. Such communication assists the diocesan bishop in his general relationship with the presbyterate at large. It also serves to keep the larger group informed of the issues being addressed by the council and aids in ensuring a smoother transition of new members onto the council.

Term and Cessation of the Presbyteral Council

Canon 501 — §1. Members of the presbyteral council are to be designated for a time determined in the statutes, in such a way, however, that the entire council or some part of it is renewed within five years.

§2. When a see is vacant, the presbyteral council ceases and the college of consultors fulfills its functions. Within a year of taking possession, a bishop must establish the presbyteral council anew.

§3. If the presbyteral council does not fulfill the function entrusted to it for the good of the diocese or gravely abuses it, the diocesan bishop, after having consulted with the metropolitan, or, if it concerns the metropolitan see itself, with the suffragan bishop senior in promotion, can dissolve it but must establish it anew within a year.

The presbyteral council has stability but not permanence.[277] Its members are not designated for life, and it does not continue in existence under any and all circumstances. This canon addresses both issues, stability and transience. Stability on the council is achieved through the terms of members, to be determined by the council statutes. These terms, however, should not be of such a duration that there is little or no turnover of membership. The council is to be renewed, entirely or in part, within five years. The diocesan bishop through the statutes could determine that the entire council will remain stable for five years, at which time an entirely new council will be seated.[278] Alternately, he could decide that a gradual turnover during the five-year period would be more appropriate to the needs of the diocese. Either method would contribute to the stability that makes a presbyteral council effective.

Since the council cannot act without the diocesan bishop, the council ceases to exist at the time of a vacant see. At that time any matters which the council would ordinarily handle are directed to the college of consultors. Because the presbyteral council is a required body (c. 495, §1), however, once the see is no longer vacant, a new council must be convened within the year. The new diocesan bishop certainly would be free to reconvene the same members who had served under the previous bishop, but they would still be a new council.

Only under the most serious circumstances can the diocesan bishop suppress the presbyteral council. There must be evidence that the council members are not fulfilling their proper function or are abusing their role. The canon gives no examples of what would constitute this serious a dereliction of duty. Presumably obstinate refusal to assemble when convened by the bishop or a failure to address issues of major importance he presents to them would be grounds for the council's dissolution. In order to monitor such a serious act of discretionary authority, the canon makes provision for prior consultation. Suffragan bishops must consult with the metropolitan and the metropolitan with the senior suffragan bishop. While the diocesan bishop is not bound to accede to the advice given, his failure to consult could result in the invalidity of the dissolution.[279]

The dissolution of a presbyteral council would be a rare event. If it were to be done, however, a properly notarized, written decree should be issued with the reasons for the decision given, at least in summary form.[280] If a council is suppressed, it cannot remain so indefinitely; the bishop must establish a new council within a year. The canon does not make any provision regarding actions requiring consultation of the presbyteral council during the time of its suppression. Since the college of consultors exists as a separate entity, it does not cease with the dissolution of the council. The legislator may have intended that the provision of the preceding paragraph also be applicable here. Hence, as in the case of a vacant see, the consultors act in lieu of the council.

[277] See also CCEO 270.

[278] The statutes would need to make provision for situations in which members cease from office who are on the council because of the office they hold.

[279] Canon 127, §2, 2°.

College of Consultors

Canon 502 — §1. From among the members of the presbyteral council and in a number not less than six nor more than twelve, the diocesan bishop freely appoints some priests who are to constitute for five years a college of consultors, to which belongs the functions determined by law. When the five years elapse, however, it continues to exercise its proper functions until a new college is established.

§2. The diocesan bishop presides over the college of consultors. When a see is impeded or vacant, however, the one who temporarily takes the place of the bishop or, if he has not yet been appointed, the priest who is senior in ordination in the college of consultors presides.

§3. The conference of bishops can establish that the functions of the college of consultors are to be entrusted to the cathedral chapter.

§4. In an apostolic vicariate and prefecture, the council of the mission mentioned in can. 495, §2 has the functions of the college of consultors unless the law establishes otherwise.

The college of consultors is a required body in the diocese.[281] Its constitution, membership, functions, and duration are all dictated by universal law. This canon does not describe the role of the college of consultors, unlike canon 495 which called the presbyteral council a kind of senate. The nature of that role emerges, however, from the various canons which assign responsibilities to the college.

The diocesan bishop freely appoints members to the college of consultors, but he is limited in the pool of candidates from which he may draw; he must select members of the college from among the members of the presbyteral council. Therefore, the consultors must be priests or bishops. Once one becomes a member of the college of consultors, however, that membership is independent of presbyteral council membership. Thus, one could cease to serve on the presbyteral council and still retain membership on the college of consultors.[282]

Members are appointed for five-year terms.[283] Again, this term is independent of any term a college member may have as a member of the presbyteral council. However, when a new college is constituted, it must be constituted from presbyteral council members. One's membership on the college does not cease merely by expiration of time. Notification of the cessation from office must be communicated in writing (c. 186). The college may continue in existence beyond its five-year term; by the law itself it continues until replaced by a new college.

The size of the college of consultors is at the discretion of the diocesan bishop within the bounds set by this canon. There must be at least six members but no more than twelve. Consultors who cease from office need to be replaced only if

[280] Canon 51.

[281] See also CCEO 271.

[282] This issue was addressed in a response from the PCILT. See AAS 76 (1984) 747; RRAO 1990, 112. An analysis of this interpretation can be found in L. Wrenn, Authentic Interpretations on the 1983 Code (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1993) 15–16.

[283] For an opinion that the individual members do not have terms but that the college as a whole is constituted for five years, that the members "are named as a group and remain in office as a group for the five year period, or even longer if a new group has not been named," see Provost, "Presbyteral Councils and Colleges of Consultors," 198.

the total number would fall below the required six.[284]

The following functions of the college of consultors are determined by law:

(1) when a see has been vacant for a year, a diocesan administrator can grant excardination or incardination only with the consent of the college of consultors (c. 272);

(2) some of the members are to be consulted by the pontifical legate prior to selection of a diocesan or coadjutor bishop (c. 377, §3);

(3) a coadjutor bishop takes possession of his office by showing his letter of appointment to the diocesan bishop and the college of consultors (c. 404, §1);

(4) if the see is impeded, a coadjutor and auxiliary bishop take office by showing their letters of appointment to the college of consultors (c. 404, §3);

(5) when a see is impeded and there is no coadjutor, or he also is impeded, the college of consultors is to select a priest to govern the diocese if the diocesan order of succession is not available (c. 413, §2);

(6) if there is no auxiliary bishop, the college assumes the governance of a vacant see in the interim before the selection of a diocesan administrator (c. 419);

(7) the college is to elect a diocesan administrator within eight days of receiving notice that the see is vacant (c. 421, §1);

(8) in the absence of an auxiliary bishop, the college is to notify the Apostolic See of the death of the diocesan bishop (c. 422);

(9) chancellors and other notaries cannot be removed from office by a diocesan administrator without the consent of the college (c. 485);

(10) prior to naming a finance officer, the diocesan bishop is to consult with the college (c. 494, §1);

(11) the finance officer cannot be removed from office during his term without the diocesan bishop's having also consulted the college (c. 494, §2);

(12) the diocesan administrator is to make his profession of faith in the presence of the college (c. 833, 4°);

(13) the college must give its consent before the diocesan administrator can issue dimissorial letters (c. 1018, §1, 2°);

(14) the diocesan bishop must consult with the college prior to placing more important acts of administration (c. 1277);

(15) the diocesan bishop, likewise, needs the college's consent for acts of extraordinary administration (c. 1277);

(16) the diocesan bishop also needs its consent for alienation of property beyond the amount specified by the conference of bishops (c. 1292, §1).

The diocesan bishop is certainly free to take up additional matters with the college of consultors, seeking its advice on issues of import for the diocese. Its consultative role, however, is not to supplant that of the presbyteral council.

Under ordinary circumstances the diocesan bishop presides over the college of consultors. However, when a see is vacant or impeded, that role is assumed by the one who takes his place. Since the consultors themselves are to select the diocesan administrator when a see is vacant, there will obviously be an interim time when there is no one in the place of the diocesan bishop to preside. In that case, the consultor who is senior by ordination presides over the college.

Two final paragraphs of this canon deal with somewhat exceptional cases. In some situations, a conference of bishops may determine that those functions listed above which the law assigns to the college of consultors can be exercised by the cathedral chapter. The missionary council, which takes the place of a presbyteral council in apostolic vicariates and prefectures, also fulfills the functions of the college of consultors unless there is another provision in law.[285]

[284] Ibid. See also CCEO 271, §3 which explicates this point.

CHAPTER IV
CHAPTERS OF CANONS
[cc. 503–510]

This chapter of the code contains only eight canons, considerably reduced from the thirty-two found in the 1917 code (CIC 391–422). Chapters of canons evolved over history[286] and now exist only in a few places. The presbyteral council and college of consultors fulfill many of the functions previously assigned to the chapter.[287] The main role of the chapter is now liturgical, although in some places the chapter enjoys certain prerogatives such as a significant role in the selection of bishops.[288] The code mainly addresses organizational issues such as statutes, membership, and remuneration of the chapter of canons. Only one paragraph in this section applies to dioceses which do not have a chapter of canons; the bishop must appoint a priest to fulfill the role ordinarily assumed by the canon penitentiary (c. 508, §2). There is no corresponding section in the Eastern code.

Role of the Chapter of Canons

Canon 503 — A chapter of canons, whether cathedral or collegial, is a college of priests which performs more solemn liturgical functions in a cathedral or collegial church. In addition, it is for the cathedral chapter to fulfill the functions which the law or the diocesan bishop entrusts to it.

The canon describes the chapter of canons as a group of priests who fulfill a liturgical function. There are two types of chapters of canons, cathedral and collegiate. The former group is connected with the cathedral church of a diocese and the latter with any other church. The cathedral chapter no longer serves as the bishop's "senate and counsel" (CIC 391, §1); nor does it assume authority during a vacant see (CIC 431–435, 443); these functions are now performed by the presbyteral council and the college of consultors.

Establishment, Modification, and Suppression

Canon 504 — The erection, alteration, or suppression of a cathedral chapter is reserved to the Apostolic See.

This canon applies to cathedral chapters only.[289] Their establishment and suppression as well as any alteration are reserved to the Apostolic See. Although earlier drafts of this canon had applied the same reservation to collegial chapters,[290] the diocesan bishop has this authority over collegial chapters.

Statutes

Canon 505 — Each and every chapter, whether cathedral or collegial, is to have its own statutes, drawn up through a legitimate capitular act and [285] One such special provision occurs during the vacant or impeded see; whereas in a diocese the college of consultors assumes governance, in an apostolic vicariate or prefecture the pro-vicar or pro-prefect assumes that role (c. 420).

[286] For a historical summary, see J. Abbo and J. Hannan, The Sacred Canons, vol. 1 (St. Louis: Herder Book Co., 1960) 400–401.

[287] The only exception to this norm would occur if a conference of bishops determined that the role of the college of consultors were to be entrusted to the cathedral chapter (c. 502, §3).

[288] See, for example, R. Metz, "Papal Legates and the Appointment of Bishops," J 52 (1992) 259–294.

[289] Arrieta, in Pamplona ComEng, applies this reservation to both types of chapters (371).

[290] Comm 13 (1981) 135.

approved by the diocesan bishop. These statutes are neither to be changed nor abrogated except with the approval of the same diocesan bishop.

The chapter itself draws up its statutes; but they are approved, abrogated, or changed by the diocesan bishop alone. The statutes themselves will determine the requirements for the legitimacy of the capitular act. The diocesan bishop should put his approval, abrogation, or alteration of the statutes in writing (c. 474). These documents are not technically statutes in the sense of canon 94.[291] Many of the elements found in formal statutes, however, are listed as required elements of chapter statutes in the following canon.

Canon 506 — §1. The statutes of a chapter are to determine the constitution of the chapter and the number of canons, always without prejudice to the laws of its foundation. They are to define those things which the chapter and individual canons are to do in the performance of divine worship and ministry. They are to determine the meetings in which the affairs of the chapter are handled and establish the conditions required for the validity and liceity of those affairs, without prejudice to the prescripts of universal law.

§2. The statutes are also to define the compensation, whether stable or to be given on the occasion of the performance of some function, and, attentive to the norms issued by the Holy See, the insignia of the canons.

The statutes define the type of chapter, the number of members, corporate and individual responsibilities for worship and other ministry, the scheduling and conduct of meetings, and the requirements for the chapter's valid and licit acts. The statutes are also to designate the amount and manner of compensation of the canons, whether ongoing or related to the performance of a specific function, as well as the insignia to be worn by members in accord with universal norms.[292]

Organization of Chapters

Canon 507 — §1. One of the canons is to preside over the chapter; other offices are also to be constituted according to the norm of the statutes, after the practice prevailing in the region has been taken into consideration.

§2. Other offices can be entrusted to clerics who do not belong to the chapter; through these offices they assist the canons according to the norm of the statutes.

This canon declares that one of the members is to preside over the chapter but does not establish the manner of determining this presidency. The statutes should include this provision. The president could be elected by the members or appointed by the diocesan bishop.[293] The statutes can also establish other offices in keeping with local custom. In addition to naming offices held by chapter members, the statutes may determine other auxiliary offices which can be held by clerics who are not members.

The Canon Penitentiary

Canon 508 — §1. By virtue of office, the canon penitentiary of a cathedral church and of a collegial church has the ordinary faculty, which he cannot delegate to others, of absolving in the sacramental forum outsiders within the diocese and members of the diocese even outside the territory of the diocese from undeclared latae sententiae censures not reserved to the Apostolic See.

[291] Canon 94 uses the term statutes to refer to the governing documents of juridic persons and the chapter is not a juridic person. However, one commentator differs in this interpretation of the status of the chapter and describes it as a public juridic person. See Read, in CLSGBI Com, 280.

[292] The most recent norms on insignia were issued in the form of a March 18, 1987 CFC circular letter to presidents of conferences of bishops. See AAS 79 (1987) 603–604.

[293] See comments under c. 509.

§2. Where there is no chapter, the diocesan bishop is to appoint a priest to fulfill the same function.

This canon addresses the ecclesiastical office of canon penitentiary. The canon penitentiary possesses the ordinary faculty to remit, in the internal sacramental forum, all undeclared latae sententiae censures[294] which are not reserved to the Apostolic See.[295] However, he cannot delegate this faculty to others. He exercises this faculty on behalf of any penitents who approach him within his own diocesan territory; if he is outside his territory he can absolve only members of his diocese.

In those dioceses without a chapter of canons, the diocesan bishop is to appoint a priest with the same faculties as a canon penitentiary. In place of such an appointment, the bishop could delegate all priests to remit undeclared, unreserved, latae sententiae censures.[296]

Appointment of Canons

Canon 509 — §1. After having heard the chapter, it is for the diocesan bishop, but not a diocesan administrator, to confer each and every canonry, both in a cathedral church and in a collegial church; every contrary privilege is revoked. It is for the same bishop to confirm the person elected by the chapter to preside over it.

§2. A diocesan bishop is to confer canonries only upon priests outstanding in doctrine and integrity of life, who have laudably exercised the ministry.

The diocesan bishop enjoys the right of free conferral of the office of canon, both cathedral and collegial (cf. c. 157). However, this same right does not transfer to the diocesan administrator when the see is vacant. Prior to making any such appointments, the bishop is to consult the appropriate chapter. He is not required to accede to its opinion, but the appointment would be invalid if he did not consult it at all.[297]

The latter part of paragraph one addresses the bishop's right to confirm in office a priest elected as president of the chapter. The meaning of this stipulation was clarified by an authoritative code commission interpretation issued on January 24, 1989.[298] The question was raised whether canon 509, §1 requires that the chapter elect its president. From the negative response given in the interpretation, we can conclude that the diocesan bishop is free to appoint the president but that, if the statutes call for an election, the diocesan bishop has the right to confirm the election.[299] The general norms on confirmation of an election require that the elected individual, unless legitimately impeded, request confirmation, personally or through another, within eight useful days (c. 179, §1). The bishop cannot refuse confirmation if the election was valid and the person is suitable (c. 179, §2). He is to communicate his confirmation in writing (c. 179, §3) at which time the one elected obtains all the rights associated with the office (c. 179, §5).

The second paragraph of canon 509 states the qualifications of chapter members. They are to be priests noted for their sound doctrine and integrity of life who have a proven record of ministry. These same qualities are among those required for other significant diocesan offices, such as vicar general or episcopal vicar.[300] In contrast with the qualifications for these offices, however, there is neither an age requirement for chapter members nor restrictions on the appointment of the bishop's close relatives.[301]

Relationship with Parishes

Canon 510 — §1. Parishes are no longer to be joined to a chapter of canons; the diocesan bishop

[294] Canons 1331–1335.

[295] For censures reserved to the Apostolic See, see cc. 1367; 1370, §1; 1378, §1; 1382; 1388, §1.

[296] See Alesandro, in CLSA Com, 409.

[297] Canon 127, §1.

[298] See AAS 81 (1989) 99; RRAO 1989, 105.

[299] L. Wrenn, Authentic Interpretations, 55–56.

[300] Canon 478, §1.

[301] Canon 478, §2.

is to separate from a chapter those parishes which are united to it.

§2. In a church which is at the same time parochial and capitular, a pastor is to be designated, whether chosen from among the members of the chapter or not. This pastor is bound by all the duties and possesses the rights and faculties which are proper to a pastor according to the norm of law.

§3. It is for the diocesan bishop to establish definite norms which fittingly integrate the pastoral duties of the pastor and the functions proper to the chapter, taking care that the pastor is not a hindrance to capitular functions nor the chapter to parochial functions. The diocesan bishop, who above all is to take care that the pastoral needs of the faithful are aptly provided for, is to resolve conflicts if they occur.

§4. Alms given to a church which is at the same time parochial and capitular are presumed given to the parish unless it is otherwise evident.

The 1917 code provided for three possible scenarios when the cathedral or collegiate church was also the parish church: the parish could be joined fully (pleno iure) to the chapter which would technically be the pastor although one member of the chapter would function as a parochial vicar and provide ordinary pastoral care (CIC 402; 471, §1); the office of pastor was one of the benefices (CIC 1409) given to a particular chapter member (CIC 415); the chapter and parish were separate entities, sharing a common church. Canon 510 prohibits all but the third option; parishes may no longer be united with a chapter.[302] Likewise, the diocesan bishop is to sever the connection of parishes previously united to a chapter.

The canon does allow a church to be both parochial and capitular, but in such cases a pastor is to be appointed with all of the rights and obligation of other pastors.[303] The pastor may be a member of the chapter or another priest as the bishop determines. The pastoral care of the parishioners takes precedence over any chapter function (c. 1752). In order to avoid conflicts, the bishop is to set norms governing the relationship between the duties of the pastor and the role of the chapter. If conflicts do arise, the bishop is likewise the final arbiter.

The final paragraph clarifies financial issues. Offerings given to the church are presumed to be given to the parish, not the chapter (cf. c. 1267, §1). This presumption would be overturned only by proof that the chapter was the intended recipient, e.g., a will specifically naming the chapter as the beneficiary.

CHAPTER V
THE PASTORAL COUNCIL
[cc. 511–514]

The roots of the diocesan pastoral council are evident in conciliar documents and postconciliar literature.[304] The clearest conciliar foundation for its existence and composition was the statement in Christus Dominus 27: "It is highly desirable that in every diocese a pastoral council be established, presided over by the diocesan bishop himself, in which clergy, religious and laity specially chosen for the purpose will participate." This same source stated the general purpose of this council as being "to investigate matters relating to pastoral activities, to consider them, and to formulate practical conclusions concerning them." In a similar vein, Ad gentes 30 promoted the coordination of the diocesan apostolate and missionary activity by means of "a pastoral council in which clergy, religious and lay people would have a part through elected delegates" and stated that the diocesan bishop "should, as far as possible, establish" such a council.

[302] See c. 520, §1 for a similar prohibition against naming a juridic person as pastor of a parish.

[303] See, for example, cc. 528–538.

[304] For an overview and analysis of the development of pastoral councils, see J. Renken, "Pastoral Councils: Pastoral Planning and Dialogue Among the People of God," J 53 (1993) 132–154.

Besides these conciliar texts,[305] postconciliar documents promoted the establishment of a diocesan pastoral council and provided more specificity regarding its function and means of operation. The motu proprio Ecclesiae sanctae I, 16 reiterated that the pastoral council was strongly commended and set forth six additional points:

(1) in fulfilling its function of examining and considering pastoral work and proposing practical conclusions, the council assists in promoting the life of the gospel among the people of God;
(2) the establishment of a pastoral council can be accomplished in different ways, is convened as the diocesan bishop finds it helpful, is consultative in nature, and is ordinarily permanent although there may be a temporary character to its membership and various activities;
(3) the council includes clergy, religious, and laity;
(4) the accomplishment of its work will require study and cooperation with other groups and institutions involved in the same fields of study;
(5) pastoral councils can be interritual in composition;
(6) the diocesan bishop has broad discretion in deciding other matters relating to the pastoral council.

Ecclesiae sanctae I, 17 suggests that, in implementing the norms on councils, the bishops of a conference should consult together and issue common regulatory norms for their dioceses.[306] It also advises that diocesan bishops coordinate the various councils within their dioceses by defining their different competencies, promoting their mutual cooperation, and providing common or continuing sessions among them.

The 1971 synod of bishops also briefly referred to the diocesan pastoral council. Its function is to provide, after study and consideration, conclusions for the systematic arrangement and effective implementation of the diocesan pastoral program.

The most extensive postconciliar document relating solely to diocesan pastoral councils was the 1973 circular letter issued by the Congregation for the Clergy.[307] The document once again pointed out that such councils are important and helpful and quoted directly from Christus Dominus 27 on their purpose. Having restated the areas of competence from the conciliar source, the document proceeded to point out areas which are beyond the pastoral council's competence, such as doctrinal questions or moral issues. The document stated that pastoral questions which involve matters of jurisdiction are more rightly directed to the senate of priests, but the diocesan bishop may bring such matters to the pastoral council for its consideration provided he also undertakes the required canonical consultation. The circular letter highlighted the council's representative nature, though not in a strictly juridical sense, and pointed out that since most believers in any diocese are lay, the majority of the pastoral council should also be lay. This document reiterated the council's consultative nature but also pointed out that the diocesan bishop is to consider its judgments seriously. The relationship between the diocesan bishop and the pastoral council is clear; the diocesan bishop is to preside over it, and it ceases when the see is vacant.

The 1973 Directory on the Pastoral Ministry of Bishops reiterated the conciliar and early postconciliar statements on pastoral councils and their function (n. 204). The Directory noted that such councils were highly recommended, even though [305] The only additional conciliar reference is in a footnote to Presbyterorum ordinis, n. 7, indicating that the priests' senate is distinguished from the diocesan pastoral council because this latter group includes laity and its function is confined to the investigation of pastoral matters, not the management of the diocese.

[306] This suggestion of common norms within a conference territory was abandoned during the revision process, and it was determined that no reference be made to such common norms (Comm 13 [1981] 149).

[307] SCC, "Pastoral Council" (January 25, 1973), in CLD 8, 280–288.

not mandatory, and that the diocesan bishop should have great respect for council recommendations since the pastoral council offers him "the serious and settled cooperation of the ecclesiastical community." This same document also encouraged parish pastoral councils and highlighted the possible linkage between them and the diocesan pastoral council.

In scope, content, and sequence the canons on the pastoral council (CCEO 272–275) in the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches parallel the legislation in the Latin code except that in the Eastern code the annual convening of the pastoral council is not required (c. 514, §2).

Establishment and Purpose of a Pastoral Council

Canon 511 — In every diocese and to the extent that pastoral circumstances suggest it, a pastoral council is to be constituted which under the authority of the bishop investigates, considers, and proposes practical conclusions about those things which pertain to pastoral works in the diocese.

Consistent with its conciliar sources, the canon proposes that a diocesan pastoral council be established by the diocesan bishop in every diocese. While such councils are not mandatory, conciliar and postconciliar endorsement of such councils would suggest that, unless pastoral circumstances warrant otherwise, the bishop should establish such a council. In the drafting stages there were efforts to strengthen the encouragement of councils, more in line with the conciliar texts. However, it was ultimately determined that circumstances among dioceses were quite diverse so the canon should not mandate councils.[308]

The threefold and interrelated purposes of the pastoral council (CD 27) are cited in the canon. The council is to investigate, consider, and propose practical conclusions in relation to the pastoral works of the diocese. In the coordination of the pastoral activity of a diocese, these three functions are usually components of what is referred to as "pastoral planning."[309]

The fact that the diocesan pastoral council is specifically charged with such a planning function does not mean that it necessarily proceeds with the task in isolation. In many dioceses, among the various curial offices there is one devoted to planning, or the task itself, if not the title, is assigned to a curial office that has other responsibilities as well, e.g., educational policy making. In those dioceses where such a planning office exists, there needs to be a careful delineation of the relationship between the planning function of the pastoral council and that of the diocesan office. In some cases, personnel from the diocesan curial planning office serve as staff to the pastoral council. The work of one body should not be seen as in competition with or opposed to the work of the other. The function of the diocesan office is to assist the diocesan bishop in directing pastoral activity and administering the diocese (c. 469). However, the pastoral council's function is not a directive or administrative one.

The canon does not delineate specific issues for the council to investigate, to ponder, and about which to probe conclusions. However, the 1973 circular letter can provide some pertinent suggestions:

> The pastoral council, therefore, can give the bishop great help by presenting him with proposals and suggestions: regarding missionary, catechetical and apostolic undertakings within the diocese; concerning the promotion of doctrinal formation and the sacramental life of the faithful; concerning pastoral activities to help the priests in the various social and territorial areas of the diocese; concerning public opinion on matters pertaining to the Church as it is more likely to be fostered in the present time, etc. The pastoral council can also be extremely useful for mutual communication of experiences and for proposed undertakings of various types by which the concrete needs of the people of the diocese may become clearer to the bishop and a more opportune means of pastoral action may be suggested to him. (n. 9)

[308] Rel, 120.

[309] Renken, 146–147.

The special circumstances of each diocese as well as its needs at a given moment in history will help shape the agenda of the pastoral council.

The council functions under the authority of the diocesan bishop. Issues to be addressed flow from him to the council or are addressed from the council to him. The council can serve the diocesan bishop well by assisting him in setting the direction of the diocese in various pastoral matters as well as by surfacing for him areas of pastoral concern among the faithful entrusted to his care.

The scope of the council's activity is the diocese. Despite some early indications that interdiocesan or supradiocesan councils might be explored, these suggestions were not developed. Concerns that pastoral councils might involve themselves in matters beyond the diocese were raised during the revision process; the canon clearly limits the role of the pastoral council to the diocese.[310]

Pastoral Council Membership

Canon 512 — §1. A pastoral council consists of members of the Christian faithful who are in full communion with the Catholic Church—clerics, members of institutes of consecrated life, and especially laity—who are designated in a manner determined by the diocesan bishop.

§2. The Christian faithful who are designated to a pastoral council are to be selected in such a way that they truly reflect the entire portion of the people of God which constitutes the diocese, with consideration given to the different areas of the diocese, social conditions and professions, and the role which they have in the apostolate whether individually or joined with others.

§3. No one except members of the Christian faithful outstanding in firm faith, good morals, and prudence is to be designated to a pastoral council.

In three paragraphs, this canon provides various details on the membership of the diocesan pastoral council. Members are to be drawn from the whole range of Christian faithful, namely clergy, members of institutes of consecrated life, and especially laity. They are to be in full communion with the Catholic Church (c. 205). Beyond these general descriptions, paragraph one establishes the broad discretionary authority of the diocesan bishop to clarify how membership is determined, from election or appointment or ex officio designation. The priority to be given to lay membership on the council is consistent with the 1973 circular letter principle that, since laity constitute the largest portion of the population of the diocese, they should be the majority of the council as well.

Paragraph two expresses other ways in which the council is to reflect the make-up of the diocese. Regardless of the membership selection process utilized by the diocesan bishop, the council should be a microcosm of the diocese as a whole. The council is not representative in the sense that its membership is based on the size of the population of a given area or component of the diocese, or in the sense that members represent constituents and their vested interests. The council is to reflect the membership of the diocese as a whole rather than being representative of its various parts. The council should be a microcosm of the diocese, whose welfare is to be considered in council deliberations.[311] Therefore, the diocesan bishop is to consider geographic, social and professional, as well as apostolic bases for council membership. In those dioceses with distinctive ethnic or language components, the overall membership of the council may also include those factors. In some cases, after an initial selection process has been completed, the diocesan bishop may make additional appointments to round out the membership so it is truly reflective of the diocese.

[310] Rel, 120.

[311] Renken, 152.

Just as establishing the manner of selection is left to the discretion of the diocesan bishop, so also is the determination of the size of the council, which will be affected by the size and complexity of the diocese. The council should be large enough to be reflective of the diocese and yet not so large that it defeats the council's purpose to investigate, consider, and propose pastoral conclusions. Too large a group can make interaction among members in discharging these tasks difficult or impossible. Too small a group cannot be reflective of the diocese in presenting diverse views and concerns to the bishop; too large a group can make it impossible for him to take effective counsel.

Besides the prerequisite of full communion with the Catholic Church, council members are also to be noted for their firm faith, good morals, and prudence (§3). These same characteristics are noted elsewhere when the code regulates membership in certain groups or eligibility for certain offices.[312]

Since those who constitute the pastoral council can be considered canonical office holders (c. 145), regardless of the selection process utilized by the diocesan bishop, the norms on appointment to office should be observed once the determination of membership has been made. A letter of appointment signed by the bishop and notarized should be sent to each member, even one who may serve in an ex officio capacity.

Canon 513 — §1. A pastoral council is constituted for a period of time according to the prescripts of the statutes which are issued by the bishop.

§2. When the see is vacant, a pastoral council ceases.

This brief canon presents two norms which highlight the council's fundamental consultative relationship with the diocesan bishop, who has the authority to determine the manner of that relationship. Although the council is not technically a juridic person, the bishop issues "statutes" to govern its workings. Such provisions are comparable to laws and are formally promulgated by the diocesan bishop and interpreted by him.[313]

Among the elements the statutes address is the term of office of the council members. Once established as an institution of the diocese, and not dissolved, the council has a permanent quality to it. In some cases it will be disbanded and reconstituted in its entirety according to a designated schedule, such as every three years. In other cases, members serve a set term, and there is a gradual turnover of the entire membership over a period of years. The statutes establish the term of office of the council members.

Also, because the council serves in a close relationship with the diocesan bishop, when the see is vacant, the council ceases to exist. This norm is consistent with the cessation or suspension of other bodies during a vacant see.[314] Unlike the canonical norms for the resumption of other bodies, however, there are no norms for the resumption of the pastoral council; the new diocesan bishop has full discretion in seeing to its reestablishment, determining its membership, and issuing its statutes, with any appropriate modifications.

Authority of the Pastoral Council

Canon 514 — §1. A pastoral council possesses only a consultative vote. It belongs to the diocesan bishop alone to convoke it according to the needs of the apostolate and to preside over it; it also belongs to him alone to make public what has been done in the council.

[312] See, for example, the general requirement for lay persons to serve as experts or advisors individually or in councils (c. 228, §2); the personal characteristics to be found in candidates for the college of cardinals (c. 351, §1), bishops (c. 378, §1, 1°), diocesan administrators (c. 425, §2), vicars general or episcopal vicars (c. 478, §1).

[313] Canon 94, §3 establishes the general norm that statutes issued by one with legislative power, as is the case with the diocesan bishop, are governed by the canons on laws. See also n. 249 in this connection.

[314] The diocesan synod is suspended during a vacant see (c. 468, §2) and the presbyteral council ceases (c. 501, §2).

§2. The pastoral council is to be convoked at least once a year.

The pastoral council has been consistently viewed as a consultative rather than a deliberative body. It is not like the diocesan finance council, whose role is at times consultative and at other times deliberative, with certain matters referred by law for its consent; there are no canonical requirements that any matters be taken to the pastoral council for consultative or deliberative action. Its consultative nature, however, does not detract from its potential to serve as a valuable tool for consultation in setting pastoral directions for the diocese.[315]

Again, in line with the diocesan bishop's relationship with the council, he has the authority to convene it and preside over it. The pastoral needs of the diocese will determine the frequency with which the council gathers. However, once he establishes it, the diocesan bishop must convene the council at least once a year.

In presiding over the council, the diocesan bishop need not chair its meetings. Ordinarily he will preside at the meetings personally. However, he may delegate another to preside in his place. If this option is selected, avenues of communication between the delegate and the bishop will have to be carefully established to ensure that the council is an effective vehicle for consultation.

The statutes of the council should determine levels of and expectations regarding confidentiality. The diocesan bishop alone has the authority to make council matters public. The vehicles for doing so can include the publication of minutes, the issuance of annual reports, media conferences, etc. Again, the bishop can make matters public personally or through a delegate, e.g., a diocesan communications officer.

[315] Renken, 153.

Conclusion

The impact and use of diocesan pastoral councils in the United States have been the subject of three major studies since their inception. The first study was conducted in 1972 at the same time that a feasibility study for a national pastoral council was undertaken by the NCCB. A second study took place in 1984 as a project of the NCCB Committee on the Laity. The results of this latter study resulted in a publication of findings complete with reporting on specific dioceses where diocesan pastoral councils had been successfully established.[316] In 1997 a new study of diocesan pastoral councils was proposed as a joint project of the NCCB Committee on Pastoral Practices and the Secretariat for Family, Laity, Women and Youth. The Canon Law Society of America joined as a partner in the project as a result of a membership resolution at the 1996 annual convention.[317] The current study will include survey data from all dioceses and eparchies in the United States as well as an analysis of the implications of the data.[318]

[316] NCCB Committee on the Laity, Building the Local Church: Shared Responsibility in Diocesan Pastoral Councils (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1984).

[317] CLSAP (1996) 504–506.

[318] Diocesan and Eparchial Pastoral Councils: A National Profile (Washington, D.C.: Center for Applied Research in the Apostolate, 1998).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Association of Catholic Diocesan Archivists. Preparing for the 90's: Strategies for Diocesan Archivists and Records Managers. Chicago: Association of Catholic Diocesan Archivists, 1993.

Bassett, W., and P. Huizing, eds. The Finances of the Church. New York: Seabury, 1979.

Breitenbeck, M. "Practical Addendum on Policy-Making." In Confidentiality in the United States, 163–165. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1988

Cafardi, N. "Religious Affiliation of the Diocesan Finance Officer." In CLSA Advisory Opinions: 1984–1993, ed. P. Cogan, 99–102. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995.

CFB and CEP. Instruction on Diocesan Synods, July 8, 1997. Origins 27 (October 23, 1997) 324–331.

CLSA, "Canonical Standards in Labor-Management Relations: A Report." CLSAP (1987) 311–335.

Diocesan and Eparchial Councils: A National Profile. Washington, D.C.: Center for Applied Research in the Apostolate, 1998.

Farrelly, A. "The Diocesan Finance Council." Stud Can 23 (1989) 149–166.

Green, T. "Shepherding the Patrimony of the Poor." J 56 (1996) 706–734.

Holland, S. "Archives: In Service of Culture and Learning." J 46 (1986) 630–631.

Jennings, L. "A Renewed Understanding of the Diocesan Synod." Stud Can 20 (1986) 320–329.

Kennedy, R. "Shared Responsibility in Ecclesial Decision-Making." Stud Can 14 (1980) 5–23.

Metz, R. "Papal Legates and the Appointment of Bishops." J 52 (1992) 259–294.

Morrow, D. "The Chancellor as Archivist." CLSAP (1988) 225–227.

National Association of Church Personnel Administrators. Just Treatment for Those Who Work for the Church. Cincinnati: National Association of Church Personnel Administrators, 1986.

NCCB. "A Document on Ecclesiastical Archives," November 22, 1974. In Pastoral Letters of the United States Catholic Bishops, III, ed. H. Nolan, 470–471. Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1983.

———. "Economic Justice for All: Catholic Social Teaching and the U.S. Economy." Origins 27 (November 27, 1986) 409–455.

———. "United in Service: Reflections on the Presbyteral Council." Origins 21 (December 5, 1991) 409, 411–421.

NCCB Committee on the Laity. Building the Local Church: Shared Responsibility in Diocesan Pastoral Councils. Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1984.

Pagé, R. Les Églises particulières. Montreal: Les Éditions Paulines, 1985.

Provost, J. "Canonical Reflection on Selected Issues in Diocesan Governance." In The Ministry of Governance, ed. J. Mallett, 209–251. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1986.

———. "Presbyteral Councils and Colleges of Consultors: Current Law and Some Diocesan Statutes." CLSAP (1987) 194–211.

Rehrauer, A. "The Diocesan Synod." CLSAP 49 (1987) 1–15.

Renken, J. "Pastoral Councils: Pastoral Planning and Dialogue Among the People of God." J 53 (1993) 132–154.

Rinere, E. "The Confidentiality of Written Documents in Canon Law." In Confidentiality in the United States, 125–144. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1988.

Ross, D. "Participation in the Synod." ME 116 (1991) 462–482.

Wrenn, L. Authentic Interpretations on the 1983 Code, 15–16, 55–56. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1993.

CHAPTER VI
PARISHES, PASTORS, AND PAROCHIAL VICARS
[cc. 515–552][1]

PARISHES AND PASTORS [cc. 515–544]

In speaking to a group of French bishops during their ad limina visit on January 25, 1997, Pope John Paul II reflected on the importance of the parish in the life of each diocese. He said:

> [In] close collaboration with the other pastoral groups, it is essentially the parish which gives the Church concrete life, so that she may be open to all. Whatever its size, it is not merely an association. It must be a home where the members of the Body of Christ gather together, open to meeting God the Father, full of love and Savior in his Son, incorporated into the Church by the Holy Spirit at the time of their Baptism, and ready to accept their brothers and sisters with fraternal love, whatever their condition or origins.
>
> The parish institution is meant to provide the church's great services: prayer in common and the reading of God's Word, celebrations, especially that of the Eucharist, catechesis for children and the adult catechumenate, the ongoing formation of the faithful, communications designed to make the Christian message known, services of charity and solidarity and the local work of movements. In brief, the image of the sanctuary which is its visible sign, it is a building to be erected together, a body to bring to life and develop together, a community where God's gifts are received and where the baptized generously make their response of faith, hope and love to the call of the Gospel. At this time when pastoral structures are being renewed, it will be appropriate to resume the in-depth study of the ecclesiological teaching of the Second Vatican Council, in the Constitution on the Church Lumen gentium and in the various documents providing directives, especially those concerning priests and the laity.[2]

The Holy Father continued his reflections by discussing parish pastoral planning (consolidation of parishes or the creation of new parishes), collaboration between priests and lay persons in parishes (in pastoral councils and leadership teams), and various other elements of parish life.

Over a year later, on May 21, 1998, Pope John Paul II commented on the parish in the midst of reflections on the life and ministry of priests. The occasion was the ad limina visit of bishops from Michigan and Ohio in the United States. Underscoring the central, vital, and irreplaceable role of prayer in the life of every priest, the pope said:

> Indeed prayer for the needs of the church and the individual faithful is so important that serious thought should be given to reorganizing priestly and parish life to ensure that priests have time to devote to this essential task individually and in common. Liturgical and personal prayer, not the tasks of management, must define the rhythms of a priest's life, even in the busiest of parishes.[3]

[1] For other commentaries on these canons, see G. Read, "Chapter IV: Parishes, Parish Priests and Assistant Priests," in CLSGBI Com, 285–302; J. Calvo, "Parishes, Parish Priests and Assistant Priests," in Pamplona ComEng, 377–398.

[2] John Paul II, "The Vocation of the Parish," January 25, 1997 talk to the third group of French bishops on the ad limina visit. OssRomEng 1477 (February 5, 1997) 5. Reprinted in Church 13/2 (Summer, 1997) 43–46.

[3] John Paul II, "Priests, Their Life and Ministry," May 21, 1998 talk to the bishops of Michigan and Ohio on their ad limina visit, Origins 28 (June 18, 1998) 74.

To implement the vision of Pope John Paul II about the parish in ecclesial life requires, among many other important things, a clear and accurate understanding of the ecclesiastical legislation on the parish, its pastor, and other persons who serve the parochial community.

This commentary analyzes the universal law on pastors and parishes for the Latin church, contained in the Code of Canon Law, canons 515–544. The analysis considers each canon in relation to other legislation, including the 1917 code and conciliar and postconciliar texts. Consideration is given occasionally to the deliberations of those responsible for the creation of the canons during the revision of the 1917 code. The commentary gives special consideration to the Church's living understanding of the canons since the promulgation of the 1983 code, especially as that understanding has been expressed in further legislation and official teachings.

A history of the parish in the life of the Catholic Church is beyond the limited scope of this commentary.[4] Likewise, a detailed account of the revision of the 1917 code is beyond the scope of this commentary.[5]

Relation to the 1917 Code

Canons 515–544 of the 1983 code reflect canons 451–470 of the 1917 code. The 1917 code treated the parish within the context of the legislation on its pastor. The parish was bestowed upon the priest as a title (in titulum—meaning he rightfully possessed it), and it was his benefice[6] (CIC 1409–1488). Canon 216, §§1, 3–4 of the 1917 code briefly described the parish; this canon is reflected in canons 374 (in the chapter on particular churches), and 515, §§1–2 and 518 (in the chapter on parishes).

The current legislation considers the parish as a community of the faithful stably constituted within a particular church, whose pastoral care is entrusted to a pastor under the authority of the diocesan bishop. Norms about the pastor are considered within the context of norms on the parish, which is no longer considered his benefice.

The 1983 code contains a number of other notable changes from the 1917 code. The diocesan bishop has the power to erect, suppress, or alter all parishes, after having heard his presbyteral council (c. 515, §2). The parish is a juridic person by law (c. 515, §3). Quasi-parishes may exist in every particular church; they are understood as definite communities which are not yet erected as parishes (c. 516). The diocesan bishop may entrust the pastoral care of a parish (or parishes) to several priests in solidum (that is, jointly) with the requirement that one be the moderator of the group (c. 517, §1). When there is a lack of priests, two options are possible: (1) the diocesan bishop may arrange for a share in the exercise of parochial pastoral care to be entrusted to a deacon, lay person, or group of non-priests, in which case a priest with the powers and faculties of a pastor directs the pastoral care (c. 517, §2), or (2) the diocesan bishop may entrust the pastoral care of several neighboring parishes to the same pastor (c. 526, §1). Personal parishes may be erected without the approval of the Apostolic See (c. 518). Only a physical person can be a pastor (c. 520, §1). The distinction between irremovable and removable pastors is eliminated, and the conference of bishops can permit the diocesan bishop to appoint pastors for a specific term (c. 522). Each pastor is requested to submit his resignation at age seventy-five (c. 538, §3). After he has heard the presbyteral council, the diocesan bishop may require the establishment of a pastoral council in every parish (c. 536). A finance council, however, must be established in every parish; its role is to assist the pastor in administering parochial temporal goods (c. 537). The pastor represents the parish in all juridic affairs, and is to take care that its goods are administered appropriately and legally (c. 532).

[4] See J. Coriden, The Parish in Catholic Tradition: History, Theology and Canon Law (New York: Paulist, 1997).

[5] In this connection, see T. Green, "Persons and Structures in the Church: Reflections on Selected Issues in Book II," J 45 (1985) 57–62; J. Janicki, "Parishes, Pastors, and Parochial Vicars (cc. 515–552)," in CLSA Com, 413–443; J. Lynch, "The Parochial Ministry in the New Code of Canon Law," J 42 (1982) 383–421.

[6] CIC 1409 described an ecclesiastical benefice as a juridic entity perpetually established or erected by competent authority, and consisting of a sacred office and a right to revenue from the endowment connected to that office. PO 20 called for the system of benefices to be abandoned or else so reformed that the principal emphasis was placed on the office with a secondary emphasis on the endowment itself. Canon 1272 of the 1983 code urges the gradual elimination of benefices and the placing of their income and endowment (corpus) into the diocesan institute for priests' support mentioned in c. 1274, §1.

Parish legislation in the current code is built upon the law of the 1917 code and the Church's subsequent lived experience, especially legal changes called for by the Second Vatican Council[7] and selected postconciliar documents.[8]

Following Vatican Council II, the Pontifical Commission for the Revision of the Code of Canon Law began to create revised law for the Latin church. The initial revision of the law on parishes and pastors was the work of the coetus De sacra hierarchia.[9] In 1977 the commission sent to the world's bishops and pontifical faculties the Schema Canonum Libri II De populo Dei,[10] which included proposed canons (cc. 349–376) on parishes and pastors. Responses were due by the end of 1978, and were later studied by the commission[11] which produced the 1980 Schema Codicis Iuris Canonici.[12] On August 22, 1981, Pericles Cardinal Felici, president of the commission, sent to commission members a Relatio[13] in which the secretariat and consultors reported and responded to various suggestions of the commission, and made some changes in the schema. The plenary session of the commission, enlarged by fifteen members, took place in Rome on October 20–29, 1981;[14] further changes were introduced; and the 1982 Codex Iuris Canonici, Schema novissimum[15] was sent to the Holy Father. Pope John Paul II studied the text with a small group of consultors, and episcopal conferences were informed that he would accept any further suggestions about the code. The revised Latin code was promulgated on January 25, 1983, and became effective on November 27, 1983.

Eastern Code

The universal legislation on parishes for the Eastern churches is contained in title VII (Eparchies and Bishops), chapter 3 (Parishes, Pastors, and Parochial Vicars), canons 279–303 of the Eastern code. The canons are generally similar to those in the 1983 code, with some notable exceptions.[16]

The Eastern code allows the eparchial bishop to erect personal parishes only after he has heard the presbyteral council (CCEO 280, §1). The eparchial bishop needs a grave cause to remove from the pastoral care of the pastor any non-exempt groups, buildings, and places in the pastor's territory (CCEO 283). A pastor is not to be named for a determined period unless: (1) it concerns a member of a religious institute or society of common life in the manner of religious; (2) a candidate agrees to this in writing; (3) it concerns a special case, in which instance the consent of the college of eparchial consultors is required; or (4) the particular law of his church sui iuris permits it (CCEO 284, §3). If a pastor is married, [7] Especially Christus Dominus 18, 23, 28, 30–32 and Presbyterorum ordinis 6–9. These and other fontes for each specific canon are identified in CIC An.

[8] Especially Ecclesiae sanctae I, 8, 18–21 and the Directory.

[9] Comm 4 (1972) 39–50; 5 (1973) 216–235; 6 (1974) 44–46; 8 (1976) 23–31; 24 (1992) 109–114, 137–159, 167–176; 25 (1993) 179–209.

[10] ComCICRec, Schema canonum Libri II De populo Dei (Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1977).

[11] Comm 13 (1981) 146–151, 271–294, 304–308.

[12] ComCICRec, Schema Codicis Iuris Canonici (Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1980).

[13] Comm 14 (1982) 123, 221–230.

[14] Comm 13 (1981) 256–270.

[15] ComCICRec, Codex Iuris Canonici, Schema novissimum (Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1982).

[16] The Eastern code canons which are parallel to those of the 1983 code are indicated in the footnotes to each Latin canon throughout this commentary.

good morals are required of his wife and his children who live with him (CCEO 285, §2). If the particular law of a church sui iuris permits a parish to be entrusted to several presbyters, the same law is to define more accurately the role of the moderator and other members of the group (CCEO 287, §2). Only three sacred functions (sacraments of Christian initiation, blessing of marriages, and ecclesiastical funeral rites) belong to the pastor; the parochial vicar needs at least the presumed permission of the pastor to perform them (CCEO 290, §2). The particular law of each church sui iuris is to prescribe when the pastor is to celebrate the Divine Liturgy for the people (CCEO 294) and to determine the nature and necessity of parish councils for pastoral affairs and for financial matters (CCEO 295).

The Eastern code makes no mention of quasi-parishes, special pastoral care for communities which cannot be erected as parishes or quasi-parishes (c. 516), or the entrusting of a participation in the exercise of pastoral care to an individual (or community) who is not a priest (c. 517, §2).

Notion of Parish[17]

Canon 515 — §1. A parish is a certain community of the Christian faithful stably constituted in a particular church, whose pastoral care is entrusted to a pastor (parochus) as its proper pastor (pastor) under the authority of the diocesan bishop.

This preliminary canon describes the elements[18] of the parish: it is (1) a certain community of the Christian faithful stably constituted in a particular church (2) whose pastoral care is entrusted to a pastor (parochus) as its proper pastor (pastor) under the authority of the diocesan bishop.[19] The parish is a part of the particular church, not an autonomous entity; the diocesan bishop who leads that church has authority over the pastor of each parish therein.[20]

[17] Cf. CCEO 279. The Eastern code does not say that the pastor (parochus) is the parish's "proper pastor (pastor) under the authority of the diocesan [eparchial] bishop."

[18] J. Arrieta identifies two essential elements of a parish: (1) a group of the faithful and (2) the proper pastor (parochus). These must be united to a bishop in his pastoral care for a portion of the people of God. "La parrocchia come comunità di fedeli e soggetto canonicamente unitario," in La parrochia, Studi giuridici, 24 (Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1997) 28.

A. Gauthier also sees two elements as comprising a parish: (1) a community of the Christian faithful (2) whose pastoral care is entrusted to a priest. "L'affidamento della parrocchia ad un gruppo di sacerdoti in solidum o a fedeli non sacerdoti nonché ad un istituto religioso," in La parrocchia, 51.

F. Coccopalmerio identifies seven elements of a parish: (1) community of the faithful; (2) generally determined only by a territory; (3) in a particular church; (4) stably constituted; (5) having a pastor as its proper pastor; (6) under the authority of the diocesan bishop; (7) with the cooperation of presbyters, deacons, and laity. De paroecia (Rome: Pontificia Università Gregoriana, 1991) 3–12.

J.-C. Périsset says the constitutive elements of the parish are (1) the community of the faithful and (2) pastoral care from its proper pastor; territoriality is extrinsic to the determination of the community. La Paroisse: Commentaire des canons 515–572 (Paris: Tardy, 1989) 13.

S. Euart says the parish has four fundamental elements: (1) community, (2) stable basis, (3) pastor, (4) diocesan bishop. "Parishes without a Resident Pastor: Reflections on the Provisions and Conditions of Canon 517, §2 and Its Implications," J 54 (1994) 374.

A. Sánchez-Gil identifies four elements which configure a parish: (1) a certain community of the Christian faithful, (2) stably constituted in a particular church, (3) whose pastoral care under the authority of the diocesan bishop (4) is entrusted to a pastor (parochus) as its proper pastor (pastor). "Circa la portata della qualifica del parroco quale pastore proprio della comunità parrocchiale," Ius Ecclesiae 8 (1996) 217–230.

[19] In American usage, pastor and parochus are rendered by the same term, pastor. Canons 515, §1 and 519 explain that the parochus is the proper pastor of a parish; these are the only two canons where the two terms appear together. Elsewhere, it is often helpful or even necessary to distinguish which term is being used. Every parochus is pastor for his parish; but not every pastor is a parochus since, for example, the diocesan bishop is also a pastor (see c. 369).

[20] Canon 555, §1, 1° recognizes the fact that not all possible pastoral activity in a diocese is contained in the parish when it identifies the first role of the vicar forane

Canon 374 requires that every diocese or other particular church be divided into distinct parts or parishes. The parish, then, is a distinct part (distincta pars) of a particular church. This reflects the 1917 code which said that the territory of every diocese was to be divided into distinct territorial parts (distinctas partes territoriales) called parishes; to each part was to be assigned its own church with a definite part of the population and its own rector as the proper pastor who was responsible for the necessary care of souls (CIC 216, §§1, 3).

Not included in the current description of a parish (see cc. 374 and 515, §1) is the parish church. One may not conclude, however, that a parish no longer should have its own church. Several canons elsewhere in the code refer to the parish church.[21] The church building is simply no longer included in the description of the parish.

Also not explicitly included in the description of the parish (see cc. 374 and 515, §1) is the element of territory, although it is the principal determining factor in establishing a parish (c. 518).

Canon 515, §1 follows the teachings of Vatican Council II. Sacrosanctum Concilium 42 explains that the parish represents the visible Church, and that efforts must be made to foster a parish's liturgical life and relation to the bishop, and to encourage a sense of community:

> But as it is impossible for the bishop always and everywhere to preside over the whole flock of his church, he must of necessity establish groupings of the faithful; and, among these, parishes, set up locally under a pastor who takes the place of the bishop, are the most important, for in some way they represent the visible Church constituted throughout the world.
>
> Therefore the liturgical life of the parish and its relation to the bishop must be fostered in the spirit and practice of the laity and clergy. Efforts must also be made to encourage a sense of community within the parish, above all in the common celebration of the Sunday Mass.

Lumen gentium 26 teaches that the true Church of Christ is present in all local assemblies of the faithful. United with their bishops, the people are nurtured by word and Eucharist. In each parish (and other altar communities) charity and unity are to be evident :

> This Church of Christ is really present in all legitimately organized local groups of the faithful, which, in so far as they are united to their pastors, are also quite appropriately called Churches in the New Testament. For these are in fact, in their own localities, the new people called by God, in the power of the Holy Spirit and as the result of full conviction (cf. 1 Thess. 1:15). In them the faithful are gathered together through the preaching of the Gospel of Christ, and the mystery of the Lord's Supper is celebrated. ... In each altar community, under the sacred ministry of the bishop, a manifest symbol is to be seen of that charity and "unity of the mystical body without which there can be no salvation" [St. Thomas, Summa Theol. III, q. 73, a. 3]. [22] as promoting and coordinating common pastoral activity within the vicariate.

[21] See cc. 510, §§2, 4 (on churches which are both parochial and capitular); 857, §2 (on the place for baptism); 858, §1 (on the baptismal font); 859 (on baptism outside a parish church); 934, §1, 1° (on reservation of the Eucharist); 1118, §1 (on the place for marriage between two Catholics, or between a Catholic and a baptized non-Catholic); 1177, §§1, 3 (on the place for funerals); 1217, §2 (on the dedication of parish churches by a solemn rite); 1248, §2 (on the liturgy of the word in a parish church when Mass is not possible on a Sunday or other holy day of obligation).

[22] Those drafting this text during Vatican II deliberately understood such "churches" to be infra-diocesan structures, especially parishes and other groups, all of whom remain dependent on the bishop. ActSynVat III, 1, 253.

Ad gentes 37 teaches that the communities of the parish and the diocese must bear witness to Christ before the nations; in these communities, the people of God live and, in a certain sense, become manifest. Christus Dominus 30 says that pastors "are in a special sense collaborators with the bishop. They are given, in a specific section of the diocese, and under the authority of the bishop, the care of souls as their particular shepherd," and Christus Dominus 31 explains that "basically,... parochial responsibility has to do with the good of souls." Apostolicam actuositatem 10 teaches that the action of lay persons in church communities is so necessary that, without it, the apostolate of the Church's pastors will often be unable to obtain its full effect; in specific reflection about the parish, the decree says:

> The parish offers an outstanding example of community apostolate, for it gathers into a unity all the human diversities that are found there and inserts them into the universality of the Church. The laity should develop the habit of working in the parish in close union with their priests, of bringing before the ecclesial community their own problems, world problems, and questions regarding man's salvation, to examine them together and solve them by general discussion. According to their abilities the laity ought to cooperate in all the apostolic and missionary enterprises of their ecclesial family.
>
> The laity will continuously cultivate the "feeling for the diocese," of which the parish is a kind of cell; they will be always ready on the invitation of their bishop to make their own contribution to diocesan undertakings. Indeed they will not confine their cooperation within the limits of the parish or diocese, but will endeavor, in response to the needs of towns and rural districts, to extend it to interparochial, interdiocesan, national and international spheres.

The parish is not to be taken so much as an administrative division (territorial or personal) of the diocese entrusted to a pastor, but rather as a community established to provide pastoral care of a group of persons within the particular church. It is an individual, non-autonomous portion of the diocesan community.[23]

Competent Authority to Erect, Suppress, or Alter Parishes[24]

§2. It is only for the diocesan bishop to erect, suppress, or alter parishes. He is neither to erect, suppress, nor alter notably parishes, unless he has heard the presbyteral council.

The code identifies the diocesan bishop as the competent authority in the particular church to erect, suppress, or alter parishes.[25] To erect a parish is to bring it into existence. To suppress a parish is to end its existence. To alter a parish admits a number of possibilities: e.g., to join two or more parishes; to divide a parish into more than one; to change a parish from territorial to personal, or vice versa; to modify parish boundaries, etc.[26]

[23] Arrieta, 28–29. See also G. Montini, "Stabilità del parroco e permanenza nell'ufficio parrocchiale," in La parrocchia, 126–129.

[24] Cf. CCEO 280, §2.

[25] A distinction must be made between suppressing or otherwise modifying a parish (c. 515, §2) and relegating a church building (parochial or other) to "profane but not sordid use" (c. 1222). The discussion here is only about the former.

[26] For some helpful canonical and practical reflections on modifying parishes, see J. Provost, "Some Canonical Considerations on Closing Parishes," J 53 (1993) 362–370. In discussing the involvement of the presbyteral council, Provost says: "It would be a mistake for the planning process to complete a total package, and then inform the presbyteral council on the results. Even though in some sense this is indeed consultation (that is, the presbyteral council could recommend against the package, or recommend major modifications in it), the impression can be given that the council is being brought in too late for its advice to be significant. That impression would seem to be in violation of the council's role in canon 515, §2" (364–365). The canonical issues involved in closing several parishes in the Archdiocese of Chicago are reported in T. Paprocki, "Parish Closings

The diocesan bishop erects, suppresses, or alters parishes only after having heard the presbyteral council; otherwise, his action is invalid (see c. 127, §1); he is not obliged, however, to follow the council's recommendations (see c. 500, §2). The diocesan bishop also remains entirely free to listen to the advice and wisdom of other groups (e.g., diocesan and parish pastoral councils, religious institutes, episcopal council, etc.) and individuals (e.g., vicars general, episcopal vicars, vicars forane, pastors, parishioners, etc.)

Since a parish is a juridic person (a public, non-collegiate universitas personarum),[27] the norms on joining juridic persons (c. 121), on dividing them (c. 122), and on extinguishing them (c. 123) apply also in the cases of joining, dividing, or suppressing parishes. These canons also require respect for acquired rights and the intentions of founders and donors.

Christus Dominus 32 explained that concern for the salvation of souls is to be the motive for determining or reconsidering the erection, suppression, or other modifications of parishes, and that the diocesan bishop may act in these matters on his own authority. Following the council, Ecclesiae sanctae I, 21 (1) discussed parish modifications:

> Every possible effort should be made that parishes where, because of too great a population or too large a territory or for any cause whatsoever, apostolic activity can be exercised only with difficulty or less effectively, should be suitably divided or dismembered, as the circumstances require. And likewise parishes which are too small should be united as conditions and circumstances demand.

Ecclesiae sanctae I, 21 (3) reiterated the diocesan bishop's power to erect, suppress, or change parishes, but added that he is first to hear the presbyteral council. Special arrangements must be made when agreements between the Apostolic See and civil governments, or the acquired rights of physical or moral (juridic) persons, affect the modification of parishes.[28]

The Directory on the Pastoral Ministry of Bishops suggested the establishment of a diocesan commission for new parishes which, in collaboration with the presbyteral council and other concerned commissions, would handle matters concerning the erection of new parishes and the construction of new church buildings.[29] The Directory also mentioned the organization and timely erection of new parishes, modification of parochial boundaries, and non-parochial apostolic centers and worship places.[30]

The 1917 code treated the modification of parishes under the more general legislation on the modification of benefices (CIC 1419–1430); furthermore, it required a special apostolic indult to establish personal parishes; and any personal parishes already existing were not to be changed without consulting the Apostolic See (CIC 216, §4). The 1983 code, however, does not consider parishes as benefices; canon 515, §2 is the principal legal text concerning modifications of parishes. No further Holy See involvement is required to modify any parishes, e.g., personal parishes.

and Administrative Recourse to the Apostolic See: Recent Experiences of the Archdiocese of Chicago," J 55 (1995) 875–896. Paprocki explains that the Apostolic Signatura will grant "active legitimation (standing to sue) in the case of a closed parish . . . to former parishioners even if the pastor or parochial administrator does not participate in the recourse or moreover if he is actively opposed to it. . . . In a sense, the Signatura has taken a very progressive step by recognizing the voice of lay parishioners in the life of a parish" (893). He concludes his report by explaining that, in the end, the Apostolic See will not substitute its own judgment on the substantive issue of closing a parish (since that decision rests with the diocesan bishop alone, c. 515, §2) but may require a correction of a defective canonical process. See also J. Coriden, "The Vindication of Parish Rights," J 54 (1994) 32–34, nn. 13, 15.

[27] See cc. 115, §2; 116.

[28] Agreements between the Apostolic See and civil governments fall within the competence of the Second Section of the SS (PB 45–47); other parish matters are within the competence of the CFC (PB 97, 1°).

[29] Directory 178.

[30] Directory 176–177, 179–180.

A just cause is needed for the modification of parishes; the exercise of pastoral leadership should not be arbitrary.[31] The diocesan bishop must hear his presbyteral council before he erects, suppresses, or otherwise modifies a parish; he is not to approach the council after he has already made his decision. In order to make an informed recommendation, the council must first have received detailed and necessary information regarding the parish. If the bishop intends to modify a parish, before issuing the decree he must seek out the necessary information and proofs and must hear those whose rights can be injured (c. 50).[32] The decree is to be issued in writing, with the reasons at least summarily expressed (c. 51).

Franz Daneels, an official of the Supreme Tribunal of the Apostolic Signatura, explains that the attempt to prove that suppression of a parish violates a whole series of fundamental rights and duties of the Christian faithful "attempts to prove too much, and so in fact proves nothing," and that the claim that suppression violates the right of immigrants to preserve their proper spiritual patrimony is not persuasive since "a personal parish is not the only way to preserve" the patrimony of immigrant people.[33] He comments that the Supreme Tribunal may identify errors in the process of suppressing a parish, but not in the decision itself:

> While the Apostolic Signatura, in two cases, has decreed a violation of the law in procedendo for a parish, it has never decreed a violation of the law in decernendo in any of the cases it has treated. In fact, to suppress a parish, it suffices that there be a just cause, and it is very difficult to prove the lack of a just cause. One should therefore reflect seriously before presenting to the Apostolic Signatura a recourse against the suppression of a parish.
>
> It appears also from the cases studied at the Apostolic Signatura that bishops do not take lightly the painful decision of suppressing a parish.[34]

The diocesan bishop will be careful not only to observe all the canon laws when a parish is modified, but will also be attentive to the civil law provisions as these pertain to the erection, suppression, or notable alteration of a parish.[35]

Juridic Personality of the Parish[36]

§3. A legitimately erected parish possesses juridic personality by the law itself.

[31] F. Daneels, "The Suppression of Parishes and the Reduction of a Church to Profane Use in the Light of the Jurisprudence of the Apostolic Signatura," Forum 8 (1997) 287.

[32] Ibid., 288. He adds: "Personally, I do not think that the parish and the parishioners have such a 'right' in the strict sense of the term since, according to canon 120 §1 a juridic person can be legitimately suppressed by the competent authority and canon 515 §2 does not require in this case the prior consultation of the parish or of the parishioners. However, I maintain that for the sake of prudence it is of the utmost importance to involve the parish in some way or another in the process for deciding about its suppression, which does not seem to be the common practice."

[33] Daneels, 289.

[34] Ibid.

[35] See J. Myers, "Suppression and Merger of Parishes: Brief Overview of Canonical Issues," in CLSA Advisory Opinions, 1984–1993, ed. P. Cogan (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995) 110–113. The Sacred Congregation for the Council issued a private letter to the ordinaries of the United States on July 29, 1911 on the proper way to incorporate parochial property. It said that parish corporation is preferable, with five trustees (the bishop, vicar general, pastor, and two lay parishioners appointed by the others) for every parish. They may never act validly without the "sanction" of the bishop. Even if such a corporation is impossible in certain instances, dioceses should work toward such an arrangement. In the interim they may retain the corporation sole with the understanding that the bishop must hear and, in more important matters, receive consent from the college of consultors and the interested parties. The method called in fee simple is to be entirely abandoned. CLD 2, 443–445.

[36] Cf. CCEO 280, §3.

Once a parish has been legitimately erected, it possesses juridic personality by the law.[37] The juridic personality is not granted by the diocesan bishop, though he alone has competence to erect (suppress or notably alter) a parish.[38] A juridic person is a subject in canon law of obligations and rights which correspond to its nature (c. 113, §2); by its nature every juridic person is perpetual (c. 120, §1). The parish is a public juridic person (c. 116). It is a non-collegial universitas personarum, that is, a universitas whose members do not determine its actions through common decision making (c. 115, §2).[39] The pastor alone represents it in all juridic affairs according to the norm of law; he is to take care that parochial goods are administered according to the norm of canons 1281–1288 (c. 532; see c. 118).

[37] The parish, considered as a juridic person, is the entity created by the juridic act of the bishop erecting it as a parish (c. 515, §2). Theoretically, the community may disperse, but the parish, as a juridic person, will continue to exist until it is extinguished according to the norms of law: i.e., either by decree of legitimate authority, or by cessation of all activity for a period of one hundred years (c. 120, §1).

[38] Canon 114, §1 says that juridic personality is given either by the law itself or by decree of competent authority. Parishes obtain juridic personality by law.

[39] An authentic interpretation by the PCILT indicated that a group of lay persons without juridic personality (or even the recognition mentioned in c. 299, §3) cannot, precisely as a group, legitimately make recourse against a decree of the diocesan bishop. They can, however, "as individual members of the Christian faithful, whether singly or together, provided that their grievance is real" [author's translation]; the judge must have suitable discretion in estimating the gravity of the grievance. This interpretation was issued on April 29, 1987 and approved by Pope John Paul II on June 20, 1987. AAS 80 (1988) 1818. Further, a November 12, 1987 decision of the Apostolic Signatura explains that the capacity to have recourse is not recognized for a group of the Christian faithful which does not have juridic personality, but it is recognized for persons acting as individuals, singly or together. (Prot. No. 17447/85 C.A.) Comm 20 (1988) 88–94 at 91. See also L. Wrenn, Authentic Interpretations on the 1983 Code (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1993) 46–47.

Like any other juridic person, the parish is capable of acquiring, retaining, administering, and alienating temporal goods according to the norm of law (c. 1255). Under the supreme authority of the Roman Pontiff, ownership of its goods belongs to the parish which has acquired them legitimately (c. 1256). Its temporal goods are considered ecclesiastical goods which are governed by the canons on temporal goods (c. 1257, §1).

The 1917 code did not contain a canon stating so directly that the parish has juridic personality, but instead taught that benefices were noncollegiate moral persons (CIC 99) and identified parishes as benefices (e.g., CIC 1423, 1425–1427).

Quasi-Parishes/Other Communities[40]

Canon 516 — §1. Unless the law provides otherwise, a quasi-parish is equivalent to a parish; a quasi-parish is a definite community of the Christian faithful in a particular church, entrusted to a priest as its proper pastor but not yet erected as a parish because of particular circumstances.

This canon describes a quasi-parish. It is (1) a definite community of the Christian faithful in a particular church (2) entrusted to a priest as its proper pastor (pastor) (3) but not yet erected as a parish because of particular circumstances. Unless the law provides otherwise, a quasi-parish is equivalent to a parish (e.g., it has juridic personality by the law itself, it is "territorial" or "personal," etc.).[41]

Unlike a parish, a quasi-parish is not seen as permanent: it is a temporary structure on its way, eventually, to becoming a parish. It is "not yet" (nondum) established as a parish.[42] The law does not lay down any specifications for when a quasi-parish becomes a parish.[43]

[40] A parallel canon does not exist in the Eastern code.

[41] Coccopalmerio, 57–58.

[42] Coccopalmerio suggests that the reasons why a quasi-parish is "not yet" a parish may be extrinsic (e.g., problems with civil authorities) or intrinsic (e.g., little or no financial means) (55).

Many dioceses contain so-called "mission churches" whose canonical status may be uncertain. Such a church may simply be another worship site within a parish, in which case it would be a non-parochial church. It may, however, belong to what the 1983 code calls a quasi-parish, which has the characteristics identified in canon 516, §1 and would be a community "not yet" erected as a parish.[44] When the time comes, however, the diocesan bishop must first hear the presbyteral council before he erects the parish (c. 515, §2).

In the 1917 code quasi-parishes were divisions of apostolic vicariates or apostolic prefectures; they existed in only these mission areas (CIC 216, §3). Their location in missionary lands was what primarily distinguished them from parishes.[45] Their pastors were called quasi-pastors (CIC 451, §2, 1°). Now, quasi-parishes may exist in any particular church (in the missions and elsewhere), and what primarily distinguishes them from parishes is the fact that they are not yet established as parishes. Each quasi-parish has its own pastor.[46]

Other Communities[47]

§2. When certain communities cannot be erected as parishes or quasi-parishes, the diocesan bishop is to provide for their pastoral care in another way.

This paragraph envisions that some communities of the faithful may exist which cannot be erected as parishes or even as quasi-parishes. Their pastoral care is to be provided by the diocesan bishop in some other way. The code envisions that within a particular church may be found non-parochial churches and their rectors (cc. 556–563), and chaplaincies and chaplains (cc. 564–572).[48] These may serve particular communities of the faithful. Beyond this, canon 516, §2 does not identify precisely who the non-parochial communities may be; the diocesan bishop must make the prudent determination,[49] and in so doing may freely seek the advice of the presbyteral council.

Parish(es) Entrusted to Several Priests "In Solidum"[50]

Canon 517 — §1. When circumstances require it, the pastoral care of a parish or of different par-

[43] T. Green suggests that changing a quasi-parish to a parish seems to reflect a judgment that the "definitive community" now enjoys a certain stability—the "key characteristic" which differentiates a parish (c. 515, §1) from a quasi-parish (c. 516, §1) and from a community which is neither a parish nor a quasi-parish (c. 516, §2). "Mission Parishes (Quasi-Parishes) Changed to Status of Parish," in CLSA Advisory Opinions, 1984–1993, ed. P. Cogan (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995) 113–114.

[44] See T. Green, in T. Green, J. Provost, and R. Wiatrowski, "Establishment of a Parish That is both Territorial and Personal," in RRAO 1994, 106.

[45] The 1977 schema made no reference to quasi-parishes, which reappeared only in c. 455 of the 1980 schema.

[46] Coccopalmerio suggests the pastor should be called the "quasi-pastor" (quasi-parochus) (57–58). The code is silent on the name of the figure. He has the power of governance in the quasi-parish (see c. 519).

[47] A parallel canon does not exist in the Eastern code.

[48] See also c. 510 on capitular churches and chapters of canons.

[49] Canon 813 says the diocesan bishop is to provide pastoral care for university students by erecting for them a parish or by at least designating a priest stably for them; it also says that even at non-Catholic universities spiritual assistance should be offered to the youth through university centers. Seemingly, these "university centers" fulfill the norm of c. 516, §2. The *Directory (*174) also envisions the possibility of non-parochial "centers of the apostolate" being established with a more or less organic and stable structure to meet the pastoral needs of particular places and groups. The *Directory (*183) mentions "missions with the charge of souls" and the "pastoral house" or "pastoral center" (all existing within the territory of a parish) to provide for the pastoral care of certain special groups (such as migrants). The 1983 code does not refer specifically to such structures by name, but c. 516, §2 is the basis for particular law creating them and comparable structures within the diocese.

[50] CCEO 287, §2 says that the particular law of the proper autonomous church may allow a parish to be entrusted to several presbyters, and is to determine accurately the rights and obligations both of the moderator (who directs ishes together can be entrusted to several priests in solidum, with the requirement, however, that in exercising pastoral care one of them must be the moderator, namely, the one who is to direct the joint action and to answer for it to the bishop.

This canon is new to the 1983 code.[51] It permits the diocesan bishop, when circumstances require it, to entrust the pastoral care of one or more parishes to several priests in solidum (that is, jointly), one of whom is the moderator of the group in the exercise of the pastoral care. This moderator directs the joint action of the several priests and answers for it to the bishop, although all the priests together are responsible for their pastoral activity. Only one priest may be the moderator (c. 526, §2; see c. 520, §1), and he alone takes possession of the parish (canon 527, §2). For the other priests, the profession of faith replaces taking possession (c. 542, 3°). The moderator alone represents the parish in juridic affairs (c. 543, §2, 3°).

In everything else, however, all the priests to whom the parish is entrusted in solidum have the same rights and duties.[52] Each must be endowed with the qualities required to become a pastor (c. 542, 1°; see c. 521). Each must possess stability in office and be appointed for a definite period of time, or for a specific period, as is the case for every pastor (c. 542, 2°; see c. 522). Each must be considered suited to exercise pastoral care in the parish, according to the judgment of the diocesan bishop who is to make his determination as he does for ordinary pastors (c. 542, 2°; see c. 524). Each obtains pastoral care from the moment of taking possession (c. 542, 3°). Each is bound by the obligation of residence (c. 543, §2, 1°). Each is obliged to perform the functions of a pastor mentioned in canons 528–530, according to an arrangement the priests in solidum establish (c. 543, §1). Only one of them, however, offers the Mass for the people, according to the arrangement they establish by common counsel (c. 543, §2, 2°; see c. 534). Further, each has the faculty to assist at marriages and all the dispensing powers of a pastor; these powers, however, are to be exercised under the direction of the moderator (c. 543, §1).

If one of the priests, even the moderator, ceases from office[53] or becomes incapable of exercising his pastoral function, the parish(es) entrusted to the priests in solidum does not become vacant. If the priest involved is the moderator, the diocesan bishop must appoint another moderator. Until that appointment is made, the priest in the group who is senior in appointment fulfills the moderator's function (c. 544).

Canon 526, §1 states the general principle that a pastor is to have the parochial care of only one parish, but admits that exceptionally (e.g., because of a lack of priests or other circumstances) several neighboring parishes can be entrusted to the same pastor. Canon 517, §1 readily accepts the possibility that the priests in solidum may have pastoral care of more than one parish, a unique characteristic of this unique arrangement.

The earliest recorded comments by the coetus De sacra hierarchia about the intention of those drafting this canon explain that the group of priests is not a "juridic person" to whom the pastoral care of the parish or parishes is entrusted. Rather, they are individual priests who together or jointly assume pastoral care. Monsignor William Onclin, relator of the coetus, reports:

the common action and reports on it to the eparchial bishop) and of the other presbyters. The Eastern code, however, neither employs the technical term in solidum when referring to this arrangement nor contains canons parallel to cc. 542–544 on such an arrangement.

[51] In the 1917 code each parish could have only one pastor who had the actual care of souls; any contrary custom was reprobated and any contrary privilege whatsoever was revoked (CIC 460, §2). A similar norm is found in c. 526, §2, which explains, however, that a parish may have only one pastor or one moderator according to the norm of c. 517, §1. At several times and places in the past, a parish had been entrusted to several pastors with clear endorsement of church authorities: see Gauthier, 38–42.

[52] Coccopalmerio says that the pastor is the group itself, but the group is not a juridic person (102).

[53] The priest, even the moderator, may cease from office in the same ways as a pastor (c. 538, §§1–2).

> It is a general rule that all the priests constituting the coetus have in solidum the duties proper to a pastor. In solidum they are bound to the duties of teaching, sanctifying, and governing the individual parishes.... In solidum they also are obliged to fulfill the functions which are to be performed by a pastor and which can be performed by others only with the pastor's permission. Moreover, the group of priests itself must determine which duties and which functions are to be performed by the individual priests of the group. Therefore, the concrete pastoral duties of a pastor to which each individual is bound must be defined in the arrangement they establish under the leadership of the moderator.[54]

The pastoral care rests with all of them simultaneously, but one of them directs the common or joint action and is the person responsible for it.[55]

The 1981 Relatio admits that the novel concept in canon 517, §1 is not sanctioned in Vatican II, but seems useful for some circumstances. The arrangement is "truly exceptional" and is to be implemented only "when circumstances require it." The moderator cannot be placed on the same level as an ordinary pastor.[56] The fact that the moderator "is to direct the joint action" signifies that this action is to be collegial; all the priests in solidum have the juridic faculties proper to a pastor. The moderator cannot be understood as the only one "endowed with the power of a pastor."[57]

Diaconal and Lay Participation in Parochial Pastoral Care[58]

§2. If, because of a lack of priests, the diocesan bishop has decided that participation in the exercise of the pastoral care of a parish is to be entrusted to a deacon, to another person who is not a priest, or to a community of persons, he is to appoint some priest who, provided with the powers and faculties of a pastor, is to direct the pastoral care.

This canon is new to the 1983 code. It permits the diocesan bishop, because of a lack of priests, to entrust participation in the pastoral care of a parish to a deacon, another person who is not a priest, or a community of persons who are not priests. In this situation, the bishop is to appoint a priest, provided with the powers and faculties of a pastor, to direct the pastoral care.[59]

The implications and novelty of this canon occasion special study of its development and application. The earliest discussions about it were reported by Monsignor William Onclin, relator of the coetus De sacra hierarchia:

> In modern circumstances, it can be impossible to name a pastor for individual parishes since in many regions there is a shortage of priests. In these instances the care of souls must be provided for in another way. Two or three parishes can be united aeque principaliter, such that one and the same pastor is appointed for them. Also, a group of priests can be appointed for different parishes at the same time to have care for them jointly. Further, if there is such a shortage of priests that even this cannot be done, it may be necessary to grant some participation in the exercise of pastoral care to some persons not marked with the priestly character

[54] Comm 8 (1976) 30. [Author's translation.]

[55] Comm 8 (1976) 29–30.

[56] Comm 14 (1982) 221.

[57] Comm 14 (1982) 222.

[58] A parallel canon does not exist in the Eastern code.

[59] Canon 519 legislates that a pastor carries out his functions with the cooperation of other presbyters and deacons and the assistance of the laity. A variety of such cooperating/assisting roles in fact exists throughout the Church. However, c. 517, §2 is not about those arrangements; rather, it concerns the situation where there is no pastor and the diocesan bishop decides that, due to the lack of available priests, participation in the exercise of pastoral care is entrusted to person(s) who are not priests, under the direction of a priest with a pastor's powers and faculties. See Coccopalmerio, 109–110.

> or to some community of persons. In this case, however, it is necessary to appoint a priest who directs that pastoral care as the proper pastor and who possesses the proper power of a pastor.[60]

Canon 349, §2 of the 1977 schema said:

> If, because of a lack of priests, the diocesan bishop has decided that participation in the exercise of the pastoral care of a parish is to be entrusted to some person not marked with the priestly character or to a community of persons, he is to appoint some priest who, possessing the power of a pastor, directs the pastoral care as the proper pastor of the parish.[61]

Following consultation with the world's hierarchy and other consultative groups on the 1977 Schema Canonum Libri II, De Populo Dei, the coetus on the people of God met on April 19, 1980. Some of its members did not welcome the notion that a parish be entrusted even in part to anyone other than a priest. The secretary of the code commission, Archbishop Rosalio José Castillo Lara, however, related his experience in Venezuela where the pastoral care of some communities of the faithful (called vicariates) was fruitfully entrusted to a community of women religious in those things which do not require priestly orders.[62] As a result of his intervention, all accepted the proposed canon in which two changes were made: (1) the priest was said to be "endowed with" (instructus), rather than "possessing" (gaudens), the powers of a pastor, and (2) the words "as the proper pastor of the parish" (uti proprius paroeciae pastor) were suppressed in order neither to restrict excessively the role of this non-priest leadership figure nor to compress too much the scope of the competence of such a person.[63]

The coetus again discussed this canon on May 14, 1980. The proposed canon was modified to indicate that a certain participation in the pastoral care of a parish could be entrusted "to some deacon or even a lay member of the Christian faithful or to a community of them." Furthermore, some priest was to be appointed who, endowed with the power of a pastor, directs the pastoral care and administration, which office the priest can fulfill simultaneously for many such parishes.[64] Neither of these changes, however, appeared in the 1980 schema.[65]

In the 1981 Relatio the code commission explained that it is not necessary to state that this arrangement is "extraordinary and temporary" since the beginning of the canon speaks about a shortage of priests (ob penuriam sacerdotum). Furthermore, saying the priest "directs the pastoral care" is a broader expression than saying that he "exercises offices which require the power of orders and the power of ecclesiastical governance connected to holy orders." Finally, it was not necessary explicitly to mention "deacons" who always have a certain ordinary and permanent participation in the exercise of the pastoral care of a parish, since the canon concerns only granting some participation to those who have no share in the ministerial priesthood.[66]

Following the code commission plenarium in October, 1981, the commission presented to Pope John Paul II a version of canon 517, §2 similar to

[60] Comm 8 (1976) 24. [Author's translation.]

[61] Canon 349, §2. Comm 13 (1981) 147. [Author's translation.]

[62] Interestingly, in CIC An the only source for c. 517, §2 is a November 19, 1976 instruction of the SCProp, La fonction évangélisatrice, about the parish evangelization role of religious women in missionary countries where these women perform various administrative, pastoral, and liturgical functions in the absence of a priest. See X. Ochoa, ed., Leges Ecclesiae (1973–1978) (Rome: Commentarium pro Religiosis, 1980) 5, n. 4476, pp. 7260–7267. See further comments on the instruction in Périsset, 200.

[63] Comm 13 (1981) 149.

[64] Canon 349-ter, §3. Comm 13 (1981) 306.

[65] Canon 456, §2 of the 1980 schema. ComCICRec, Schema Codicis Iuris Canonici (Vatican City: Typis Polyglottis Vaticanis, 1980).

[66] Comm 14 (1982) 222.

the current text. However, it described the priest as having the "power of a pastor."[67] In the period before promulgation, two changes were made: the text now speaks of "the powers and faculties of a pastor" and the term "deacon" was inserted into the canon.

Several conclusions become evident from this overview of the development of canon 517, §2. First, the intervention of Archbishop Castillo Lara about his experience of women religious serving vicariates in Venezuela favorably influenced the members of the coetus De Populo Dei in 1980. Second, from the beginning this arrangement was envisioned as a response to the shortage of priests. The canon cannot be implemented otherwise. Third, from the beginning the canon consistently indicated that a priest was to direct the pastoral care exercised by the person(s) not ordained to the presbyterate. Initially, the priest was said to be the proper pastor of the parish who possessed the power of a pastor. Later versions of the canon, however, deliberately avoided saying the priest is the proper pastor but instead explained that he possesses the powers (and, finally, also the faculties) of a pastor. Properly speaking, however, he is not the pastor (parochus) of the parish(es).[68] Fourth, also from the beginning, the decision to implement the canon has rested with the diocesan bishop. Finally, no title is given to the priest who directs the pastoral care with the powers and faculties of a pastor, or to the deacon or lay person(s) who participate in the exercise of parochial pastoral care.

This canon is being implemented in many parts of the world, including in the United States. To assure its proper implementation, the Holy See in November 1997 issued the Instruction on Certain Questions Regarding the Collaboration of the Non-Ordained Faithful in the Sacred Ministry of Priests.[69] It offers a number of helpful directives to clarify the meaning of the canon, guide its further implementation, and correct any inappropriate applications.

Discussing lay collaboration in priestly ministry in general, the Instruction says that appropriate titles are to be given to lay persons who serve in the Church: "It is unlawful for the non-ordained faithful to assume titles such as 'pastor,' 'coordinator,' 'moderator' or other such similar titles which can confuse their role and that of the pastor, who is always a bishop or priest [presbyter]."[70] The Instruction gives no specific titles concerning the application of canon 517, §2. The deacon or lay person(s), however, should be called neither the "moderator" of the parish nor its "coordinator," a term which has become common in the United States.[71] Nor should the person be called the "community leader."[72]

The Instruction explains that canon 517, §2 provides an "extraordinary form of collaboration" and says:

> The right understanding and application of this canon . . . requires that this exceptional

[67] ComCICRec, Codex Iuris Canonici, Schema novissimum iuxta placita Patrum Commissionis emendatum atque Summo Pontifici praesentatum (Vatican City: Typis Polyglottis Vaticanis, 1982) c. 517, §2.

[68] Coccopalmerio, 109.

[69] CFC et al., Instruction on Certain Questions Regarding the Collaboration of the Non-Ordained Faithful in the Sacred Ministry of Priests (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1997). See also AAS 89 (1997) 852–877. The USCC version will be cited subsequently.

[70] Instruction, p. 14, art. 1, §3. The Latin term used twice for "pastor" is pastor (not parochus). The document explains that pastoral care is properly the task of bishops and presbyters. The footnote to art. 1, §3 adds: "Such examples [of terms which can confuse the role of the laity with that of the pastor, who is always a priest or bishop] should include all those linguistic expressions which in languages of the various countries are similar or equal and indicate a directive role of leadership or such vicarious activity."

[71] Seemingly the term "coordinator" was commonly chosen, with all good intentions, in an attempt to identify the person(s) who serves in a parish under the leadership of the priest directing the pastoral care. The canon, however, states that the deacon, lay person, or community has only a "participation" in the exercise of parochial pastoral care, while the priest possessing the powers and faculties of a pastor "directs" the pastoral care.

[72] Instruction, p. 20, art. 4, §1, note 76. Would an acceptable title for the deacon or lay person(s) perhaps be "parish life collaborator," terminology which reflects the theme of the Instruction?

provision be used only with strict adherence to conditions contained in it. These are:

a) ob sacerdotum penuriam [because of a lack of priests] and not for reasons of convenience or ambiguous "advancement of the laity," etc.

b) this is participatio in exercitio curae pastoralis [participation in the exercise of pastoral care] and not directing, coordinating, moderating, or governing the parish; these competencies, according to the canon, are the competencies of a priest alone.

Because these are exceptional cases, before employing them, other possibilities should be availed of, such as using the services of retired priests still capable of such service, or entrusting several parishes to one priest or to a coetus sacerdotum [group of priests] [cf. CIC, can. 517, §1].

In any event, the preference which this canon gives to deacons can not be overlooked.

The same canon, however, reaffirms that these forms of participation in the pastoral care of parishes cannot, in any way, replace the office of parish priest [parochus]. The same canon decrees that "Episcopus dioecesanus . . . sacerdotem constituat aliquem qui potestatibus et facultatibus parochi instructus, curam pastoralem moderetur [the diocesan bishop . . . is to appoint some priest who, provided with the powers and faculties of a pastor, is to direct the pastoral care]." Indeed, the office of parish priest [parochus] can be assigned validly only to a priest (cf. c. 521, §1) even in cases where there is a shortage of clergy.[73]

[73] Instruction, pp. 19–20, art. 4, §1. The footnote ending this quotation adds: "The non-ordained faithful or a group of them entrusted with a collaboration in the exercise of pastoral care cannot be given the title of 'community leader' or any other expression indicating the same idea." Clearly, the community leader is the priest possessing the powers and faculties of a pastor and directing the pastoral care. The lay person(s) participate in the exercise of the parochial pastoral care; they do not lead the community.

The Instruction will occasion a review of every aspect of the application of the extraordinary form of collaboration envisioned by canon 517, §2, throughout the Church.

A careful study of the history and teaching of the canon leads to the following conclusions about the pastoral leadership arrangement it authorizes:

(1) Establishment. The arrangement is established by the diocesan bishop, most likely after appropriate investigation and consultation.[74]

(2) Requirement: Shortage of Priests to Be Pastor. The arrangement is possible only when there is a true shortage of priests to fill all parochial and other positions (e.g., curial, seminary, university, etc.) in the particular church. The diocesan bishop must make the prudent judgment about such a shortage. When it ceases, so does the possibility of implementing this canon.[75] The arrangement is clearly exceptional.[76]

[74] Canon 526, §1 allows a pastor to be entrusted with the care of several neighboring parishes when there is a lack of priests (ob penuriam sacerdotum—the same terminology as c. 517, §2) or in other circumstances. If the diocesan bishop implements the arrangement envisioned in c. 517, §2, he should probably indicate why that arrangement was chosen rather than the possibility permitted by c. 526, §1. Perhaps the existing burdens on the clergy would be a key reason for such a decision.

[75] Pope John Paul II spoke on July 2, 1993 to a group of American bishops during their ad limina visit: "It is not a wise pastoral strategy to adopt plans which would assume as normal, let alone desirable, that a parish community be without a priest pastor. To interpret the decreased number of active priests—a situation which we pray will soon pass—as a providential sign that lay persons are to replace priests is irreconcilable with the mind of Christ and of the church. The royal priesthood of the laity is never furthered by obscuring the ministerial priesthood of the ordained, which makes priests not only celebrants of the eucharist, but also spiritual fathers, guides and teachers of the faithful entrusted to them." "On Parishes, Lay Ministry and Women" Origins 23 (July 15, 1993) 125.

[76] One recalls c. 151 which legislates that the provision of an office entailing the care of souls is not to be deferred

(3) Priest-Director. The arrangement requires the appointment of a priest with the powers and faculties of a pastor who is to direct the pastoral care of the parish.[77] He is the community leader but he is not technically the pastor (parochus) of the parish. There is no pastor. The parish is vacant.[78]

(4) Deacons and Lay Persons Participating in Pastoral Care. The arrangement also involves the entrusting of a participation in the exercise of parochial pastoral care to a deacon, a lay person, or a community of persons who are not priests.[79] These persons participate in pastoral care, but do not exercise the full care of souls, for such an office can be validly conferred only on a priest (c. 150).

The code does not give this person(s) any title, and the Instruction excludes a number of designations. Any title should reflect appropriately the mind of the Church and the canonical role of such figure(s). If a community of persons is given a share in the exercise of parochial pastoral care, one of them should be designated as the leader of the group, or at least its contact person or liaison with the priest-director and others in the diocese.

(5) Role Descriptions. Dioceses will find it extremely helpful, indeed necessary, to develop role descriptions for the priest-director and the parish life collaborator(s). These role descriptions will reflect the universal legislation (identified in the code, the Instruction, and elsewhere) as well as local particulars such as the precise ways in which the deacon, lay person, or community members will participate in the exercise of pastoral care in a specific parish.[80]

Territoriality or Other Determining Factor[81]

Canon 518 — As a general rule a parish is to be territorial, that is, one which includes all the Christian faithful of a certain territory. When it is expedient, however, personal parishes are to be established determined by reason of the rite, language, or nationality of the Christian faithful of some territory, or even for some other reason.

This canon teaches that parishes are either territorial or personal. A parish is generally territorial—that is, it includes all the Christian faithful of a given territory.[82] When it is expedient, however, a without a grave cause. When the shortage of priests mentioned in c. 517, §2 ceases, the diocesan bishop would provide for the parish(es) in the ordinary way. There no longer exists a grave reason (the priest shortage) to occasion deferring the appointment of a pastor who has the full care of souls (see cc. 150; 515, §1; 519).

[77] Seemingly c. 517, §2 gives to the priest-director the powers and faculties of a pastor so no further grant of them is needed from the diocesan bishop, and this law itself establishes the role of priest-director as an ecclesiastical office (c. 145).

[78] This conclusion follows the detailed study of the history of the development of this canon. Some may suggest, however, based on merely a surface reading of c. 517, §2, that it provides legislation for a parish with a pastor (parochus) with whom others participate in pastoral care as "pastoral associates," "parish assistants," etc., exercising functions otherwise performed by a priest. Nothing in the canon's development supports this application as the intent of those who drafted it.

[79] The canon refers to the person or community that participates in the exercise of parish pastoral care, but in such an indirect fashion that it appears that the canon does not certainly establish the office held by the person or community (c. 145, §1). Particular law should establish the office (c. 145, §2) and define the obligations and rights of the office holder(s).

[80] In some situations there exists, in addition to the priest-director, another priest who regularly celebrates priestly functions in the parish(es). Care must be taken to assure that the latter priest has the necessary faculties to perform his tasks. Canon 517, §2 envisions, however, that the priest-director is the one with the powers and faculties of a pastor. One may rightly question the advisability of routinely involving yet another priest in an arrangement which is certainly exceptional, temporary, and canonically somewhat vague.

[81] Cf. CCEO 280, §1. The eparchial bishop may judge it expedient to establish personal parishes after he has consulted the presbyteral council.

[82] The 1967 synod of bishops approved ten principles to guide the revision of the 1917 code. Principle eight says personal parish may be established; such a parish is determined by reason of the rite, language, nationality, or some other factor affecting the persons living in some territory.[83] Personal parishes have some social base, and are created to facilitate pastoral care.[84] Canon 813 suggests that the diocesan bishop consider establishing a parish for university students (or providing for their pastoral care at least by designating priests stably for them); seemingly, the university parish is an example of a personal parish. The apostolic constitution Spirituali militum curae says that priests who are appointed as military chaplains have the rights and duties of a pastor (parochus), unless the nature of things or particular statutes dictate otherwise; their jurisdiction is cumulative with that of the local pastor, just like the jurisdiction of the military ordinary is cumulative with that of the diocesan bishop.[85]

The mere attendance, even regular attendance, at liturgical celebrations in the church of a territorial or personal parish does not necessarily make one a member of that parish. If the parish is territorial, membership comes from having a domicile or quasi-domicile in its boundaries (cc. 102, §3; 107, §1).[86] If the parish is personal, membership comes from belonging to the group for which the parish was established. To belong to the personal parish, one must belong to the group for which it was established.[87]

In a sense, each parish is both territorial and personal, but its designation as one or the other indicates which of these two characteristics is dominant. If a parish is considered territorial, all the persons in the territory belong to it (whether they have "enrolled" or "registered" in the parish, or not). If a parish is considered personal, it still has some territorial limits (at the utmost, the territorial limits of the particular church). Further, some suggest that a single parish may be both territorial and personal.[88]

The 1917 code had also legislated the general rule that a parish is territorial: a distinct territorial part of the diocese (distincta pars territorialis) with its proper church, people, and rector as its proper pastor (CIC 216, §§1, 3). To establish personal parishes (whether for persons speaking a specific language in the same region as a territorial parish, for a specific family, etc.) required a special apostolic indult. If personal parishes already existed, they could be changed only after consultation with the Apostolic See (CIC 216, §4).

Following Vatican Council II, the Sacred Congregation for Bishops issued an instruction On the Pastoral Care of Immigrants which recommended the establishment of personal parishes for immigrants who use the same language whether that territory should remain the usual criterion of jurisdiction, although serious reasons (e.g., the rite or nationality of the faithful) may require other criteria, at least together with territory. Comm 1 (1969) 77–85.

[83] CD 23 suggests that creating special parishes may be an appropriate way to provide pastoral care for people of a different language group. Other ways include appointing priests who speak the language or appointing an episcopal vicar well versed in it. See c. 476 on the episcopal vicar appointed for certain groups of the faithful.

[84] Périsset, 47.

[85] John Paul II, apconst Spirituali militum curae, April 21, 1986, VII, AAS 78 (1986) 481–486 at 484. English translation: TPS 31 (1986) 284–288 at 286–287.

[86] Further, the proper pastor (and parish) of a transient is the pastor (and parish) where the transient is actually residing (c. 107, §2). The proper pastor (and parish) of one with only a diocesan domicile or quasi-domicile is the pastor (and parish) of the place where the person is actually residing (c. 107, §3).

[87] This is especially important for marriages. The pastor of a personal parish may assist validly only at marriages where at least one of the parties is his parishioner (c. 1110). Otherwise, the marriage is invalid by reason of lack of canonical form, because the pastor had no jurisdiction to assist at it. The pastor of a territorial parish, however, assists validly at the marriages of subjects and non-subjects (provided that one of them is of the Latin rite), so long as he is within the territory of his parish and not under a declared or imposed censure.

[88] For example, they suggest that a territorial parish may simultaneously be erected as the personal parish for all the Hispanics of a broader territory (or even of the entire diocese), or the territorial parish in a university city may simultaneously be erected as the personal parish for all students, faculty, and staff of the university wherever they may reside. See Green, Provost, and Wiatrowski, 102–110.

they take up permanent residence or constantly change. Or the local ordinary could establish a "mission with the care of souls" with its own territory within the boundaries of one (or more) territorial parishes; this mission would exist for particular groups of persons who lived there for any reason over a period of time. If neither a personal parish nor a mission were appropriate, the local ordinary could designate a chaplain or missionary who spoke the migrants' language and served in a defined territory; if the number of migrants was very large, the chaplain or missionary could be appointed as a vicar cooperator of one or several parishes. The chaplain or missionary was to conduct sacred services in some church, chapel, or seminary oratory—if necessary, even in a parish church.[89]

Notion of Pastor[90]

Canon 519 — The pastor (parochus) is the proper pastor (pastor) of the parish entrusted to him, exercising the pastoral care of the community committed to him under the authority of the diocesan bishop in whose ministry of Christ he has been called to share, so that for that same community he carries out the functions of teaching, sanctifying, and governing, also with the cooperation of other presbyters or deacons and with the assistance of lay members of the Christian faithful, according to the norm of law.

This canon describes the pastor. The pastor (parochus) is the proper pastor (pastor)[91] of the parish entrusted to him. He exercises pastoral care in the parish community under the authority of the diocesan bishop in whose ministry of Christ he has been called to share. He extends pastoral care to the parishioners by fulfilling the functions of teaching, sanctifying, and governing,[92] with the cooperation of other presbyters[93] or deacons[94] and with the assistance of lay members of the Christian faithful (e.g., as lectors and extraordinary ministers of the Eucharist [c. 230, §3], catechists [c. 785, §1], those involved with marriage preparation and family enrichment [c. 1063], etc.), according to the norms of the law.

The pastor is not simply the delegate of the diocesan bishop. Within his parish, he functions with ordinary power, given him in law by reason of the office he holds.[95] His power is proper, exercised in his own name. He exercises pastoral care in the parish ex officio but under the authority of the diocesan bishop (c. 515, §1).

For the validity of his appointment, the pastor must be a presbyter (c. 521, §1). For its liceity, he must also be outstanding in sound doctrine and integrity of morals, endowed with zeal for souls and other virtues, and possessing other qualities required by universal or particular law for the parish in question (c. 521, §2).

[89] SCB, instr De pastoralis migratorum cura, August 22, 1969, n. 31, AAS 61 (1969) 614–643 at 630–633. English translation: CLD 6, 192–220 at 207–209.

[90] Cf. CCEO 281, §1. The Eastern code says here that a pastor must be a presbyter (see c. 521, §1).

[91] He is the "proper pastor" for such celebrations as baptisms (cc. 851, 2°; 855; 858, §2; etc.), marriages (c. 1108, §1), funerals (c. 1177, §1), etc.

[92] The "pastoral care" of the pastor is described in greater detail in cc. 528–530, 534, and elsewhere throughout the code. See CD 30.

[93] A parochial vicar is a presbyter who is a co-worker of the pastor; he shares in the pastor's solicitude, either for the entire parish, for a determined part of the parish, or even in specific ministry in more than one parish (c. 545). No title is given in the universal law for any other presbyter who may cooperate with the pastor (e.g., a priest in residence, a pastor emeritus, etc.). That the pastor collaborates with other priests is a practical application of the teaching of PO 7: "No priest is sufficiently equipped to carry out his mission alone and as it were single-handed. He can do so only by joining forces with other priests, under the leadership of those who are rulers of the Church."

[94] No specific title is given to the deacon in the parish. The code mentions the deacon only twice in the canons on parishes, i.e., cc. 517, §2 and 519.

[95] Canon 131 teaches that the ordinary power of governance is that which is joined to a certain office by the law itself (§1) and can be either proper or vicarious (§2). The power of a pastor is proper ordinary power.

The 1917 code had defined the pastor either as a priest (sacerdos) or a moral person to whom a parish is entrusted in titulum (that is, with rightful possession) with the care of souls to be exercised under the authority of the local ordinary (CIC 451, §1).[96] A moral (juridic) person, however, can no longer be appointed pastor of a parish (see c. 520, §1).

Entrusting a Parish to Clerical Religious Institutes and Clerical Societies of Apostolic Life[97]

Canon 520 — §1. A juridic person is not to be a pastor. With the consent of the competent superior, however, a diocesan bishop, but not a diocesan administrator, can entrust a parish to a clerical religious institute or clerical society of apostolic life, even by erecting it in a church of the institute or society, with the requirement, however, that one presbyter is to be the pastor of the parish or, if the pastoral care is entrusted to several in solidum, the moderator as mentioned in can. 517, §1.

§2. The entrusting of a parish mentioned in §1 can be made either perpetually or for a specific, predetermined time. In either case it is to be made by means of a written agreement between the diocesan bishop and the competent superior of the institute or society, which expressly and accurately defines, among other things, the work to be accomplished, the persons to be assigned to the parish, and the financial arrangements.

A physical person is to be the pastor of a parish: a juridic person is not to be a pastor.

The 1917 code had permitted, with an indult of the Apostolic See, a parish to be united pleno iure to a moral person (e.g., a religious house, a capitular church, etc.), in such a fashion that the moral person was its pastor (CIC 452, §1). In this scenario the superior of the moral person nominated a priest, called a parochial vicar, who would exercise the actual care for souls, and presented him to the bishop for installation. To the vicar belonged exclusively the entire care of souls with all the rights and duties of a pastor (CIC 471). Canon 520, §1 makes it clear that the aforementioned arrangement is no longer permitted. Indeed, canon 510, §1 says precisely that a parish can no longer be joined to a chapter of canons, and the diocesan bishop is to separate from a chapter those parishes which are united to it.[98]

Christus Dominus 35 (1) urged superiors of non-contemplative religious institutes to cooperate with the bishop, especially in light of the shortage of diocesan clergy and urgent pastoral needs, even by taking responsibility for parishes on a temporary basis.[99]

With the consent of the competent superior, however, a diocesan bishop (but not a diocesan administrator)[100] can entrust a parish to a clerical

[96] CIC 451, §2 said that quasi-pastors and parochial vicars who were endowed with full parochial powers were equivalent to pastors; the powers of military chaplains were determined by the particular prescripts of the Holy See.

[97] Cf. CCEO 281, §2; 282; see also CCEO 284, §2. In this general context the Eastern code inserts a canon on the non-exemption of persons and places within a parish: "The eparchial bishop is not to remove from the pastor the partial or total care of certain groups of persons, buildings, and places which are in the territory of the parish and are not exempt by law, except for a grave cause" (CCEO 283). No parallel canon exists in the 1983 code.

[98] Canon 510, §§2–4 envisions the possibility, however, of one church being both parochial and capitular. In this situation a priest, whether belonging to the chapter or not, is to be appointed its proper pastor (parochus). The diocesan bishop is to establish definite norms to integrate fittingly the functions of the pastor and those of the chapter. Neither should hinder the other. If any conflict arises, the diocesan bishop is to resolve it, primarily in view of the pastoral needs of the parishioners. Further, alms given to the church are presumed given to the parish (not the chapter), unless the contrary is evident. A canon parallel to c. 510 is not found in the Eastern code.

[99] ES I, 33 (1) implemented CD 35 (1) and was quite similar to c. 520, except that the canon says the diocesan bishop entrusts the parish whereas ES said the local ordinary can do it. Gauthier recounts a serious reluctance to entrust a parish to religious in past centuries (57).

[100] That the diocesan administrator is forbidden to establish this arrangement is a practical application of the norm:

religious institute or to a clerical society of apostolic life.[101] The bishop can even erect the parish in a church of the institute or society. In this situation, one presbyter is to be the pastor or, if the parish is entrusted to several priests in solidum (c. 517, §1), the moderator of the group. This arrangement can be made either perpetually or for a time. A written bilateral agreement between the diocesan bishop and the competent superior of the institute or society is called for; the agreement is expressly and accurately to define, among other things, (1) the work to be accomplished, (2) the persons to be assigned to the parish, and (3) the financial arrangements. In addition, it should mention the length of the agreement, especially if it is for a specific time.

When a parish is entrusted to such an institute or society, the care of souls remains subject to the diocesan bishop (see c. 678, §1) and all laws about a parish, both universal and particular, must be observed. The diocesan bishop and the other local ordinaries, however, are not to become involved in the internal discipline of the religious serving the parish; rather, they are to preserve and safeguard the autonomy of the religious as regards their internal governance (see cc. 586, 732).

Canon 520 concerns entrusting a parish to an institute or society. This is not the same as what occurs when a diocesan bishop enters into an agreement with a competent superior on the assignment of an individual priest member to a parish (e.g., as its pastor).[102]

Qualifications of Pastors[103]

Canon 521 — §1. To become a pastor validly, one must be in the sacred order of the presbyterate.

§2. Moreover, he is to be outstanding in sound doctrine and integrity of morals and endowed with zeal for souls and other virtues; he is also to possess those qualities which are required by universal or particular law to care for the parish in question.

§3. For the office of pastor to be conferred on someone, his suitability must be clearly evident by some means determined by the diocesan bishop, even by means of an examination.

For validity, a pastor must be a presbyter (of course, a bishop may also be appointed a pastor by the diocesan bishop).[104] A deacon or lay person cannot be appointed validly to the office of pastor. For liceity, the presbyter is to be outstanding in doctrine and integrity of morals, endowed with zeal for souls and other virtues; he is also to have those other qualities required by law (universal or particular) to care for the particular parish.[105] His suitability for the office of pastor must be clearly evident by some means determined by the diocesan bishop—perhaps even by means of an examination. In many dioceses in the United States, mechanisms are in place for the regular evaluation of a pastor's ministry performed by qualified diocesan personnel, perhaps especially before renewing a six-year term of office.[106]

"When a see is vacant, nothing is to be altered" (c. 428, §1).

[101] The 1981 Relatio says a parish is not to be entrusted to a secular institute, but to a specific priest who belongs to it. Further, the arrangement permitted in c. 520 is better left to the discretion of the diocesan bishop than the conference of bishops. Comm 14 (1982) 222.

[102] Canon 682 pertains to this arrangement; see also c. 538, §2. ES I, 33 (2) says: "The local ordinary may also, with the approval of his superior, appoint a religious as parish priest [pastor] of a parish which is not entrusted to a religious institute. This is to be done by special and appropriate agreement with the competent superior of the same institute."

[103] Cf. CCEO 281, §1; 285, §1. The Eastern code does not refer to the suitability of a candidate being determined by the eparchial bishop using some method, perhaps even an exam. CCEO 285, §2, discussing a pastor's qualifications, says: "If a presbyter is married, good morals are required in his wife and his children who live with him."

[104] This is an application of c. 150: "An office which entails the full care of souls and for whose fulfillment the exercise of the priestly order is required cannot be conferred validly on one who is not yet a priest."

[105] See CD 31.

[106] B. Dunn, "The Evaluation of Pastors," in RRAO 1997, 45–46; and "Transition Evaluation Processes in Parishes," ibid., 46–47. K. McDonough, "'I Never Knew What You

Paragraphs one and two repeat substantially canon 454, §§1–2 of the 1917 code. Ascertaining a candidate's suitability for the office of pastor was a grave obligation of the local ordinary (not precisely the diocesan bishop). Among other things, the candidate was to be examined on doctrinal matters before the local ordinary and two synodal examiners: this exam could be dispensed if the priest were well known for his theological doctrine (CIC 459).[107]

Stability of Office of Pastor[108]

Canon 522 — A pastor must possess stability and therefore is to be appointed for an indefinite period of time. The diocesan bishop can appoint him only for a specific period if the conference of bishops has permitted this by a decree.

A pastor must possess stability in office[109] for the good of souls (CD 31). As a rule, therefore, a pastor is to be appointed for an indefinite period of time. The rule admits an exception: if the conference of bishops has permitted it by a decree,[110] the diocesan bishop may appoint a pastor for a specific period of time.

The 1917 code had legislated that pastors should have stability, but they could be removed according to the norm of law. Not all pastors enjoyed the same stability. Some were designated as irremovable (enjoying greater stability) and others as removable (with less stability). Since pastors of either category could be removed, there was technically no such thing as a true "irremovable pastor," but the process to remove an unwilling irremovable pastor (CIC 2147–2156) was more involved than that to remove an unwilling removable pastor (CIC 2157–2161). Christus Dominus 31 called for the elimination of the distinction between irremovable and removable pastors, and a simplification of the procedure to remove or transfer pastors for the good of souls. The conciliar decree, however, did not envision appointment of pastors for specific periods,[111] which is new legislation for the Church in the current code.

The 1983 code does not distinguish between irremovable and removable pastors. Now all pastors enjoy the same kind of stability in office and are subject to the same removal process (cc. 1740–1747).

At its November 1983 meeting, the NCCB approved a decree that diocesan bishops may appoint pastors for a limited period of time, with the specific length of the tenure and renewability being left to the former's determination. This decree was reviewed by the Congregation for Bishops on May 16, 1984 (prot. no. 1887/84/6). A letter from Archbishop Pio Laghi, apostolic pro-nuncio, on September 4, 1984 (prot. no. 3517/84/6) gave as the approved final decree the following:

> In accord with canon 522, the National Conference of Catholic Bishops decrees that diocesan bishops may appoint pastors Really Thought of Me': Evaluation of Pastors and the Issue of Unassignability," Stud Can 32 (1998) 145–156.

[107] CIC 459, §4 mentioned the concursus, a kind of competitive examination, which was to continue to be used where the practice was common until the Apostolic See decreed otherwise. CD 31, however, stated clearly that the concursus is to be rescinded wherever it exists.

[108] CCEO 284, §3 says a pastor possesses stability in office, but may be appointed for a determined period in four instances: (1) if the pastor is a member of a religious institute or a society of common life in the manner of religious; (2) if the candidate agrees to this in writing; (3) if it concerns a special case, in which instance the consent of the college of eparchial consultors is required; and (4) if the particular law of the proper autonomous church permits it.

[109] This canon also applies to the priests to whom a parish(es) is entrusted in solidum in accord with the norm of c. 517, §1 (see c. 542, 2°).

[110] See c. 455 about conference legislative decrees. Decrees approved at a plenary meeting must be passed by at least two-thirds of the prelates who belong to the conference and possess a deliberative vote. The decrees obtain binding force when they are legitimately promulgated following review by the Apostolic See (§2).

[111] See also ES I, 20 (1)–(2), which implements the teaching of CD; it, too, makes no mention of specific terms for pastors.

to a six-year term of office. The possibility of renewing this term is left to the discretion of the diocesan bishop.[112]

This decree was promulgated by the president of the NCCB/USCC on September 24, 1984. Therefore, in the United States, a diocesan bishop may choose to appoint pastors for a six-year period, repeatedly renewable, but he is not bound to do so.[113] He may continue to appoint pastors for an indefinite period.[114]

If a pastor is appointed for a definite term, his office ends not precisely when the six years have passed but when the competent authority communicates to him in writing that the years have passed and the term has ended (see c. 186). If the pastor is not so informed, he retains the office of pastor even though the six years have passed but can be legitimately removed by the competent authority anytime thereafter.

Furthermore, the pastor appointed for a definite term is free to seek a transfer before the term is completed. The diocesan bishop is also free to invite him to accept a transfer to another parish. If the pastor refuses, the diocesan bishop may use the process for the transfer of an unwilling pastor (cc. 1748–1752).

Provision of the Office of Pastor[115]

Canon 523 — Without prejudice to the prescript of can. 682, §1, the provision of the office of pastor belongs to the diocesan bishop, and indeed by free conferral, unless someone has the right of presentation or election.

The provision of the office of pastor belongs to the diocesan bishop usually by free conferral (see c. 157).[116] Someone, however, may have the right of presentation or election of the priest,[117] in which case the diocesan bishop (or even the diocesan administrator, c. 525, 1°) installs or confirms him as pastor.[118] Further, if a religious priest is to be appointed as pastor by the diocesan bishop, the priest's competent superior must present him or at least consent to his appointment (c. 682, §1); in this situation, too, the appointment is made by the diocesan bishop.

The 1917 code stated that the local ordinary had the right to nominate and install pastors, and added that the appointment of some pastors was reserved to the Holy See (CIC 455, §1). These norms are no longer operative. The diocesan bishop (not other local ordinaries)[119] appoints pastors; the code does not reserve to the Holy See the appointment of some pastors.

[112] NCCB-Comp Nm, 5.

[113] Lynch identifies a number of arguments for and against a definite term of office for pastors: "The limited rather than lifelong tenure is seen by some as a valuable way to assure pastoral evaluation and accountability. Their arguments in favor of rotation of pastors generally hold: (1) it promotes the introduction of new and creative ideas in a parish; (2) it spreads different pastoral experiences and charisms over a larger area; (3) it permits priests to become pastors at an earlier age. Opponents to a limited term point to the difficulties a pastor experiences in becoming acquainted with an entirely different scene and his frustration at leaving programs uncompleted. They also think it prevents a pastor from knowing his people well and forces parishioners to adjust themselves to different pastoral orientations. An effective pastoral council, however, could ensure a large measure of continuity in parish projects" (397).

[114] Indeed, the diocesan bishop may choose to appoint certain pastors for the six-year renewable term but others indefinitely. Some may, however, question the advisability of such a non-uniform practice in the same particular church.

[115] Cf. CCEO 284, §1.

[116] All the norms on the provision of an ecclesiastical office (cc. 146–156) apply in the free conferral of the office of pastor.

[117] No law forbids the continued granting of the right of presentation or election; CD 31, however, called for their abrogation so the diocesan bishop could more easily and efficiently make provision for parishes. Thus, the future granting of these rights opposes the conciliar position.

[118] If the diocesan bishop should refuse to install or confirm one legitimately presented or elected, the candidate would have the right to recourse to the competent ecclesiastical authority (i.e., the CFC).

[119] Vicars general and episcopal vicars (i.e., the other local ordinaries in a diocese) may appoint pastors only if they have received the special mandate to do so from their diocesan bishop (see c. 134, §3).

The 1917 code also envisioned the possibility of some persons having been granted the privilege of electing or presenting a pastor (CIC 455, §1). Christus Dominus 28 states that bishops must have the requisite liberty in making appointments, and that all rights and privileges which in any way restrict that right should accordingly be eliminated. Referring specifically to parish appointments, Christus Dominus 31 says:

> Basically... parochial responsibility has to do with the good of souls. It follows that, if a bishop is more easily and efficiently to make provision for the parishes, all rights whatsoever of presentation, nomination and reservation should be abrogated, without prejudice, however, to the rights of religious.

Canon 523 admits the possibility that the right of presentation and election of pastors may still be operative in some situations, notwithstanding the conciliar call for the abrogation of these privileges. Further, canon 525, 1° gives to the diocesan administrator of a vacant see (see c. 421, §1) and to the bishop or presbyter who temporarily governs an impeded see (see c. 413, §§1–2) the power to install or confirm presbyters who have been legitimately presented or elected for a parish. Canon 525, 2° determines that they may appoint other pastors if the see has been vacant or impeded for a year.

Suitability of Pastor[120]

Canon 524 — A diocesan bishop is to entrust a vacant parish to the one whom he considers suited to fulfill its parochial care, after weighing all the circumstances and without any favoritism. To make a judgment about suitability, he is to hear the vicar forane and conduct appropriate investigations, having heard certain presbyters and lay members of the Christian faithful, if it is warranted.

This canon requires the diocesan bishop to entrust a vacant parish to a priest whom he judges suitable to fulfill its pastoral care, after he has weighed all the circumstances and without any favoritism.[121] Canon 521, §§2–3 identifies characteristics which a candidate for pastor must possess, and says that his suitability must be clearly evident by some means determined by the bishop, even by means of an examination. Canon 524 adds that the diocesan bishop will judge the priest's suitability also by hearing the vicar forane (see cc. 553–555)[122] and conducting appropriate investigations, hearing certain presbyters and lay persons, if war-

[120] Cf. CCEO 285, §3.

[121] See CIC 459, §1. The Directory (98) identifies as a fundamental principle of a bishop's pastoral rule that he must place the right people in the right places for the good of souls, "employing talents in as fitting and useful a way as possible for the service of the community."

[122] ES 19 (2) says that the diocesan bishop should consult the vicars forane when nominating, transferring, or removing pastors in the deanery. Canon 547 suggests that the diocesan bishop also hear the vicar forane before appointing parochial vicars. If the pastor or parochial vicar is being moved from one vicariate forane to another, the diocesan bishop might appropriately consult both vicars forane.

Some (e.g., Coccopalmerio, Read) question if the diocesan bishop's appointment of a pastor without hearing the vicar forane is valid (see c. 127, §2, 2°), since the Latin term (audiat) is the same as found elsewhere when the diocesan bishop's action is invalid without such consultation (see, e.g., cc. 494, §2; 1277). For example, Coccopalmerio says emphatically that the diocesan bishop's appointment of a pastor is invalid if he has not heard the vicar forane; the diocesan bishop may hear the vicar forane through another (e.g., the vicar general or episcopal vicar, who must have a special mandate) (123). Read says that the bishop is required to consult the vicar forane in whose vicariate the vacant parish is located; "such a consultation is necessary if the appointment is to be valid (see Can. 127 §2, 2°)" (290).

Others (e.g., Brewer), however, say that the diocesan bishop probably validly appoints a pastor even if he fails to hear the vicar forane, since the office of vicar forane is not required by law. (Those consulted in cc. 494, §2 and 1277, however, hold required offices.) D. Brewer, "Canon 524 and the Systematic Participation of the Laity in the Selection of Pastors," Stud Can 29 (1995) 485, n. 13.

Whether the bishop's action is valid or not without such consultation, the canon expects him to hear the vicar forane before appointing a pastor. Such consultation is prudent and can prove helpful in clarifying the qualifications of the candidate.

ranted.[123] The presbyters involved may be members of the priests' personnel board, and the laity may be members of the parish pastoral council who, in their planning role, prepare a parish profile to assist the diocesan bishop in his discernment.

The appointment of a pastor to a vacant parish is not to be deferred without a grave cause (see c. 151).[124] Indeed, the 1917 code had insisted that the local ordinary not delay the appointment of a pastor to a vacant parish beyond six months, unless special circumstances called for a greater delay (CIC 458). The current code does not set a time within which the diocesan bishop must appoint a pastor.

The parish being conferred freely by the diocesan bishop must be a vacant parish: otherwise, the provision is invalid (see c. 153, §1). However, if the current pastor has been appointed for a six-year term which will expire in six months, the diocesan bishop may validly appoint the successor pastor whose term takes effect when his predecessor's term ends (see c. 153, §2). The mere promise of a pastorate by the diocesan bishop has no juridic effect (see c. 153, §3).

Parochial Appointments During Impeded/Vacant See[125]

Canon 525 — When a see is vacant or impeded, it belongs to the diocesan administrator or another who governs the diocese temporarily:

1° to install or confirm presbyters who have been legitimately presented or elected for a parish;

2° to appoint pastors if the see has been vacant or impeded for a year.

The diocesan administrator of a vacant see (see c. 421, §1) or the bishop or presbyter who governs the diocese temporarily when it is impeded (see c. 413, §§1–2) is able: (1) to install or confirm presbyters who have been legitimately presented or elected for a parish, and (2) to appoint pastors if the see has been vacant or impeded for a year.[126] That the interim leader of the diocese may appoint pastors after the see has been vacant or impeded for a year is an application of the norm that the provision of an office entailing the care of souls (such as a pastorate) is not to be deferred without a grave cause (c. 151).

One Parish Per Pastor[127]

Canon 526 — §1. A pastor is to have the parochial care of only one parish; nevertheless, because of a lack of priests or other circumstances, the care of several neighboring parishes can be entrusted to the same pastor.

As a general rule, a pastor is to have the pastoral care of only one parish.[128] Nevertheless, be-

[123] See J. Myers, "Consultation for the Appointment of Pastors," in CLSA Advisory Opinions, 1984–1993, ed. P. Cogan (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995), 137–138.

[124] One will rightly question the appropriateness of assigning a parochial administrator (cc. 539–541), rather than a pastor, to a parish for a lengthy period. The parochial administrator is envisioned as a temporary substitute either for a pastor who is impeded or for a pastor in a vacant parish. The parochial administrator should not become, for all practical purposes, stably appointed to the parish: the pastor, not the parochial administrator, possesses stability (c. 522).

[125] Cf. CCEO 286.

[126] See CIC 455, §2, which had given the vicar capitular (called the diocesan administrator in the 1983 code) the ability to appoint parochial vicars, a right not specifically mentioned in c. 525. Nonetheless, the diocesan administrator has this right in light of c. 427, which gives him the powers of a diocesan bishop, except those excluded by their nature or by the law. Canon 547 on the appointment of a parochial vicar does not preclude his appointment by the diocesan administrator. Also, c. 552 states that the diocesan administrator can remove a parochial vicar for a just cause.

[127] Cf. CCEO 287, §1.

[128] Canon 152 says that two or more incompatible offices (i.e., offices which cannot be fulfilled together at the same time by the same person) are not to be conferred upon one person. The "Observations Concerning Cases in Which the Pastoral Care of More than One Parish Is Entrusted to a Single Pastor," issued by the PCILT on November 13, 1997, says that nothing in c. 526, §1 indicates that the same priest cannot be parochus (pastor) cause of a lack of priests or other circumstances, the pastoral care of several neighboring parishes can be entrusted to the same pastor.[129]

The Latin phrase "because of a lack of priests" (ob penuriam sacerdotum) is the same phrase used in canon 517, §2. Thus, when there is a priest shortage the code demonstrates two options for a diocesan bishop: (1) the appointment of a pastor to more than one parish, or (2) the arrangement envisioned in c. 517, §2. The 1997 multi-dicastery Instruction makes it clear that the former arrangement is preferred, and says that before implementing c. 517, §2 "other possibilities should be availed of, such as using the services of retired priests still capable of such services, of entrusting several parishes to one priest or to a coetus sacerdotum."[130]

The pastoral care of several neighboring parishes can be entrusted to one pastor in a number of ways. He can be pastor of all the parishes (c. 519). He can be pastor of one (or some) and parochial administrator of the other(s) (c. 539). He can be the pastor of one (or some) and the priest endowed with the powers or faculties of a pastor (i.e., the so-called "priest-director") in the arrangement of canon 517, §2 in the other(s).[131]

If, in fact, more than one neighboring parish is conferred upon the same pastor, he will need to take possession of each according to the norm of canon 527. However, if the priest is pastor of one parish but not pastor of the others (e.g., if he is their parochial administrator or priest-director), he takes possession only of the parish for which he is the pastor. The other parishes would be vacant (without a pastor) but would be receiving pastoral care through the other arrangements.

Canon 460, §1 of the 1917 code had allowed a pastor to have title to multiple parishes if they were united aeque principaliter, i.e., if each retained its own legal personality and none was subject to the others. Canon 1423, §1 of that code had permitted such a union of parishes on account of the need of the Church or great and evident usefulness.[132] The pastor was the pastor of the united parishes. The 1983 code, however, permits a pastor to be assigned to more than one parish without requiring their union. Each parish to which the same priest is assigned remains an independent juridic person.

of neighboring parishes: "There is nothing in either the Code or in the Acta documenting the process of the revision of the Code which would determine or suggest that the priest mentioned in c. 526 could not be nominated pastor in each parish entrusted to his care." Furthermore, the incompatibility mentioned in c. 152 is a question "of fact, rather than of law." The PCILT also adds: "Although one can imagine particular cases in which two pastorates would be incompatible (by reason of the needs or size of the parishes or the distance that separates them), present experience in many dioceses confirms that there could be situations in which a single priest would be able to provide adequate pastoral care in more than one parish." The parochus (pastor) of multiple parishes may offer one Mass for the people (c. 534, §2). The observations add that if a parochus of more than one parish is to be removed (cc. 1740–1747), a single investigation may occur but the decision for the pastor's removal must be made for each individual parish, with causes of removal shown for each particular parish. Comm 30 (1998) 28–30. See also P. Erdő, "De incompatibilitate officiorum, specialiter paroeciarum: Adnotationes ad cann. 152 et 526," P 80 (1991) 521–522.

[129] Since a parish is no longer a benefice, the remuneration of the pastor of more than one parish will be determined by the diocesan bishop rather than the former's receiving income from the multiple (incompatible) benefices.

[130] Instruction, art. 4, §1. The instruction does not forbid implementing the arrangement of c. 517, §2 when there are not enough priests to assign a pastor to each individual parish; it says, however, that other arrangements should be used instead, and identifies three: (1) the utilization of the services of retired priests able to serve a parish, (2) the entrusting of several parishes to one priest, and (3) the group arrangement envisioned in c. 517, §1. There is no indication that these options are listed in order of preference.

[131] See J. Provost, "Priests Serving as Pastors in More than One Parish," in CLSA Advisory Opinions, 124–126.

[132] CIC 1423, §3 required that the union of the parishes aeque principaliter be a perpetual arrangement (in perpetuum). Still, the local ordinary retained the right to divide or dismember parishes (CIC 1427).

One Pastor Per Parish[133]

§2. In the same parish there is to be only one pastor or moderator in accord with the norm of can. 517, §1; any contrary custom is reprobated and any contrary privilege whatsoever is revoked.

In each parish there is to be only one pastor or, if it has been entrusted to several priests in solidum (c. 517, §1), one moderator. Any contrary custom is reprobated and any contrary privilege is revoked.[134] This canon repeats almost literally canon 460, §2 of the 1917 code, and adds the reference to the arrangement of canon 517, §1.

Taking Possession of the Parish[135]

Canon 527 — §1. The person who has been promoted to carry out the pastoral care of a parish obtains this care and is bound to exercise it from the moment of taking possession.

§2. The local ordinary or a priest delegated by him places the pastor in possession; he is to observe the method accepted by particular law or legitimate custom. The same ordinary, however, can dispense from that method for a just cause; in this case, the notification of the dispensation to the parish replaces the taking of possession.

§3. The local ordinary is to prescribe the time within which possession of a parish must be taken. When this has elapsed without action, he can declare the parish vacant unless there was a just impediment.

Becoming a pastor involves three elements: (1) the diocesan bishop making provision of the office, (2) the candidate making the profession of faith (see c. 833, 6°), and (3) the candidate taking possession of the office. Canon 527 concerns the last element.

The priest appointed pastor obtains the pastoral care of the parish and is bound to exercise it from the moment he takes possession of the parish. Before that time he has no powers whatsoever in the parish. The local ordinary prescribes the time within which the priest must take possession of the parish. If this period elapses without action and unless he judges that there is a just impediment, the local ordinary can declare the parish vacant.

A pastor is placed in possession of the parish by the local ordinary or by a priest delegated by him; he is to observe the method of placing in possession which is accepted by particular law or legitimate custom.[136] For a just cause, the same local ordinary can dispense from that method; in this case, the notification of the dispensation to the parish replaces the taking of possession.[137] This canon provides significant room for adaptation to local circumstances on the manner in which the pastor takes possession of the parish.

[133] CCEO 287, §2 incorporates the discipline of canon 517, §1, and says that the issues addressed in cc. 542–544 are to be determined by the particular law of the proper autonomous church.

[134] See cc. 28 (on revoking customs) and 79 (on revoking privileges).

[135] Cf. CCEO 288. The manner of taking canonical possession of a parish is determined by particular law. The Eastern code does not make reference to canonical possession being taken by the moderator or other members of the group of priests to whom is entrusted a parish; seemingly, this must be determined by the particular law of the proper autonomous church which allows the arrangement (CCEO 287, §1). In the 1983 code, c. 542, 3° says the moderator alone is placed in possession of a parish, and the profession of faith replaces such a taking possession for the other presbyters.

[136] For rituals of the installation of a pastor, see CB, "Part VIII: Liturgical Celebrations in Connection with Official Acts Pertaining to the Government of a Diocese," "Chapter 3: Introduction of a New Parish Priest (Pastor) into His Parish," 1185–1198. No. 1185 says the pastor is to make the profession of faith either before the installation or during it. See also BB, "Appendix I: Order for the Installation of a Pastor," 2012–2045. No. 2012 recommends that the installation take place at a Mass on the first Sunday after the appointment is effective, with the bishop or his delegate presiding.

[137] Canon 833, 6° says the profession of faith must be made by the pastor "at the beginning of [his] function," without further specification. If the pastor is dispensed from taking possession in the way required by particular law or legitimate custom, he must still make the profession of faith at the beginning of his pastoral function.

The 1917 code also legislated that a pastor obtained the care of souls from the moment he took possession of his parish, and that before or while taking possession he was to make the required profession of faith (CIC 461); the means of taking possession, the time to do so, and the consequences of failing to do so were treated in canon 1444 of the 1917 code, on taking possession of benefices.[138]

Pastor as Minister of the Word[139]

Canon 528 — §1. A pastor is obliged to make provision so that the word of God is proclaimed in its entirety to those living in the parish; for this reason, he is to take care that the lay members of the Christian faithful are instructed in the truths of the faith, especially by giving a homily on Sundays and holy days of obligation and by offering catechetical instruction. He is to foster works through which the spirit of the gospel is promoted, even in what pertains to social justice. He is to have particular care for the Catholic education of children and youth. He is to make every effort, even with the collaboration of the Christian faithful, so that the message of the gospel comes also to those who have ceased the practice of their religion or do not profess the true faith.

Canon 519 teaches that, under the authority of the diocesan bishop, the pastor carries out for his parishioners the functions of teaching, sanctifying, and governing. According to the norms of law, he does this in cooperation with other presbyters or deacons, and with the assistance of the laity. Together with many other canons throughout the code and elsewhere, canons 528–530 illustrate how the pastor fulfills these functions.

Canon 528, §1 discusses the pastor's role as minister of the word. He is to make provision that the word is proclaimed entirely in the parish (see cc. 213, 757). He is to see that the laity are instructed in the truths of the faith, especially by homilies on Sundays and holy days of obligation (see c. 767, §2) and by catechetical instruction (see cc. 776–777). He is to foster works which promote the spirit of the gospel, even in matters of social justice (see c. 222, §2). He is to have particular care for the Catholic education of children and youth (see cc. 217, 229, 793–806). In collaboration with others, he is to see that the gospel message comes to those who have ceased the practice of their religion and who do not profess the true faith.

Other canons also identify the pastor's role in the ministry of the word. According to the prescripts of the diocesan bishop, he is to arrange for spiritual exercises, sacred missions, or other forms of preaching adapted to the pastoral needs of the parish (c. 770). He is to see that the word is proclaimed to those who, because of their condition of life, do not have sufficient common and ordinary pastoral care or lack it completely (c. 771, §1), and to non-believers (c. 771, §2).

Pastor as Minister of Sanctification[140]

§2. The pastor is to see to it that the Most Holy Eucharist is the center of the parish assembly of the faithful. He is to work so that the Christian faithful are nourished through the devout celebration of the sacraments and, in a special way, that they frequently approach the sacraments of the Most Holy Eucharist and penance. He is also to endeavor that they are led to practice prayer even as families and take part consciously and actively in the sacred liturgy which, under the authority of the diocesan bishop, the pastor must direct in his own parish and is bound to watch over so that no abuses creep in.

This canon discusses the sanctifying role of the pastor. He is to see that the Most Holy Eucharist [138] CIC 1445 permitted a pastor to take possession of a parish through a proxy, but CIC 1407 said that, in any case, the pastor had to make the profession of faith personally.

[139] Cf. CCEO 289, §1. See also CIC 467, 469; SC 35, 52; UR 11; CD 30; PO 6, 9.

[140] Cf. CCEO 289, §2. See also CIC 467–468; SC 42, 59; CD 30.

is at the center of parochial life (see cc. 897–898). He is to work for the sanctification of the parishioners (see cc. 210; 212, §2; 213–214), especially through the Eucharist and penance. He is to encourage family prayer (see cc. 851, 2°; 1248, §2), and to lead the faithful to conscious and active participation in the sacred liturgy (see cc. 835, §4; 837; 898). Under the authority of the diocesan bishop (see c. 839, §2), he is to direct the liturgy in the parish and to prevent liturgical abuses. In addition, the canons on the parish identify a number of sanctifying functions especially entrusted to a pastor (c. 530) and require that he offer the Mass for the people of his parish on every Sunday and holy day of obligation (c. 534).

Several other canons make explicit reference to the pastor's role in sanctifying his parishioners. The canons concern his role in baptism (cc. 851, 2°; 855; 858, §2; 861, §2; 867, §1; 874, §1, 1°–2°; 877, §§1–2; 878; 1706); confirmation (cc. 883, 3°; 890; 895–896); the Eucharist (cc. 911; 914; 958, §1); penance (c. 968, §1); orders (cc. 1043, 1054); marriage (cc. 1067; 1069–1070; 1079, §2; 1081; 1105, §2; 1106; 1108, §1; 1109–1110; 1111, §1; 1114–1115; 1118, §1; 1121; 1122, §2; 1123; 1706); and funerals (c. 1177, §2).

For a just cause, the pastor can dispense his parishioners everywhere and travelers in his parish from private vows, provided the dispensation does not injure another's acquired right (c. 1196, 1°). He may dispense from promissory oaths, provided this does not jeopardize others who refuse to remit the obligation of the oath (c. 1203). In individual cases, he can dispense from the obligation of observing a Sunday or holy day of obligation, or a day of penance; likewise, he can commute these obligations into other pious works (c. 1245).

Pastor as Minister of Pastoral Governance[141]

Canon 529 — §1. In order to fulfill his office diligently, a pastor is to strive to know the faithful entrusted to his care. Therefore he is to visit families, sharing especially in the cares, anxieties, and griefs of the faithful, strengthening them in the Lord, and prudently correcting them if they are failing in certain areas. With generous love he is to help the sick, particularly those close to death, by refreshing them solicitously with the sacraments and commending their souls to God; with particular diligence he is to seek out the poor, the afflicted, the lonely, those exiled from their country, and similarly those weighed down by special difficulties. He is to work so that spouses and parents are supported in fulfilling their proper duties and is to foster growth of Christian life in the family.

This canon identifies several aspects of the pastor's ministry of pastoral governance. He is to strive to know his parishioners, and so he visits families, shares parishioners' cares, anxieties, and griefs, strengthens them, and prudently corrects them as necessary. He is to have a generous love for the sick, refreshing them with the sacraments and commending their souls to God. He seeks out the poor, the afflicted, the lonely, the exiled, and all those weighed down by special difficulties. He supports spouses and parents in fulfilling their proper duties, and fosters the growth of Christian family life.

In order to perform these pastoral functions effectively, the pastor must not have repeated and extended absences from his parish. Therefore, he is to live in a rectory near the parish church; however, the local ordinary can permit him to live elsewhere, especially in a house shared by several presbyters, provided that his parochial functions are properly and suitably provided for (c. 533, §1). He is provided an annual spiritual retreat, and a maximum of one continuous or interrupted month for vacation, unless there is a grave reason to the contrary (c. 533, §2). The grave reason could be parochial needs, especially in places suffering a grave lack of priests. The diocesan bishop is to establish norms to assure that a priest, endowed with the necessary faculties, is available to provide pastoral care in the parish whenever the pastor is absent for any reason (c. 533, §3).

[141] Cf. CCEO 289, §3; CIC 468; CD 18, 30; PO 6.

Pastor, Role of the Laity, Ecclesial Communion[142]

§2. A pastor is to recognize and promote the proper part which the lay members of the Christian faithful have in the mission of the Church, by fostering their associations for the purposes of religion. He is to cooperate with his own bishop and the presbyterate of the diocese, also working so that the faithful have concern for parochial communion, consider themselves members of the diocese and of the universal Church, and participate in and sustain efforts to promote this same communion.

This canon identifies the duty of the pastor in promoting the role of the laity and in working for ecclesial communion.[143] He is to recognize and promote the role of the laity in the mission of the Church (see cc. 208, 211, 224–231) by fostering associations for the purposes of religion (see cc. 215; 223, §1; 225, §1; 327–329). He furthers ecclesial communion as he cooperates with his own bishop and fellow presbyters in the diocese and as he works so that the faithful have concern for parochial communio, realize they are members of the diocese and of the universal Church, and participate in and sustain efforts to promote this ecclesial communio (see cc. 209, 223).

Functions Especially Entrusted to the Pastor[144]

Canon 530 — The following functions are especially entrusted to a pastor:

1° the administration of baptism;
2° the administration of the sacrament of confirmation to those who are in danger of death, according to the norm of can. 883, n. 3;
3° the administration of Viaticum and of the anointing of the sick, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1003, §§2 and 3, and the imparting of the apostolic blessing;
4° the assistance at marriages and the nuptial blessing;
5° the performance of funeral rites;
6° the blessing of the baptismal font at Easter time, the leading of processions outside the church, and solemn blessings outside the church;
7° the more solemn eucharistic celebration on Sundays and holy days of obligation.

Inasmuch as he is the proper pastor of the parish, it is appropriate that the pastor personally perform certain important functions within the community, especially in liturgical celebrations.[145] This canon identifies certain functions which by law are especially entrusted to a pastor: (1) the administration of baptism; (2) the administration of confirmation to those who are in danger of death; (3) the administration of Viaticum and of the anointing of the sick, and the imparting of the apostolic blessing; (4) the assistance at marriages and the nuptial blessing; (5) the performance of funeral rites; (6) the blessing of the baptismal font at Easter time, the leading of processions outside the church building, and solemn blessings outside the church building; and (7) the more solemn eucharistic celebration on Sundays and holy days of obligation.[146]

Canon 462 of the 1917 code contained a similar listing of functions which were said to be "re-

[142] See CD 30; PO 7–9.

[143] Those drafting the 1983 code deliberately limited the term communio to references to the Church (ecclesial communion) and to the Eucharist (eucharistic communion). Comm 15 (1983) 222.

[144] Cf. CCEO 290, §2. The Eastern code simply says that sacred functions of greater importance belong to (spectant ad) the pastor, e.g., the celebration of the sacraments of Christian initiation, the blessing of marriages, and ecclesiastical funeral rites. The parochial vicar is not permitted to perform these functions except with the permission, at least presumed, of the pastor.

[145] Périsset, 133.

[146] Canon 534 obliges the pastor to apply a Mass for the people on each Sunday and holy day of obligation. If necessary he may offer the Mass on same day through another, or on other days himself.

served to" the pastor. No one else was to perform these functions without his permission. The 1983 code says the functions in canon 530 are "especially entrusted to" (not exclusively reserved to) the pastor.[147] He does not have the same right to discharge these functions as he had in the earlier legislation.[148] He has the responsibility to exercise vigilance over these very important functions. Accordingly, the rector of a church is not permitted to perform the functions listed in canon 530, 1°–6° in the church entrusted to him unless the pastor consents or, as the matter warrants, delegates him (c. 558).[149] Moreover, canon 566, §1 gives to chaplains, for those entrusted to their care, ordinary power to perform two functions similar to those especially entrusted to a pastor: to administer Viaticum and anointing of the sick, and to confirm those who are in danger of death.

Other canons also empower the pastor to perform certain functions: to hear confessions (c. 968, §1), to dispense from some marriage impediments in danger of death (c. 1079, §2) or when everything is prepared for the wedding (c. 1080, §1), to dispense from private vows (c. 1196, 1°) or to commute them (c. 1197), to suspend, dispense, or commute a promissory oath (c. 1203), and to dispense or commute the obligation of holy days and days of penance (c. 1245).

"Stole Fees"[150]

Canon 531 — Although another person has performed a certain parochial function, that person is to put the offerings received from the Christian faithful on that occasion in the parochial account, unless in the case of voluntary offerings the contrary intention of the donor is certain. The diocesan bishop, after having heard the presbyteral council, is competent to establish prescripts which provide for the allocation of these offerings and the remuneration of clerics fulfilling the same function.

Canon 1264, 2° expects the bishops of each province to specify the amount of the offerings on the occasion of the administration of the sacraments and sacramentals. Canon 1267, §1 says that offerings given to any superior or administrator of a juridic person are presumed to be given to the juridic person itself, unless the contrary is established.[151] Thus, when a pastor performs certain parochial functions (including those which are said to be especially entrusted to him), any "stole fees" given on the occasion are presumably given to the parish, unless it is clear that the voluntary offering is given him personally.

Canon 531 concerns the occasion when a cleric other than the pastor performs a certain parochial function. It requires that offerings received by him are to be put into the parochial account, unless in the case of voluntary offerings the donor's contrary intention is clear. The diocesan bishop, after he has heard the presbyteral council, is competent to establish prescripts for the allocation of these offerings and for the remuneration of the clerics who fulfill these functions.

Canon 551 legislates that the prescripts of canon 531 are to be observed regarding offerings which the faithful give to a parochial vicar when he performs a pastoral ministry.

These norms evidently apply whether or not the parochial functions are performed in the parish church.

Inasmuch as the pastor, parochial vicar, and the other clerics performing parochial functions are to place the aforementioned offerings into the parish account, they evidently are not expected to find a source of livelihood in these "stole fees." Canon 281 treats the remuneration of all clerics, which certainly includes pastors and parochial vicars. Since they devote themselves to sacred ministry, clerics deserve remuneration consistent with their

[147] Comm 13 (1981) 281; 14 (1982) 225.

[148] J. Provost and R. Hill, "Stole Fees," in CLSA Advisory Opinions, 1984–1993, 139–142.

[149] See also c. 1219.

[150] Cf. CCEO 291.

[151] Canon 1267, §2 adds that these offerings cannot be refused except for a just cause and, in matters of greater importance, without the permission of the ordinary.

condition, taking into account their roles and circumstances of places and times. The remuneration should provide for their own necessities and for the equitable payment of those whose services they need. Provisions must also be made for social assistance which provides for their needs if such clerics suffer illness, incapacity, or old age.

Presbyterorum ordinis 20 had called for the provision of just remuneration for all priests, an obligation which binds all the faithful and about which the bishop is to remind them. The remuneration of the priests should be fundamentally the same for all living in the same circumstances. It should reflect their status and enable them to give a salary to those who work for them and to assist the needy. It should also allow the priest an annual holiday. The decree says further:

> It is, however, to the office that sacred ministers fulfill that the greatest importance must be attached. For this reason the so-called system of benefices is to be abandoned or else reformed in such a way that the part that has to do with the benefice—that is, the right to the revenues attached to the endowment of the office—shall be regarded as secondary and the principal emphasis in law given to the ecclesiastical office itself. This should in the future be understood as any office conferred in a permanent fashion and to be exercised for a spiritual purpose.[152]

Presbyterorum ordinis 21 calls for the establishment of common funds to provide for the social security of priests and the health care of priests.[153]

Canon 531 deals with offerings given on the occasion of the administration of parochial functions. It does not deal with Mass offerings. Any priest celebrating or concelebrating a Mass is permitted to receive an offering to apply the Mass for a specific intention (c. 945, §1); he has the right to keep one such offering per day, except on Christmas when he may retain three Mass offerings (c. 951, §1).[154]

Canon 463, §3 of the 1917 code entitled the pastor to receive and retain stole fees. If another performed any parochial functions, the offerings still belonged to the pastor, unless it was clear that the donor wished the other priest to retain the sum exceeding the ordinary tax. The pastor, however, was exhorted not to refuse gratuitous ministry to needy persons.[155] Canon 531 shows a significant shift from the former law inasmuch as stole fees given to pastors (and all other clerics) belong to the parish, not the pastor.

Juridic Representation of the Parish and Administration of Parochial Goods[156]

Canon 532 — In all juridic affairs the pastor represents the parish according to the norm of law. He is to take care that the goods of the parish are administered according to the norm of cann. 1281–1288.

The pastor represents the parish in all juridic affairs, according to the norm of the law. He is to take care that parochial goods are administered according to the norm of canons 1281–1288. If the [152] ES I, 8 says that the ComCICRec is to reform the system of benefices. "In the meantime bishops, having heard the views of the councils of priests, are to see that revenues are equitably distributed, even those revenues deriving from benefices." In areas where revenues for the clergy derive entirely or in great part from the offerings of the faithful, a special agency should be established in each diocese to collect these offerings. See also PO 21 and c. 1274.

[153] See c. 1274.

[154] Mass offerings are treated in cc. 945–958; see CIC 824–844, where the offerings are also called "stipends."

[155] Canon 848 states: "The minister is to seek nothing for the administration of the sacraments beyond the offerings defined by competent authority, always taking care that the needy are not deprived of the assistance of the sacraments because of poverty."

[156] Cf. CCEO 290, §1. While the Eastern code omits saying that the pastor must take care that the goods of the parish are administered according to canons parallel to cc. 1281–1288 (CCEO 1024–1026, 1028–1032), this is clearly expected of him.

pastoral care of a parish or parishes is entrusted to several priests in solidum, only the moderator represents the parish(es) in juridic affairs (c. 543, §2, 3°) and is responsible for the administration of parochial goods.[157]

Canon 537 requires the establishment of a finance council in every parish. Its role is to assist the pastor in the administration of parochial goods.[158] Diocesan norms may further specify its role. The very existence of the parish finance council makes it clear that the pastor is not expected to administer the goods of the parish in isolation.[159]

Canon 118 says that those representing a public juridic person and acting in its name are those whose competence is acknowledged by universal or particular law or by its own statutes. The parish is a juridic person by law (c. 515, §3). Canon 532 is universal law identifying the pastor as the legal representative of the parish. It applies canon 1279, §1, which states that the person who directs a juridic person is the administrator of its ecclesiastical goods. The pastor is the administrator of the goods of the parish, as administration is understood in canons 1281–1288. The role of the finance council is to assist the pastor in his role as administrator of parochial goods; the finance council cannot be conceived of as an administrative body, since administration is the pastor's competence.[160] Any particular legislation on the parish finance council must be careful not to compromise the canonical function of the pastor as administrator of parochial goods.

Any civil determinations about the parish and its goods must reflect these canons. The pastor alone is to represent the parish. He alone is to see to it that parochial goods are appropriately administered, according to the norms of canon law (especially cc. 1281–1288) and civil law. In addition, diocesan particular law may address the civil involvement of a pastor on behalf of the parish.

Residence of the Pastor[161]

Canon 533 — §1. A pastor is obliged to reside in a rectory near the church. Nevertheless, in particular cases and if there is a just cause, the local ordinary can permit him to reside elsewhere, especially in a house shared by several presbyters, provided that the performance of parochial functions is properly and suitably provided for.

As a general rule, a pastor is obliged to reside in the rectory[162] near the church.[163] In particular cases and for a just cause, the local ordinary can permit the pastor to reside somewhere else, especially in a house shared by several presbyters; in this situation, provision is to be made that parochial functions are performed properly and suitably. In related legislation, canon 550, §1 says the parochial vicar is obliged to reside in the parish (the canon does not call specifically for residence in the rectory) or, if he is assigned to several parishes, in one of them. For a just cause the local ordinary can permit the parochial vicar to reside elsewhere, especially in a house shared by several presbyters, provided this is not detrimental to his pastoral functions. Furthermore, canon 550, §2 requires the local ordinary to take care that some manner of common life in the rectory is fostered between the pastor and parochial vicars where this can be done.[164]

[157] Canon 555, §1, 3° says the vicar forane has the duty and right to see that ecclesiastical goods are administered carefully.

[158] Canon 1276 says the ordinary is to oversee the administration of ecclesiastical goods. Canon 1280 requires every juridic person to have a finance council or at least two counselors to assist its administrator.

[159] Périsset, 146.

[160] Coccopalmerio, 205–206.

[161] Cf. CCEO 292, §1.

[162] The canon presumes that the rectory (literally, the "parish house," domus parochialis) is near the parish church. The vicar forane has the duty and right to see that the rectory is cared for with proper diligence (c. 555, §1, 3°).

[163] See A. Longhitano, "L'obbligo della residenza del parroco e la reggenza della parrocchia durante la sua assenza," in La parrocchia, 155–174.

[164] CIC 476, §5 said the vicar cooperator was obliged to reside in the parish according to diocesan statutes, laudable customs, or episcopal prescripts, and therefore the ordinary was to take care prudently that he lived in the parochial house.

Christus Dominus 30 (1) said that for the better ordering of the care of souls, priests are strongly recommended to live in common, especially when they are attached to the same parish: "This on the one hand is helpful to their apostolate work, and on the other gives to the faithful an example of charity and unity."[165]

Canon 533, §1 applies to pastors the general norm for clerics contained in canon 280, which highly recommends some practice of common life to clerics, and asks that common living be preserved as far as possible in places where it already exists.[166]

Canon 465, §1 of the 1917 code had required the pastor to live in a rectory near the parochial church, but the local ordinary could permit him to live elsewhere, provided the house was not so distant from the church that his parochial functions would suffer any detriment. This legislation is basically repeated in the current law.

Vacation and Absence of the Pastor[167]

§2. Unless there is a grave reason to the contrary, a pastor is permitted to be absent from the parish each year for vacation for at most one continuous or interrupted month; those days which the pastor spends once a year in spiritual retreat are not computed in the time of vacation. In order to be absent from the parish for more than a week, however, a pastor is bound to inform the local ordinary.

§3. It is for the diocesan bishop to establish norms which see to it that during the absence of the pastor, a priest endowed with the necessary faculties provides for the care of the parish.

Unless there is a grave contrary reason, a pastor is permitted to be absent from the parish for vacation each year for a period of one month, continuous or interrupted. His time for annual spiritual retreat is not computed as part of his vacation period. Canon 550, §3 gives the parochial vicar the same right as a pastor concerning vacation—i.e., the period of one month, continuous or interrupted, unless there is a grave reason to the contrary.

Canon 283, §2 entitles all clerics to a fitting and sufficient time of annual vacation, to be determined by universal or particular law. Presbyterorum ordinis 20 had said that priests' remuneration should be sufficient to provide an annual vacation. Canons 533, §2 and 550, §3 are universal law applications for pastors and parochial vicars of the more general norm of canon 283, §2 for all clerics.

The pastor is to have time for an annual retreat; the days at retreat are not to be counted among the days available for vacation. Canon 276, §2, 4° obliges all clergy to make time for spiritual retreats, according to the norms of particular law. Canon 533, §2 applies the more general norm to the pastor: it expects that his spiritual retreat will be annual, and its days do not detract from his vacation time. The code provides no similar norm on an annual retreat or its relation to vacation days for parochial vicars.

If the pastor is to be absent from the parish for more than a week, he is to inform the local ordinary. The diocesan bishop is to establish norms which see to it that a priest endowed with the necessary faculties provides for the pastoral care of the parish while the pastor is absent.[168] The same norms may consider who substitutes for an absent moderator of a group of priests entrusted in solidum with the pastoral care of a parish or parishes.[169] The absence may be expected (e.g., a vacation) or unexpected.

[165] See also PO 8, which recommends that priests foster community life or social relations with each other.

[166] See CIC 134.

[167] Cf. CCEO 292, §§2–3.

[168] The 1917 code had not required such norms. If the pastor's absence will be more lengthy, cc. 539; 541, §1; and 549 would apply. Among the faculties to be given to the priest who substitutes for the pastor is that of assisting at marriages (c. 1111).

[169] The norms may identify the substitute as the priest of the group who is senior by appointment (see c. 544) or, if they were appointed together, senior by ordination.

Canon 465, §§2–6 of the 1917 code was legislation about the pastor's vacation. It gave him two months of vacation each year, continuous or interrupted, not including the days for annual retreat. When the pastor was absent for more than a week, he required a legitimate cause (which could include vacation), the written permission of the ordinary, and a substitute approved by the same ordinary. If the pastor were a religious, he would also need the consent of his superior and a substitute approved by both the ordinary and the superior. If the pastor had to leave the parish suddenly for a grave reason and had to be gone for longer than a week, the pastor had to inform the ordinary in writing as soon as possible, explain the reason for his absence, and obey the bishop's mandates. Finally, if any pastor were gone for less than a week, he must also provide for the needs of the faithful, especially in particular circumstances. The 1917 code did not regulate the vacation of the parochial vicar.

Mass for the People[170]

Canon 534 — §1. After a pastor has taken possession of his parish, he is obliged to apply a Mass for the people entrusted to him on each Sunday and holy day of obligation in his diocese. If he is legitimately impeded from this celebration, however, he is to apply it on the same days through another or on other days himself.

§2. A pastor who has the care of several parishes is bound to apply only one Mass for the entire people entrusted to him on the days mentioned in §1.

§3. A pastor who has not satisfied the obligation mentioned in §§1 and 2 is to apply as soon as possible as many Masses for the people as he has omitted.

Once he has taken possession of the parish (see canon 527), the pastor is obliged to apply a Mass for the people entrusted to him on each Sunday and holy day of obligation observed in his diocese.[171] If he has care of several parishes, he is bound to apply one Mass for the entire people entrusted to his care.

If the pastor is legitimately impeded from this celebration, he is to apply the Mass either on the same day through another priest, or on another day himself. If he has not satisfied these obligations, he is to apply as soon as possible as many Masses for the people as he has omitted.

Canon 540, §1 says the parochial administrator is bound by the same duties and possesses the same rights as a pastor, unless the diocesan bishop states otherwise. This means that the parochial administrator has the obligation of the Mass for the people. If for some reason a parish has both a pastor and a parochial administrator (see c. 539), either the diocesan bishop or the pastor and parochial administrator among themselves must determine which of the two will fulfill this obligation. Presumably, in such a situation the obligation remains with the pastor, unless other provision is made.

When a parish or parishes are entrusted to priests in solidum (c. 517, §1), the priests together are obliged to see to the offering of a Mass for the people according to an agreement established by common counsel (c. 543, §2, 2°). If more than one parish is entrusted to them, one Mass for the people suffices for all the parishes.

When a parish becomes vacant or the pastor becomes impeded and before a parochial administrator is appointed, the parochial vicar (or, if there are several, the parochial vicar senior in appointment) assumes governance of the parish (c. 541, §1). Furthermore, unless the diocesan bishop has provided otherwise (c. 533, §3) and unless a parochial administrator is appointed, whenever a pastor is absent, the norms of canon 541, §1 apply: the parochial vicar has all the obligations of the pastor except that of applying the Mass for the people (c. 549).[172]

[170] Cf. CCEO 294. The Eastern code simply says the pastor is frequently to celebrate the Divine Liturgy for the people, and is bound to do so on the days prescribed by the particular law of his autonomous church.

[171] J. Provost considers the opinion of several canonists regarding the Mass for the people, and concludes that: (1) one may not accept a stipend for the Mass for the people; (2) while celebrating the Mass for the people, one may not apply it for another intention for which a stipend was received; and (3) one may accept a stipend for a second Mass on the day when one offered a Mass for the people, since the latter arises from pastoral responsibility rather than from an obligation in justice (ex titulo iustitiae) due to the income of a benefice. "Retention of Stipend for a Second Mass and Mass for the People," in RRAO 1994, 110–111.

Canon 534 is similar to canon 388 which requires the diocesan bishop to offer a Mass for the people entrusted to his care. It also reflects closely the former code in canons 466 (for the pastor) and 339 (for the bishop of the diocese). That code, however, required the diocesan bishop or pastor to offer the Mass for the people on several more days each year, even if the days had been suppressed in the locale. Further, the pastor was expected to celebrate the Mass in the parish church, unless there existed circumstances warranting its celebration elsewhere, and he needed the permission of the local ordinary to celebrate on a day other than the appropriate one. The current legislation makes no reference to the place where the Mass for the people must be celebrated, and the pastor needs no special permission to offer it on some other day (a legitimate cause, as determined by the pastor himself, suffices).

Parochial Registers, Seal, and Archive[173]

Canon 535 — §1. Each parish is to have parochial registers, that is, those of baptisms, marriages, deaths, and others as prescribed by the conference of bishops or the diocesan bishop. The pastor is to see to it that these registers are accurately inscribed and carefully preserved.

§2. In the baptismal register are also to be noted confirmation and those things which pertain to the canonical status of the Christian faithful by reason of marriage, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1133, of adoption, of the reception of sacred orders, of perpetual profession made in a religious institute, and of change of rite. These notations are always to be noted on a baptismal certificate.

§3. Each parish is to have its own seal. Documents regarding the canonical status of the Christian faithful and all acts which can have juridic importance are to be signed by the pastor or his delegate and sealed with the parochial seal.

§4. In each parish there is to be a storage area, or archive, in which the parochial registers are protected along with letters of bishops and other documents which are to be preserved for reason of necessity or advantage. The pastor is to take care that all of these things, which are to be inspected by the diocesan bishop or his delegate at the time of visitation or at some other opportune time, do not come into the hands of outsiders.

§5. Older parochial registers are also to be carefully protected according to the prescripts of particular law.

Each parish is to have parochial registers,[174] and the pastor is to see that they are accurately inscribed and carefully preserved. The specific registers envisioned are for baptisms (cc. 877–878), marriages (c. 1121), deaths (c. 1182), and other events as prescribed either by the conference of bishops or the diocesan bishop. Examples of registers which may be required by particular law are the confirmation register (c. 895), the first communion register, and the register for the reception of baptized non-Catholics into full communion.[175] The pastor has the obligation to see that the parochial registers are accurately inscribed and carefully preserved. The vicar forane is to see that they are inscribed correctly and protected appropriately (c. 555, §1, 3°); when a pastor is ill or [172] Canon 548, §2 says clearly that the parochial vicar is normally not obliged to offer the Mass for the people.

[173] Cf. CCEO 296.

[174] See C. Cox and J. Koury, "Regulations Concerning the Format of Sacramental Registers," in CLSA Advisory Opinions, 1984–1993, 144–147.

[175] Particular law may mandate a register of parish history. Coccopalmerio (211) says particular law may require the confirmation register and the parish census book, each of which was called for by CIC 470, §1.

dies, the vicar forane must make provision that the parochial registers and documents (as well as sacred furnishings and everything else belonging to the parish) are not lost or removed (c. 555, §3).

Special consideration is given to the baptismal register. It is to contain not only data concerning a person's baptism but also data about confirmation (c. 895), marriage (cc. 1122–1123, 1685, 1706), adoption (c. 877, §3), reception of sacred orders (c. 1054), perpetual religious profession, and change of rite. All these annotations are always to be noted on a baptismal certificate.

Other canons mention other books to be maintained by each parish. Canon 788, §1 mentions the book inscribing the names of catechumens. Canon 958 calls for a parochial book recording Mass offerings and obligations; canon 1307, §2 calls for an additional book to record the offerings and obligations of pious foundations. The pastor, as administrator of the juridic person which is the parish, must also keep well organized books of parochial receipts and expenditures (c. 1284, §2, 7°).

Every parish is also to have its own seal which, with the signature of the pastor or his delegate, is to be placed on documents regarding the canonical status of the Christian faithful and on all acts which have juridic importance.

Each parish is to have its own archive (or storage area) which protects letters of bishops and other documents to be preserved that are necessary or useful. The pastor is to make sure that the contents of the archives do not come into the hands of outsiders. The diocesan bishop or his delegate is to inspect the archive at the time of the visitation (see cc. 396–398).[176] The archive would certainly contain the aforementioned parish books and the prenuptial investigation files (see c. 1067).

Particular law is to establish prescripts concerning the careful protection of older parochial records. These reflect the lived faith of past generations in the locale.

Canon 470 of the 1917 code had mentioned a parish census book among the parochial registers, but made no reference to other books being required by the conference of bishops or the diocesan bishop. It had also required an authentic copy of all parish records (except the census book) to be sent annually to the diocesan curia, a requirement absent from the current law. Finally, it made no reference to the careful protection of older parochial registers.

Parish Pastoral Council[177]

Canon 536 — §1. If the diocesan bishop judges it opportune after he has heard the presbyteral council, a pastoral council is to be established in each parish, over which the pastor presides and in which the Christian faithful, together with those who share in pastoral care by virtue of their office in the parish, assist in fostering pastoral activity.

§2. A pastoral council possesses a consultative vote only and is governed by the norms established by the diocesan bishop.

The 1917 code did not mention a parish pastoral council. The current universal law does not require its establishment, but allows the diocesan bishop to require it in all the parishes of his diocese after he has heard the presbyteral council. The universal law does, however, identify some of the characteristics to be found in pastoral councils, if they are established in parishes (whether by mandate of the diocesan bishop or not). The pastor presides over the pastoral council, which is composed of the Christian faithful and those who share pastoral care by virtue of their office in the [176] Canon 555, §4 requires the vicar forane to visit the parishes of his vicariate according to the determination of the diocesan bishop. He may be the person appropriately designated by the diocesan bishop to inspect the parish registers and the other contents of each parish archive.

[177] CCEO 295 says that particular law of each autonomous church is to establish norms for parish councils dealing with pastoral matters. See cc. 511–514 for legislation on the diocesan pastoral council (CCEO 272–275).

parish.[178] The council assists the pastor in fostering pastoral activity, possesses a consultative vote only, and is governed by norms established by the diocesan bishop.[179]

The origin of legislation on parish pastoral councils is the same as that on diocesan pastoral councils.[180] Christus Dominus 27 said that it is highly desirable to establish a diocesan pastoral council composed of clergy, religious, and laity; its function is to investigate and consider matters relating to pastoral activity and to formulate practical conclusions."[181] A number of postconciliar documents further elaborated the role of the diocesan pastoral council.[182] The Sacred Congregation for the Clergy issued a circular letter on pastoral councils on January 25, 1973, which stated that nothing prevents "the institution within the diocese of councils of the same nature and function [as diocesan pastoral councils], whether parochial or regional."[183] On May 31, 1973, the Sacred Congregation for Bishops issued its Directory for bishops which invited the establishment of parish pastoral councils to be aligned with the diocesan pastoral council.[184]

The vision developed in these conciliar and postconciliar sources is reflected in canons 511–514 on the diocesan pastoral council and in canon 536 on the parish pastoral council. The vision leads to the insight that pastoral councils exist to do pastoral planning. They investigate pastoral works, consider (study) them, and propose practical conclusions about them: this is pastoral planning. Pastoral councils perform their planning function in an advisory or consultative way.

The 1997 Instruction on Certain Questions Regarding the Collaboration of the Non-Ordained Faithful in the Sacred Ministry of Priests lists the parish pastoral council and the parish finance council among the structures for collaboration in the particular church "so necessary to that ecclesial renewal called for by the Second Vatican Council [which] have produced many positive results and have been codified in canonical legislation. They represent a form of active participation in the life and mission of the Church as communion."[185] The Instruction underscores that the parish pastoral and finance councils "enjoy a consultative vote only and cannot in any way become deliberative structures."[186] The Instruction clarifies the central role of the pastor who receives advice from the pastoral council:

> It is for the parish priest to preside at parochial councils. They are to be considered invalid, and hence null and void, any deliberations entered into (or decisions taken) by a parochial council which has not been presided over by the parish priest or which has assembled contrary to his wishes.[187]

[178] Paul VI, SDO, June 18, 1967, n. 24, AAS 59 (1967) 697–704 at 702, says: "If it can be done, deacons are to have a role in pastoral councils." [Author's translation.] No. 24 is missing from the document as it appears in CLD 6, 582.

[179] See P. Marcuzzi, "Il consiglio pastorale parrocchiale," in PCILT, Ius in Vita et in Missione Ecclesiae (Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1994) 437–463.

[180] A detailed history of the development of pastoral councils in ecclesial life (and in the 1983 code) is found in J. Renken, "Pastoral Councils: Pastoral Planning and Dialogue Among the People of God," J 53 (1993) 132–154.

[181] Later, AG 30 and PO 7, n. 41, also refer to the diocesan pastoral council, citing CD 27.

[182] ES 1, 16, 17; Second Synod of Bishops, Ultimis temporibus, November 30, 1971, II, 3, CLD 7, 364; SCC, littcirc Omnes Christifideles, January 25, 1973, CLD 8, 283; Directory 204.

[183] CLD 8, 287–288.

[184] AA 26 mentions diocesan and parish councils with another purpose: "to assist in apostolic work,... [to] take care of the mutual coordinating of the various lay associations and undertakings, the autonomy and particular nature of each remaining untouched." These may be understood as "coordinating councils of apostolic works" (or a similar term). They are not pastoral councils which advise on pastoral planning, a conclusion reached by a careful study of postconciliar documents and the history of the development of canons 511–514 and 536 in Comm. See Renken, "Pastoral Councils," 147–149; Marcuzzi, 438–441.

[185] Instruction, p. 21, article 5.

[186] Instruction, p. 21, article 5, §2.

[187] Instruction, p. 21, article 5, §3.

The Instruction also mentions that ordinaries may avail themselves of special study groups of experts to examine particular questions, but that these may not be constituted as structures parallel to the parish pastoral council or the parish finance council. "Neither may such a group deprive these structures of their lawful authority. Where structures of this kind have arisen in the past because of local custom or through special circumstances, those measures deemed necessary to conform such structures to the current universal law of the Church must be taken."[188]

Canon 536 says that, after he has heard the presbyteral council, the diocesan bishop may mandate the establishment of a pastoral council in every parish. If he does not issue such a mandate, the council is not required. Nonetheless, it still may be established in individual parishes at the discretion of the pastor.[189]

Parish Finance Council[190]

Canon 537 — In each parish there is to be a finance council which is governed, in addition to universal law, by norms issued by the diocesan bishop and in which the Christian faithful, selected according to these same norms, are to assist the pastor in the administration of the goods of the parish, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 532.

The universal law requires the establishment of a finance council in every parish. The parish finance council is governed by universal law (which contains very few norms about it) and also by norms which the diocesan bishop issues. It is composed of members of the Christian faithful who are selected according to these diocesan norms. Its purpose is to assist the pastor in the administration of parochial goods.[191] Nonetheless, in all juridic affairs the pastor represents the parish and is to take care that parochial goods are administered according to the norm of canons 1281–1288 (see c. 532). Canon 537 applies to the parish the more general norm of canon 1280 which legislates that each juridic person is to have its own finance council or at least two counselors who assist the administrator of the juridic person.

In 1997 the Holy See issued the Instruction on Certain Questions Regarding the Collaboration of the Non-Ordained Faithful in the Sacred Ministry of Priests which identifies the parish finance council as a collaborative structure necessary for conciliar renewal, consultative in nature, requiring the presence of the pastor for the validity of its proceedings, and not to be confused with parallel structures with a different origin or purpose.[192]

The 1917 code did not specifically mention a parish finance council.[193] Presbyterorum ordinis 17 said that priests are to manage ecclesiastical property according to ecclesiastical laws and with the help, as far as possible, of skilled lay persons.

Canons 536 and 537 illustrate that each parish may have two parish councils: a parish pastoral

[188] Instruction, p. 22, article 5, §5.

[189] Diocesan norms requiring the establishment of parish pastoral councils may include provisions for the dissolution of a council which does not perform its function appropriately. Canon 501, §3 permits the dissolution of a presbyteral council which does not fulfill its function or abuses it. The diocesan bishop may dissolve it after he has consulted the metropolitan, and must reestablish it within a year. Similarly diocesan norms on the parish finance council may provide for the possibility of dissolving it, with the requirement of reestablishing it within a very short time (c. 537). See J. Cuneo, "Pastor's Right to Dissolve the Parish Council," in CLSA Advisory Opinions, 1984–1993, 150–152.

[190] CCEO 295 says that the particular law of each autonomous church is to establish norms for parish councils dealing with financial matters. See cc. 492–493 for legislation on the diocesan finance council (CCEO 263).

[191] Mutatis mutandis, diocesan norms on the parish finance council may reflect norms on the diocesan finance council, found in universal law (cc. 492–493) and particular law.

[192] Instruction, pp. 21–22, article 5, §§2–3, 5. For a more extensive treatment of the Instruction's teachings, see the commentary on c. 536.

[193] But see CIC 1183–1184; 1520, §§1–2; 1521, §1; 1525, §1.

council (obligatory only if the diocesan bishop so judges) and a parish finance council (obligatory in all parishes by the universal law). The former assists in pastoral planning, and the latter in the administration of parochial goods. Their roles are distinct, and each must be careful to retain its proper focus should they collaborate with one another.

Cessation of Office of Pastor[194]

Canon 538 — §1. A pastor ceases from office by removal or transfer carried out by the diocesan bishop according to the norm of law, by resignation made by the pastor himself for a just cause and accepted by the same bishop for validity, and by lapse of time if he had been appointed for a definite period according to the prescripts of particular law mentioned in can. 522.

§2. A pastor who is a member of a religious institute or is incardinated in a society of apostolic life is removed according to the norm of can. 682, §2.

§3. When a pastor has completed seventy-five years of age, he is requested to submit his resignation from office to the diocesan bishop who is to decide to accept or defer it after he has considered all the circumstances of the person and place. Attentive to the norms established by the conference of bishops, the diocesan bishop must provide suitable support and housing for a retired pastor.

If a pastor is a religious or is incardinated in a society of apostolic life, he is removed from office at the discretion either of the diocesan bishop or his competent superior (c. 682, §2). While the diocesan bishop provides the office of pastor (c. 523), both he and the competent superior may terminate the appointment of a pastor who is a member of a religious institute or a society of apostolic life.[195]

[194] Cf. CCEO 297.

[195] See CIC 455, §5. This canon added that if one or the other opposed the removal of the religious pastor, recourse could be made in devolutivo, i.e., without suspensive effect.

In other cases, pastors end their function in the four ways identified in canon 538, §1: (1) removal, (2) transfer, (3) resignation, and (4) lapse of time, if they were appointed for a definite period.

1. Removal[196]

A pastor, whether appointed for an indefinite or specific period, may be removed from office by the diocesan bishop (cc. 192; 193, §§1–2), who is bound to observe the norms on removal contained in canons 1740–1747.[197] Removal requires a grave cause (c. 193, §1), among which canon 1741 identifies especially the following:[198]

(1) a manner of acting by the pastor which brings grave detriment or disturbance to ecclesiastical communion;
(2) ineptitude or a permanent infirmity of mind or body which renders the pastor unable to fulfill his functions usefully;
(3) loss of a good reputation among upright and responsible parishioners or an aversion to the pastor which it appears will not cease in a brief time;
(4) grave neglect or violation of parochial duties which persists after a warning;
(5) poor administration of temporal affairs with grave damage to the Church whenever another remedy to this harm cannot be found.

In addition, the pastor (like any holder of an ecclesiastical office) is removed from office by the law itself if he (1) loses the clerical state, (2) publicly defects from the Catholic faith or from the communion of the Church, or (3) attempts [196] A detailed analysis of the process of removing or transferring a pastor is beyond the immediate scope of this commentary, and is given elsewhere. See the detailed and scholarly article by Z. Grocholewski, "Trasferimento e rimozione del parroco," in La parrocchia, 199–247.

[197] See CIC 2147–2156 on removing irremovable pastors, and 2157–2161 on removing removable pastors.

[198] This listing is illustrative only; the diocesan bishop may identify other reasons for removal.

marriage, even if only civilly (c. 194, §1). Deprivation of the office can also be an expiatory penalty (c. 1336, §1, 2°).

One notes that age is not listed as a reason to remove a pastor from office, notwithstanding the norm of canon 538, §3 encouraging him to retire at seventy five.

The removal must be communicated in writing to take effect (c. 193, §4), and the diocesan bishop must provide suitable support for the removed pastor (cc. 195; 1746; 1747, §2).

2. Transfer

A pastor may be transferred by the diocesan bishop (c. 190, §1). If the pastor is unwilling, a grave cause is required and the diocesan bishop must observe the norms on transfer (cc. 1748–1752).[199] The transfer must be communicated in writing to take effect (c. 190, §3).

3. Resignation

Canons 187–189 on resignation in general from ecclesiastical offices apply to the resignation of a pastor. Resignation requires a just cause (c. 187; see c. 189, §2). It is invalid if made out of grave fear unjustly inflicted, malice, substantial error, or simony (c. 188). The resignation must be presented to the diocesan bishop (i.e., the authority who provides the office) in writing or orally before two witnesses (c. 189, §1). Since the resignation requires the diocesan bishop's acceptance, if it is not accepted within three months of its presentation, it lacks all force (c. 189, §3). Until the resignation has been accepted by the diocesan bishop, the pastor is able to revoke it (c. 189, §4).

A pastor may offer his resignation to the diocesan bishop for a just cause; the resignation must be accepted by the diocesan bishop for its validity. A pastor is requested to submit his resignation when he has reached the age of seventy-five; after he has considered all the circumstances of the person and the place, the diocesan bishop is to decide to accept the resignation or to defer it. If he accepts the resignation, the diocesan bishop is to provide suitable support and housing for the retired pastor in light of norms established by the conference of bishops.

The 1917 code had not contained a norm inviting the resignation of pastors. Christus Dominus 31, however, had stated:

> Parish priests who on account of advanced years or for some other grave reason are unable to perform their duties adequately and fruitfully are earnestly requested to tender their resignation spontaneously, or when the bishop invites them to do so. The bishop will make suitable provision for the support of those who retire.

The conciliar decree did not mention a specific age for retirement, but Ecclesiae sanctae 20 (3) called for retirement at age seventy-five:

> In the execution of prescription number 31 of the Decree Christus Dominus all parish priests are requested voluntarily to submit their resignation to their own bishop not later than the completion of their seventy-fifth year. The bishop having considered all the circumstances of place and person shall decide whether to accept, or defer acceptance of, the resignation. The bishop shall make appropriate provision for the living and residence of those who resign.[200]

At its November, 1987 meeting, the NCCB decreed that diocesan bishops are to establish a diocesan policy for the retirement of priests:

> In accord with the prescriptions of canon 538, §3, the National Conference of Catholic Bishops authorizes diocesan bishops to [199] See c. 191; CIC 2162–2167.

[200] Pope Paul VI restated this invitation to pastors (and bishops) to resign voluntarily no later than their seventy-fifth birthday in his mp on the retirement of cardinals, Ingravescentem aetatem, November 21, 1970, AAS 62 (1970) 810–813; CLD 7, 143–145.

> develop diocesan policy for the requirement of priests in accord with the provisions of Norms for Priests and Their Third Age.[201]

This decree was reviewed by the Congregation for the Clergy, whose approval was communicated through a letter from the apostolic pro-nuncio on January 19, 1988 (Prot. No. 5465/87/4). The Norms for Priests and Their Third Age[202] was promulgated on February 23, 1988. These norms reiterate the universal norm that "pastors are asked to submit their letters of resignation by the age of seventy-five" but adds that the diocesan bishop, "in consultation with the presbyteral council, can adopt a diocesan policy which allows priests, for pastoral or personal reasons, to retire from diocesan assignment at an earlier age."[203]

In the 1997 Instruction on Certain Questions Regarding the Collaboration of the Non-Ordained Faithful in the Sacred Ministry of Priests, the Holy See discusses the cessation of the office of pastor and, specifically, the resignation of a pastor at age seventy-five:

> It must be noted that the parish priest [parochus] is the proper pastor [pastor] of the parish entrusted to him and remains such until his pastoral office shall have ceased.
>
> The presentation of resignation at the age of 75 by a parish priest does not of itself [ipso iure] terminate his pastoral office. Such takes effect only when the diocesan bishop, following the prudent consideration of all the circumstances, shall have definitively accepted his resignation in accordance with Canon 538, §3 and communicated such to him in writing. In the light of those situations where scarcity of priests exists, the use of special prudence in this matter would be judicious.
>
> In view of the right of every cleric to exercise the ministry proper to him, and in the absence of any grave health or disciplinary reasons, it should be noted that having reached the age of 75 does not constitute a binding reason for the diocesan bishop to accept a parish priest's resignation. This also serves to avoid a functional concept of the Sacred Ministry.[204]

4. Lapse of Time

A pastor ceases exercising his office by the lapse of time if he has been appointed for a definite period according to particular law (see c. 522). In the United States the diocesan bishop may appoint a pastor for a specific term of six years, continually renewable. In such a situation the pastor loses his office only from the moment when, after the specific period has passed, the competent authority communicates this in writing to him (c. 186).

Before his term is completed, a grave cause is required to transfer an unwilling pastor (c. 190, §2) or to remove him (c. 193, §2), and the norms on transfer and removal become operative.

Parochial Administrator: Appointment and Notion[205]

Canon 539 — When a parish becomes vacant or when a pastor is prevented from exercising his pastoral function in the parish by reason of captivity, exile or banishment, incapacity or ill health, or some other cause, the diocesan bishop is to designate as soon as possible a parochial administrator, that is, a priest who takes the place of the pastor according to the norm of can. 540.

A parish is vacant when its pastor has died or ceased functioning for one of the reasons identified in canon 538. A pastor is impeded who, [201] NCCB-CompNm, 6. For a more in-depth commentary, see J. Hesch, "The 1987 NCCB Norms for Priests and Their Third Age," J 54 (1994) 387–408.

[202] See NCCB-CompNm, 50–52.

[203] Ibid., 50. See also cc. 281, §2; 1274.

[204] Instruction, 20, art. 4, §2. See CFC, Directory for the Life and Ministry of Priests (Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1994) n. 44.

[205] Cf. CCEO 298.

though he remains in office, is prevented from exercising his pastoral function by reason of captivity, exile or banishment, incapacity or ill health, or some other cause. When a parish is vacant or impeded, the diocesan bishop must designate as soon as possible a parochial administrator (that is, a priest who takes the place of a pastor according to the norm of c. 540).

Canon 472, 1° of the 1917 code said that when the parish was vacant, the local ordinary was to appoint as soon as possible an economic or administrative vicar (vicarius oeconomus); if a religious priest were to be appointed, his religious superior had to consent. Canon 475, §1 of the 1917 code said that when the pastor was incapable of discharging his duties properly due to old age, mental debility, incompetence, blindness, or other permanent cause, the local ordinary was to give a helping vicar (vicarius adiutor) to the pastor; if the parish had been entrusted to religious, the superior was to present this helping vicar to the bishop for appointment.

Parochial Administrator: Duties and Rights[206]

Canon 540 — §1. A parochial administrator is bound by the same duties and possesses the same rights as a pastor unless the diocesan bishop establishes otherwise.

§2. A parochial administrator is not permitted to do anything which prejudices the rights of the pastor or can harm parochial goods.

§3. After he has completed his function, a parochial administrator is to render an account to the pastor.

A parochial administrator is a priest who takes the place of a pastor in a parish which is vacant or whose pastor is impeded[207] (c. 539). The law does not further identify his qualifications for office, but certainly he must have the capacities to perform this temporary role. By definition a parochial administrator does not have stability in office (see c. 522); by nature his appointment is temporary. The law avoids giving any period of time within which the diocesan bishop must appoint a pastor to a parish served by a parochial administrator.[208]

A parochial administrator has all the duties and possesses the same rights as a pastor unless the diocesan bishop establishes otherwise;[209] among other things, this means the parochial administrator is obliged to offer the Mass for the people (c. 534). He is not permitted to do anything which prejudices the rights of a pastor or which can harm parochial goods.[210] When he has completed his function, he is to render an account to the pastor.

The 1917 code mentioned two kinds of parochial vicars[211] who assisted in parishes in these situations: the vicarius oeconomus (who served when the parish is vacant) and the vicarius adiutor (who served when the pastor is impeded).

[206] Cf. CCEO 299.

[207] The canon identifies some possible reasons for the pastor's being prevented from exercising his role: captivity, exile or banishment, incapacity or illness, or some other cause. The reasons listed are merely illustrative, not exhaustive. See P. Marcuzzi, "La vacanza della parrocchia e l'amministratore parrocchiale," in La parrocchia, 61–83.

[208] CIC 458 expected a pastor to be appointed within six months of a parochial vacancy, unless particular circumstances called for a longer vacancy. The 1983 code does not contain this specification. See J. Provost, "Parochial Administrator's Length of Office and the Bishop's Obligation to Name a Pastor," in CLSA Advisory Opinions, 1984–1993, 152–154.

[209] The canon allows the diocesan bishop to focus more precisely the role of the diocesan administrator, especially if the parish is not vacant (for example, the diocesan bishop may determine whether the pastor or the parochial administrator offers the Mass for the people).

[210] Similarly, the diocesan administrator is not to alter anything and is forbidden to do anything prejudicial to the diocese or episcopal rights (c. 428; see also c. 414).

[211] The other parochial vicars mentioned in the 1917 code were the vicarius of the moral person to whom a parish is entrusted (CIC 471), the vicarius substitutus (CIC 474), and the vicarius cooperator (CIC 476).

Interim Parochial Governance[212]

Canon 541 — §1. When a parish becomes vacant or a pastor has been impeded from exercising his pastoral function and before the appointment of a parochial administrator, the parochial vicar is to assume the governance of the parish temporarily. If there are several vicars, the one who is senior in appointment or, if there are no vicars, a pastor determined by particular law assumes this governance.

§2. The one who has assumed the governance of a parish according to the norm of §1 is immediately to inform the local ordinary about the vacancy of the parish.

When a parish is vacant or a pastor is impeded from performing his function, the diocesan bishop is to designate a parochial administrator as soon as possible (see c. 539). Before the parochial administrator is appointed, a priest must assume temporarily the governance of the parish. If there is one parochial vicar, he assumes temporary governance. If there are several parochial vicars, the one senior by appointment assumes it. If there are no parochial vicars, the code expects particular law to identify a pastor to assume interim parochial governance.[213] The code gives no particular title to this presbyter who assumes temporary parochial governance.

The first responsibility of whoever has assumed the temporary governance of the parish is to inform the local ordinary immediately of the vacancy of the parish or, presumably, of the impeded status of the pastor.

This canon basically repeats the norm of canon 472, 2°–3° of the former code, which had also stated that, if there are no parochial vicars, interim parochial governance was to be assumed by the nearest pastor as designated by the local ordinary in or outside of a diocesan synod. Further, if the parish had been assigned to religious, the superior of the house would assume interim parochial governance.

Parish(es) Entrusted to Several Priests "In Solidum": Qualifications, Appointment, and Canonical Possession

Canon 542 — Priests to whom the pastoral care of some parish or of different parishes together is entrusted in solidum according to the norm of can. 517, §1:

1° must be endowed with the qualities mentioned in can. 521;

2° are to be appointed or installed according to the norm of the prescripts of cann. 522 and 524;

3° obtain pastoral care only from the moment of taking possession; their moderator is placed in possession according to the norm of the prescripts of can. 527, §2; for the other priests, however, a legitimately made profession of faith replaces taking possession.

Canons 542–544 concern the governance of parish(es) entrusted to several priests in solidum in accord with the norm of canon 517, §1.[214] Canon 542 concerns the qualifications, appointment, and taking canonical possession of the parish(es) by such priests. Canon 543 concerns their tasks, functions, and obligations. Canon 544 concerns the cessation of office of one of them, or his incapacity to perform his function.

When the pastoral care of a parish or of different parishes together is entrusted to several priests in solidum, each priest must be endowed with the qualities mentioned in canon 521 including, for validity, presbyteral ordination. Each is to be appointed for an indefinite or specific period of time (c. 522) and the diocesan bishop is to judge the priests' suitability (c. 524). Further, each obtains pastoral care from the moment of taking possession of the parish: the moderator is placed in possession according to the prescripts of canon 527, §2, but the profession of faith (c. 833, 6°) replaces taking possession for the other priests.

[212] Cf. CCEO 300. The Eastern code says that, if there are no parochial vicars, the nearest pastor assumes temporary governance; the eparchial bishop is to determine at an early date (tempestive) which parish is considered closer to which parish.

[213] Particular law may select the nearest pastor, the vicar forane, or some other presbyter. No recommendation is given in the code.

[214] The issues in cc. 542–544 are to be determined by the particular law of each proper autonomous Eastern church (CCEO 287, §2).

Parish(es) Entrusted to Several Priests "In Solidum": Tasks, Functions, and Obligations

Canon 543 — §1. If the pastoral care of some parish or of different parishes together is entrusted to priests in solidum, each of them is obliged to perform the tasks and functions of pastor mentioned in cann. 528, 529, and 530 according to the arrangement they establish. All of them have the faculty of assisting at marriages and all the powers to dispense granted to a pastor by law; these are to be exercised, however, under the direction of the moderator.

§2. All the priests who belong to the group:

1° are bound by the obligation of residence;

2° are to establish through common counsel an arrangement by which one of them is to celebrate a Mass for the people according to the norm of can. 534;

3° the moderator alone represents in juridic affairs the parish or parishes entrusted to the group.

When the pastoral care of a parish or of different parishes together is entrusted to several priests in solidum, each is obliged to perform all the tasks and functions of a pastor enumerated in canons 528–530, according to the arrangement the priests establish. Each has the faculty to assist at marriages (cc. 1108–1111) and all the powers to grant dispensations which are granted to a pastor by law (see cc. 89; 1079, §2; 1080; 1196, 1°; 1203; 1245); this faculty and these powers are to be exercised under the direction of the moderator.

All the priests are bound by the obligation of residence (see c. 533, §1). They are to establish through common counsel an arrangement whereby one of them is to celebrate the Mass for the people (see c. 534). In juridic affairs, only the moderator represents the parish(es) (see c. 532); therefore, only he has the obligation to take care that the goods of the parish are administered according to the norm of canons 1281–1288, and he is to be assisted by the parish finance council in that administration (c. 537). Certainly, the other priests may also be involved with these administrative functions, even though only the moderator represents the parish(es) in a proper canonical sense.

Parish(es) Entrusted to Several Priests "In Solidum": Cessation of Office of a Priest or Incapacity to Exercise His Pastoral Function

Canon 544 — When a priest from the group mentioned in can. 517, §1 or its moderator ceases from office as well as when one of them becomes incapable of exercising his pastoral function, the parish or parishes whose care is entrusted to the group do not become vacant. It is for the diocesan bishop, however, to appoint another moderator; before someone is appointed by the bishop, the priest in the group who is senior in appointment is to fulfill this function.

When the pastoral care of a parish or of different parishes together is entrusted to several priests in solidum (c. 517, §1), the parish or parishes do not become vacant when one of the priests or its moderator ceases from office or becomes incapable of exercising his function. If this situation concerns the moderator, the diocesan bishop is to appoint another moderator and, in the meantime, the priest of the group senior by appointment fulfills the moderator's function. If all the remaining priests were appointed at the same time, the seniority may be determined by ordination or age.[215]

The parish or parishes entrusted to several priests in solidum become vacant only when all the priests cease from office.

[215] This could be determined by particular law.

The 1983 code calls for particular legislation on parishes in a number of areas in order to apply the more general universal law to the unique circumstances of the particular churches:

Particular Law of the Conference of Bishops

- on permitting a diocesan bishop to appoint a pastor for a specific period of time (c. 522; see c. 538, §1)
- on required parochial registers in addition to those for baptisms, marriages, and deaths (c. 535, §1)
- on suitable support and housing to be provided to a retired pastor (c. 538, §3)

Particular Law of the Diocese

- on the requirements for the pastor of a given parish (c. 521, §2)
- on the method whereby the pastor takes possession of his parish (c. 527, §2)
- on the allocation of offerings received on the occasion of performing parochial functions, and on the remuneration of the clerics performing them (c. 531)
- on providing pastoral care in a parish when the pastor is absent through a priest endowed with the necessary faculties (c. 533, §3; see c. 549)
- on required parochial registers in addition to those for baptisms, marriages, and deaths (c. 535, §1)
- on protecting older parochial registers (c. 535, §5)
- on requiring the establishment of a pastoral council in each parish, and on its operation (c. 536)
- on the specific operation of the parish finance council (c. 537)
- on which pastor is to assume immediate governance of a parish when the parish is vacant or the pastor is impeded, if the parish has no parochial vicars (c. 541, §1)
- on the obligations and rights of a parochial vicar (c. 548, §1)

APPENDIX II – ROLES OF THE DIOCESAN BISHOP, THE LOCAL ORDINARY, AND THE DIOCESAN ADMINISTRATOR IN PARISHES

The 1983 code mentions the roles of the diocesan bishop, the local ordinary, and the diocesan administrator in the life of parishes:

Role of the Diocesan Bishop

- to oversee the pastoral care of the parish (cc. 515, §1; 519)
- to erect, suppress, or notably alter parishes, after hearing the presbyteral council (c. 515, §2)
- to establish quasi-parishes (c. 516, §1—implicit)
- to provide pastoral care in some other way for certain communities which cannot be erected as parishes or quasi-parishes (c. 516, §2)
- to entrust the pastoral care of a parish or parishes to a group of priests in solidum with one of them functioning as moderator (c. 517, §1)
- to decide that a participation in the exercise of the pastoral care of a parish is to be entrusted to a deacon, lay person, or community of non-priests, under the direction of a priest endowed with the powers and faculties of a pastor (c. 517, §2)
- to entrust a parish to a clerical religious institute or a clerical society of apostolic life, and to enter into the appropriate written agreement (c. 520)
- to determine the suitability of a presbyter to be a pastor, even by means of an examination (c. 521, §3; see c. 542, 1°)
- to appoint a pastor for an indefinite or specific period of time (c. 522; see c. 542, 2°)
- to provide the office of pastor by free conferral, unless someone has the right of presentation or election, and without prejudice to canon 682, §1 (c. 523)
- to entrust a vacant parish to one whom he considers suited, after he has heard the vicar forane and, if warranted, certain presbyters and lay persons (c. 524; see c. 542, 2°)
- to oversee the pastor's direction of the sacred liturgy (c. 528, §2)
- to receive cooperation from the pastor in promoting and sustaining ecclesial communion (c. 529, §2)
- to issue prescripts on the allocation of offerings received on the occasion of certain parochial functions, and on the remuneration of clerics fulfilling them (c. 531)
- to establish norms on providing pastoral care in a parish through a priest endowed with the necessary faculties when the pastor is absent (c. 533, §3; see c. 549)
- to prescribe parochial registers in addition to those for baptisms, marriages, and deaths (c. 535, §1)
- to inspect the parochial archive at the time of visitation or another time (c. 535, §4)
- to require the establishment in each parish of a pastoral council, and to establish norms on its operation (c. 536)
- to issue specific norms on the operation of the parish finance council (c. 537)
- to remove or transfer a pastor, and to accept a pastor's resignation (c. 538, §1)
- to receive a pastor's resignation at age seventy-five, to accept or defer it, and to provide suitable support and housing for him (c. 538, §3)
- to designate a parochial administrator (c. 539) who has the same rights and duties as a pastor unless the diocesan bishop determines otherwise (c. 540, §1)
- to issue particular law on which pastor is to assume immediate governance of a parish when the parish is vacant or the pastor is impeded, if the parish has no parochial vicars (c. 541, §1—implicit; see c. 549)
- to appoint another moderator of the group of priests in solidum to whom is entrusted together the pastoral care of a parish or parishes, when the moderator ceases from office or becomes incapable of performing his office (c. 544)
- to appoint a parochial vicar (c. 547) and to define his obligations and rights (c. 548, §§1–2)
- to remove the parochial vicar (c. 552)

Role of the Local Ordinary

- to place a pastor in possession of his parish, observing the method accepted by particular law or legitimate custom, or to dispense from that method for a just cause (c. 527, §2; see c. 542, 3°)
- to prescribe the time within which a pastor must take possession, and to be able to declare the parish vacant if the time has elapsed and he has not taken possession without a just impediment (c. 527, §3)
- to permit the pastor to reside in a place other than the rectory near the church, especially in a house shared by several presbyters (c. 533, §1)
- to be informed when the pastor will be absent for more than a week (c. 533, §2)
- to permit the parochial vicar to reside outside the parish, especially in a house shared by several presbyters (c. 550, §1)
- to take care that some manner of common life in the rectory is fostered between the pastor and parochial vicars, where this can be done (c. 550, §2)

Role of the Diocesan Administrator[216]

Permitted

- to install or confirm as pastor those presbyters who have been legitimately presented or elected for a parish (c. 525, 1°)*
- to appoint pastors if the see has been vacant or impeded for a year (c. 525, 2°)*
- to remove the parochial vicar (c. 552)

Not Permitted

- to entrust a parish to a clerical religious institute or a clerical society of apostolic life, and to enter into the appropriate written agreement (c. 520)
- to appoint pastors unless the see has been vacant or impeded for a year (c. 525, 2°)*

[216] Those roles marked with an asterisk (*) also belong to the person who temporarily governs an impeded see (c. 413, §§1–2)

Primary Sources

Book of Blessings, prep. ICEL. Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1989.

CDW. Caeremoniale Episcoporum, September 14, 1984. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1984. ICEL translation: Ceremonial of Bishops. Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1989.

CFC. Directory for the Ministry and Life of Priests, January 31, 1994. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1994.

CFC et al. Instruction on Certain Questions Regarding the Collaboration of the Non-Ordained Faithful in the Sacred Ministry of Priests, August 15, 1997. Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1997. AAS 89 (1997) 852–877.

John Paul II. "On Parishes, Lay Ministry and Women" (ad limina address to bishops from Baltimore, Washington, Atlanta, and Miami, July 2, 1993). Origins 23 (July 15, 1993) 124–126.

———. "Priests, Their Life and Ministry" (ad limina address to bishops from Michigan and Ohio, May 21, 1998). Origins 28 (June 18, 1998) 73–75.

———. Apconst Spirituali militum curae, April 21, 1986. AAS 78 (1986) 481–486. Unofficial translation: TPS 31 (1986) 284–288.

———. "The Vocation of the Parish" (ad limina address to the third group of French bishops, January 25, 1997). OssRomEng (February 5, 1997) 5, 8.

NCCB. Implementation of the 1983 Code of Canon Law: Complementary Norms, April 26, 1991. Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1991.

Ochoa, X., ed. Leges Ecclesiae (1973–1978). Rome: Commentarium pro Religiosis, 1980.

Paul VI. Mp Pastoralis migratorum cura, August 15, 1969. AAS 61 (1969) 601–602. English translation: CLD 6, 190–192.

———. Mp Sacrum diaconatus ordinem, June 18, 1967. AAS 59 (1967) 697–704. See CLD 6, 577–584.

PCILT. "Observations Concerning Cases in Which the Pastoral Care of More than One Parish Is Entrusted to a Single Pastor," November 13, 1997. Comm 30 (1998) 28–32.

SCB. Directory for the Pastoral Ministry of Bishops, May 31, 1973. Ottawa: CCCB, 1974.

———. Inst De pastorali migratorum cura, August 22, 1969. AAS 61 (1969) 614–643. English translation: CLD 6, 192–220.

Secondary Sources

Books/Dissertations

Applegate, G. "Selected Canonical Issues in the Closing of Parishes." JCL dissertation. Catholic University of America, 1996.

Chester, T. "Select Canonical Issues in Diocesan Plans for Parish Restructuring." JCL dissertation. Catholic University of America, 1997.

Coady, J. The Appointment of Pastors. CanLawStud 52. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1929.

Coccopalmerio, F. De paroecia. Rome: Editrice Pontificia Università Gregoriana, 1991.

Coriden, J. The Parish in Catholic Tradition: History, Theology and Canon Law. New York: Paulist, 1997.

Cote, M. "Cura Animarum According to Vatican II." JCL dissertation. Catholic University of America, 1981.

Cusack, B., and T. Sullivan. Pastoral Care in Parishes Without a Pastor: Applications of Canon 517, §2. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995.

Downey, D. "The Retirement of Diocesan Priests." JCL dissertation. Catholic University of America, 1994.

Faris, J. Eastern Catholic Churches: Constitution and Governance. Brooklyn: St. Maron, 1992.

Hesch, J. A Canonical Commentary on Selected Personnel Policies in the United States of America Regarding Decent Support of Diocesan Priests in Active Ministry. CanLawStud 544. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1994.

Koudelka, C. Pastors: Their Rights and Duties According to the New Code of Canon Law. CanLawStud 11. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1921.

McCann, R. "Remuneration and Honest Sustenance for Clerics in Twentieth-Century Canon Law." JCL dissertation. Catholic University of America, 1994.

Mundy, T. The Union of Parishes: An Historical Synopsis and Commentary. CanLawStud 204. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1945.

Myers, J. "The Qualifications of Clergy for the Office of Pastor." JCL dissertation. Catholic University of America, 1976.

O'Connell, P. The Concept of the Parish in the Light of the Second Vatican Council. CanLawStud 470. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1969.

Périsset, J.-C. La Paroisse: Commentaire des canons 515–572. Paris: Tardy, 1989.

Pospishil, V. Eastern Catholic Church Law. Brooklyn: St. Maron, 1993.

Prendeville, E. "Lay Parish Coordinators: Some Canonical Considerations on the Implementation of Canon 517, §2 of the Revised Code of Canon Law." JCL dissertation. Catholic University of America, 1996.

Quant, R. "Non-Territorial Parishes in the 1983 Code of Canon Law: An Examination of Canon 518." JCL dissertation. Catholic University of America, 1996.

Articles

Arrieta, J. "La parrocchia come comunità di fedeli e soggetto canonicamente unitario." In La parrocchia (Studi giuridici, 24) 21– 36. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1997.

Berlingò, S. "Il consiglio pastorale della parrocchia." In La parrocchia (Studi giuridici, 24) 249–266. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1997.

Brewer, D. "Canon 524 and the Systematic Participation of the Laity in the Selection of Pastors." Stud Can 29 (1995) 481–492.

Calvo, J. "Parishes, Parish Priests and Assistant Priests." In Pamplona ComEng, 377–398.

Carlson, R. "The Parish According to the Revised Law." Stud Can 19 (1985) 5–16.

Coriden, J. "The Foundations of the Rights of Parishes: The Bases for the Canonical Right of Parishes and Other Local Catholic Communities." In PCILT, Ius in Vita et in Missione Ecclesiae, 505–525. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1994.

———. "The Rights of Parishes." Stud Can 28 (1994) 293–309.

———. "The Vindication of Parish Rights." J 54 (1994) 22–39.

Cox, C., and J. Koury. "Regulations Concerning the Format of Sacramental Registers." In CLSA Advisory Opinions, 1984–1993, ed. P. Cogan, 144–147. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995.

Cuneo, J. "Pastor's Right to Dissolve the Parish Council." In CLSA Advisory Opinions, 1984–1993, ed. P. Cogan, 150–152. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995.

Dalton, W. "Parish Councils or Parish Pastoral Councils?" Stud Can 22 (1988) 169–185.

Daneels, F. "Soppressione, unione di parrocchie e riduzione ad uso profano della chiesa parrocchiale." In La parrocchia (Studi giuridici, 24) 85–112. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1997.

———. "The Suppression of Parishes and the Reduction of a Church to Profane Use in the Light of the Jurisprudence of the Apostolic Signatura." Forum 8 (1997) 287–293.

De Paolis, V. "Il consiglio per gli affari economici ed i beni patrimoniali della parrocchia." In La parrocchia (Studi giuridici, 24) 267–288. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1997.

Doran, T. "Rights and Duties of Pastors." CLSAP (1993) 182–192.

Dugan, P. "Changes in Baptismal Records." In RRAO 1997, 51–52.

Dunn, B. "The Evaluation of Pastors." In RRAO 1997, 45–46.

———. "Transition Evaluation Processes in Parishes." In RRAO 1997, 46–47.

Erdö, P. "De incompatibilitate officiorum, specialiter paroeciarum: Adnotationes ad cann. 152 et 526." P 80 (1991) 499–522.

Euart, S. "Parishes without a Resident Pastor: Reflections on the Provisions and Conditions of Canon 517, §2 and Its Implications." J 54 (1994) 369–386.

Fürst, C. "La parrocchia nel Codice di Diritto Canonico delle Chiese Orientali (CCEO)." In La parrocchia (Studi giuridici, 24) 289–307. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1997.

Gauthier, A. "L'affidamento della parrocchia ad un gruppo di sacerdoti in solidum o a fedeli non sacerdoti nonché ad un istituto religioso." In La parrocchia (Studi giuridici, 24) 61–83. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1997.

Green, T. "Mission Parishes (Quasi-Parishes) Changed to Status of Parish." In CLSA Advisory Opinions, 1984–1993, ed. P. Cogan, 113– 114. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995.

———. "Persons and Structures in the Church: Reflections on Selected Issues in Book II." J 45 (1985) 24–94.

Green, T., J. Provost, and R. Wiatroski. "Establishment of a Parish That Is Both Territorial and Personal." In RRAO 1994, 102–110.

Griffin, B. "Canon 517: Jurisdiction for Laity." In CLSA Advisory Opinions, 1984–1993, ed. P. Cogan, 115–123. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995.

Grocholewski, Z. "Trasferimento e rimozione del parroco." In La parrocchia (Studi giuridici, 24) 199–147. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1997.

Hesch, J. "The 1987 NCCB Norms for Priests and Their Third Age." J 54 (1994) 387–408.

Hill, R. "The Mass Pro Populo and Acceptance of Other Intentions." In CLSA Advisory Opinions, 1984–1993, ed. P. Cogan, 144. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995.

———. "Parish Membership on Other Than Territorial Basis." In CLSA Advisory Opinions, 1984–1993, ed. P. Cogan, 126–128. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995.

Huels, J. "Confirmation of Baptized Catholics in a Schismatic Church." In CLSA Advisory Opinions, 1984–1993, ed. P. Cogan, 147–150. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995.

Longhitano, A. "L'amministratore ed i vicari parrocchiali." In La parrocchia (Studi giuridici, 24) 175–197. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1997.

———. "L'obbligo della residenza del parroco e la reggenza della parrocchia durante la sua assenza. In La parrocchia (Studi giuridici, 24) 155–174. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1997.

Lynch, J. "The Parochial Ministry in the New Code of Canon Law." J 42 (1982) 383–421.

Mariconti, G. "Il parroco promotore di comunione nella communità parrocchiale." ME 116 (1991) 243–259.

Marcuzzi, P. "Il consiglio pastorale parrocchiale." In PCILT, Ius in Vita et in Missione Ecclesiae, 437–463. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1994.

———. "La vacanza della parrocchia e l'amministratore parrocchiale." In La parrocchia (Studi giuridici, 24) 61–83. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1997.

McDonough, K. "'I Never Knew What You Thought of Me': Evaluation of Pastors and the Issue of Unassignability." Stud Can 32 (1998) 145–156.

Montini, G. "Stabilità del parroco e permanenza nell'ufficio parrocchiale." In La parrocchia (Studi giuridici, 24) 125–153. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1997.

Myers, J. "Consultation for the Appointment of Pastors." In CLSA Advisory Opinions, 1984–1993, ed. P. Cogan, 137–138. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995.

———. "Suppression and Merger of Parishes: Brief Overview of Canonical Issues." In CLSA Advisory Opinions, 1984–1993, ed. P. Cogan, 110–113. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995.

Paprocki, T. "Parish Closings and Administrative Recourse to the Apostolic See: Recent Experiences of the Archdiocese of Chicago." J 55 (1995) 875–896.

Provost, J. "Diocesan Policies Toward Pastors with Limited Terms of Office." In CLSA Advisory Opinions, 1984–1993, ed. P. Cogan, 135–137. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995.

———. "Disposition of Stole Fees." In CLSA Advisory Opinions, 1984–1993, ed. P. Cogan, 142–143. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995.

———. "Lay Co-Pastors—Improper Terminology." In CLSA Advisory Opinions, 1984–1993, ed. P. Cogan, 115. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995.

———. "Limited Tenure of Office for Pastors." In CLSA Advisory Opinions, 1984–1993, ed. P. Cogan, 132–135. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995.

———. "Limited Tenure of Office for Pastors and Others." In CLSA Advisory Opinions, 1984–1993, ed. P. Cogan, 129–132. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995.

———. "Non-Retroactivity of Term Appointments for Pastors." In CLSA Advisory Opinions, 1984–1993, ed. P. Cogan, 128. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995.

———. "Parochial Administrator's Length of Office and the Bishop's Obligation to Name a Pastor." In CLSA Advisory Opinions, 1984–1993, ed. P. Cogan, 152–154. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995.

———. "Pastor of More Than One Parish." In RRAO 1997, 48–51.

———. "Priests Serving as Pastors in More Than One Parish." In CLSA Advisory Opinions, 1984–1993, ed. P. Cogan, 124–126. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995.

———. "Reappointment of Pastor." In RRAO 1997, 47–48.

———. "Retention of Stipend for a Second Mass and Mass for the People." In RRAO 1994, 110–111.

———. "Rights of Pastors Being Transferred Concerning Appointment." In CLSA Advisory Opinions, 1984–1993, ed. P. Cogan, 138–139. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995.

———. "Some Canonical Considerations on Closing Parishes." J 53 (1993) 362–370.

Provost, J., and R. Hill. "Stole Fees." In CLSA Advisory Opinions, 1984–1993, ed. P. Cogan, 139–142. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995.

Read, G. "Pastors, Parish Priests and Assistant Priests." In CLSGBI Com, 285–302.

Renken, J. "Parishes Without a Resident Pastor: Comments on Canon 517, §2." CLSAP 50 (1988) 249–263.

———. "Pastoral Councils: Pastoral Planning and Dialogue Among the People of God." J 53 (1993) 132–154.

———. "The Parish: Community of the Christian Faithful within the Particular Church: Reflections on Some Aspects of Parochial Communio." CLSAP (1998).

Sánchez-Gil, A. "Circa la portata della qualifica del parroco quale pastore proprio della comunità parrocchiale." IE 8 (1996) 217–230.

Viana, A. "El parroco, pastor proprio de la parroquia." IC 29 (1989) 467–481.

Parochial Vicars[1] [cc. 545–552]

The 1917 code contained the law on parochial vicars in a special chapter (CIC 471–478). Different kinds of vicars were defined: vicar oeconomus (CIC 472–473), who was equivalent to the present parochial administrator assigned when a parish is impeded or vacant; vicar substitutus (CIC 474), a supply priest during the pastor's vacation or other absence; vicar adjutor (CIC 475), who was given to a pastor who was impeded from fulfilling his duties because of old age, mental problems, inadequate skills, blindness, or other permanent reason; and the vicar cooperator (CIC 474), who was substantially equivalent to the present law's parochial vicar. "Associate pastor," "assistant pastor," and "curate" are equivalent terms used in English speaking countries. The law for the Eastern churches is substantially the same as that in the Latin code (CCEO 301–303).

The Office of Parochial Vicar

Canon 545 — §1. Whenever it is necessary or opportune in order to carry out the pastoral care of a parish fittingly, one or more parochial vicars can be associated with the pastor. As co-workers with the pastor and sharers in his solicitude, they are to offer service in the pastoral ministry by common counsel and effort with the pastor and under his authority.

§2. A parochial vicar can be assigned either to assist in exercising the entire pastoral ministry for the whole parish, a determined part of the parish, or a certain group of the Christian faithful of the parish, or even to assist in fulfilling a specific ministry in different parishes together.

[1] For some other reflections on these canons see J. Calvo, in Pamplona ComEng, 398–402; J. Janicki, in CLSA Com, 437–440; G. Read, in CLSGBI Com, 302–305.

The Second Vatican Council provides the basic principles for the harmonious relationship and ministry of the pastor and parochial vicar or vicars:

> Curates, as co-workers with the parish priest, should be eager and fervent in their daily exercise of their pastoral ministry under the authority of the parish priest. There should therefore be a fraternal relationship between the parish priest and his curates, mutual charity and respect, and they should assist each other by advice, practical help and examples, providing with harmonious will and a common zeal for the needs of a parish. (CD 30)

The parochial vicar shares with the pastor the threefold ministry of teaching, sanctifying, and governing, but there are certain distinctions between them. Certain sacramental and liturgical functions are reserved to the pastor (c. 530). The parochial vicar needs the pastor's agreement to celebrate baptisms, confirmation, and anointing of the sick in danger of death, and to conduct funerals. The parochial vicar does not have delegation to assist at marriages by reason of office but requires either general or special delegation from the local ordinary or the pastor. Even if he has general delegation, he also requires the pastor's agreement to witness a specific marriage in the parish (c. 1114). Only the pastor represents the parish in juridic affairs (c. 532). The parochial vicar does not have the obligation of the Mass for the people (c. 534). The parochial vicar is accountable to the pastor and shares in pastoral ministry under his authority; in this way the vicar differs from the members of the pastoral team (c. 517, §1) who share pastoral authority in solidum. In other words, all team members are bound by all the obligations of the pastor.

Ordinarily a parochial vicar is assigned for full pastoral service in the parish. However, the bishop (or even the pastor) may assign him to a specific geographic area in a parish such as a mission or station, or for a specific ministry such as youth ministry, campus ministry, or ministry to an ethnic or language group in the parish. A new element in the law permits the bishop to assign him to fulfill a certain type of ministry in several parishes. In such a case, the letter of appointment should specify the ministry, the manner of remuneration by the several parishes, and his accountability.

Certain parallels can be noted between the pastor (parochus) and his parochial vicars and the bishop and his diocesan vicars such as the vicar general with executive power for the entire diocese, and the episcopal vicar who may be appointed to exercise such power for a territory within the diocese, for a specific ministry or business, or for the faithful of a determined rite or group (c. 479).

Requirement of Priestly Ordination

Canon 546 — To be appointed a parochial vicar validly, one must be in the sacred order of the presbyterate.

Only presbyters may validly be appointed as parochial vicars. This canon applies the more general norm in canon 150: "An office which entails the full care of souls and for whose fulfillment the exercise of the priestly order is required cannot be conferred validly on one who is not yet a priest." However, we can distinguish between specifically presbyterial functions and the broad range of pastoral services to be rendered at the parish level and provided by parish deacons, lay pastoral ministers or associates, and catechists. Such pastoral associates are usually church professionals and employees rather than office holders (c. 145), with rights and obligations specified in diocesan personnel manuals and parish job descriptions. However, if parish deacons are assigned by the bishop with stable obligations determined by him, they hold ecclesiastical offices.

Appointment of Parochial Vicar

Canon 547 — The diocesan bishop freely appoints a parochial vicar, after he has heard, if he has judged it opportune, the pastor or pastors of the parishes for which the parochial vicar is appointed and the vicar forane, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 682, §1.

The 1917 code required the local ordinary to consult with the pastor before assigning a vicar cooperator (CIC 476, §3). In the present law the bishop ordinarily provides for the office of pastor by free conferral after consulting the vicar forane (cc. 523–524). Likewise the bishop provides for the office of parochial vicar by free conferral; if he judges it opportune, he consults the pastor or pastors of the parishes for which the vicar is appointed as well as the vicar forane. In this country, by particular law or diocesan practice, the bishop ordinarily consults the priest personnel board rather than the vicar forane. It is rare to appoint a parochial vicar without at least some consultation with the pastor. However, the law does not technically require such consultation.

The Eastern code recommends consultation with the pastor before the appointment of a parochial vicar, but omits references to the protopresbyter, who is equivalent to a vicar forane (CCEO 301, §3).

The appointment of a parochial vicar who is a member of an institute of consecrated life or a clerical society of apostolic life follows the usual permission of canon 682, §1. The appointment is made by the bishop upon presentation of the candidate by the superior of the institute or society or at least with his consent.

The diocesan bishop may delegate a vicar general or episcopal vicar to assign parochial vicars provided he issues a special mandate to do so (c. 479, §§1–2).

Rights and Obligations of the Parochial Vicar

Canon 548 — §1. The obligations and rights of a parochial vicar, besides being defined in the canons of this chapter, diocesan statutes, and the letter of the diocesan bishop, are more specifically determined in the mandate of the pastor.

§2. Unless the letter of the diocesan bishop expressly provides otherwise, a parochial vicar is obliged to assist the pastor in the entire parochial ministry by reason of office, except for the application of the Mass for the people, and to substitute for the pastor if the situation arises according to the norm of law.

§3. A parochial vicar is to report to the pastor regularly concerning proposed and existing pastoral endeavors in such a way that the pastor and the vicar or vicars, through common efforts, are able to provide for the pastoral care of the parish for which they are together responsible.

As a cleric the parochial vicar has the rights and obligations accorded all clerics by universal law (cc. 273–289). His rights and obligations by reason of office are determined by the pertinent canons of this chapter of the code (cc. 545–552). Such obligations include the obligations to provide general pastoral care (c. 545, §1), to cooperate with the pastor (c. 545, §1 and c. 548, §3), to substitute for the pastor in his absence (c. 549), and to reside within the parish (c. 550, §1). The parochial vicar has the right to a vacation (c. 550, §3). He is not required to apply Mass for the people even when acting as a substitute in the pastor's absence (c. 549). Other rights and obligations may be added by diocesan statutes or other particular law such as a personnel manual. The letter of appointment from the diocesan bishop may also specify certain rights and obligations. The pastor may further specify the obligations of the parochial vicar in a more detailed job description or other mandate.

Ordinarily the parochial vicar exercises his office by fulfilling pastoral obligations for the entire parish. The fundamental pastoral obligations are contained in canon 528 (the pastor as teacher and sanctifier) and canon 529 (the pastor as shepherd and community leader). The bishop's letter of appointment, however, can limit the parochial vicar's ministry to a particular part of the parish or to a certain group of the Christian faithful (c. 545, §2).

The parochial vicar and the pastor are advised to consult and plan together. Such consultation may be informal; in larger parishes it ordinarily occurs in regular staff meetings with the pastor, his parochial vicars, and pastoral ministers.

Parochial Vicar as Substitute for the Pastor

Canon 549 — Unless the diocesan bishop has provided otherwise according to the norm of can. 533, §3 and unless a parochial administrator has been appointed, the prescripts of can. 541, §1 are to be observed when the pastor is absent. In this case, the vicar is also bound by all the obligations of the pastor, except the obligation of applying Mass for the people.

The 1917 code provided for a special vicar substitutus when the pastor was absent (CIC 474). The present law makes the following provisions:

The diocesan bishop should enact particular law providing for the pastoral care of a parish by a priest with the necessary faculties during the absence of the pastor (c. 533, §3). Such an absence could be due to a sabbatical, a vacation, a retreat, an illness, or an emergency. Diocesan norms may require the pastor to obtain his own substitute and inform the bishop or may assign a neighboring pastor to supply in case of emergencies. In the absence of such norms the parochial vicar is empowered to act as substitute. If there is more than one parochial vicar, the senior vicar in terms of appointment assumes the governance of the parish (c. 541, §1). If the pastor's absence is long term because of his captivity, exile, banishment, incapacity, ill health, or some other cause, a parochial administrator is to be appointed who substitutes for the pastor and replaces the parochial vicar acting as temporary substitute (cc. 539–540).

Ordinarily the parochial vicar substitutes when the pastor is on sabbatical, vacation, or retreat. The pastor may be absent from the parish for one month each year, not including his retreat (c. 533, §2); particular law may grant additional time for continuing education. If any absence is more than a week, the bishop is to be informed. The present canon transfers the needed faculties of the pastor to the parochial vicar during such absences.

Residency of the Parochial Vicar

Canon 550 — §1. A parochial vicar is obliged to reside in the parish or, if he has been appointed for different parishes jointly, in one of them. Nevertheless, for a just cause the local ordinary can allow him to reside elsewhere, especially in a house shared by several presbyters, provided that this is not detrimental to the performance of his pastoral functions.

§2. The local ordinary is to take care that some manner of common life in the rectory is fostered between the pastor and the vicars where this can be done.

§3. A parochial vicar possesses the same right as a pastor concerning the time of vacation.

The pastor is obliged to reside in a parish house close to the church. However, the local ordinary can permit him to live elsewhere, especially in a house shared by other presbyters (c. 533, §1). Similarly, the parochial vicar is obliged to reside within the parish or one of the parishes to which he is assigned. The local ordinary may also permit him to reside elsewhere, especially in a house shared by other presbyters.

In the United States, particularly in the missions, pastors often lived in apartments attached to the church. Later, rectories were built, and the pastor and his parochial vicars lived in rooms or apartments in the same building where offices and meeting rooms were located. More and more dioceses are pursuing alternatives to the rectory system. The present canon does not require the pastor and parochial vicar to share the same house, or for either to live in the parish office building. The canon leaves other alternatives up to the bishop but encourages both the pastor and the parochial vicar to live in a residence shared by other priests. Some community of life between the pastor and parochial vicar is also encouraged (c. 280).

The pastor and parochial vicar possess the same right to vacation time, namely one continuous or uninterrupted month (c. 533, §2). Just as the pastor's retreat is not counted in his vacation days, the parochial vicar also has the right to a month's vacation in addition to his annual retreat.

Voluntary Offerings

Canon 551 — The prescripts of can. 531 are to be observed in regards to offerings which the Christian faithful give to a vicar on the occasion of the performance of pastoral ministry.

Mass stipends belong to the priest who celebrates or concelebrates the Eucharist. The amount is set by a provincial council, by the bishops of the province, or by local custom (c. 952). However, the present canon refers to voluntary offerings (previously called stole fees) given on the occasion of celebrating certain sacraments or sacramentals. The amount of the offering is set by the bishops of the province or by local custom. Such offerings are usually given on the occasion of baptisms, marriages, and funerals, and sometimes even when communion is brought to the sick. The offering belongs to the parish, not to the parochial vicar, unless it is obvious that the donor wanted the offering to be a personal gift. The parochial vicar is remunerated for his ministry by a salary, living expenses, and benefits which are paid from the parish account (c. 281).

Removal of the Parochial Vicar

Canon 552 — The diocesan bishop or diocesan administrator can remove a parochial vicar for a just cause, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 682, §2.

The pastor is normally named for an indefinite period of time (c. 522); hence a grave cause is required for his removal (c. 193, §1). Canon 1741 lists five causes which the law considers serious enough for removal of a pastor. They include bringing grave harm to the ecclesiastical community, permanent illness of mind or body rendering his ministry ineffective, hatred of the people, grave neglect of office, and poor administration.

Other grave reasons may also be cause for removal. The parochial vicar, however, is appointed at the prudent discretion of the bishop and can be removed for a just cause; an unjust cause or arbitrary removal is of course excluded. A grave cause, however, is not required. The pastor has far more stability in office than the parochial vicar.

The procedure for removing pastors is contained in canons 1740–1747. There is no similar procedure for the removal of parochial vicars. General norms on removal from office (cc. 192–195) and on individual administrative decrees (cc. 48–58) are applicable. The decision should be in writing and the reasons given (c. 193, §4). The diocesan administrator as well as the diocesan bishop may remove the parochial vicar. Finally, a parochial vicar who is a religious may be removed at the discretion of the diocesan bishop after notifying the religious superior or by the religious superior after notifying the bishop. Neither requires the consent of the other (c. 682, §2).

CHAPTER VII
VICARS FORANE[2]
[cc. 553–555]

The institute of vicar forane is basically unchanged from the 1917 code (CIC 445–450). The 1917 code made it mandatory to divide the diocese into vicariates forane, deaneries, or archpresbyterates, although the bishop could seek permission from the Holy See not to do so (CIC 217). The office of archpriest can be traced to the fourth century. The deanery was originally a grouping of ten parishes. The modern concept of the vicar forane dates back to the sixteenth century under the inspiration of St. Charles Borromeo. The term "forane" originally meant the outlying or rural parts of the diocese where the bishop's presence and pastoral concern could be made visible by a vicar. More recently, bishops have appointed pastoral vicars with the title of urban vicars for urban and metropolitan districts.

Canon 374, §1 requires that a diocese be divided into parishes. Supra-parochial divisions are not required. Canon 374, §2 permits several neighboring parishes to be joined together in order to foster pastoral care through common action. Vicariates forane are named as an example of such groupings. The bishop can also create a region or district in the diocese and place an episcopal vicar in charge (c. 476). The episcopal vicar is a local ordinary and as such possesses ordinary general executive power (c. 134). The vicar forane does not possess the power of governance in the strict sense but exercises vicarious ordinary pastoral authority as a representative of the bishop. Episcopal vicars may be in charge of several vicariates forane or may substitute for the vicar forane in dioceses where only one supra-parochial structure is instituted: that of the district governed by an episcopal vicar. Finally, pastoral zones may be created within a vicariate composed of two or more parishes served by a common pastor or pastoral team.

The Directory on the Pastoral Ministry of Bishops (189) recommends that in large dioceses urban or rural vicariates be joined into pastoral regions with episcopal vicars as their heads. Episcopal vicars could also be appointed for particular groups of the faithful whose special care is entrusted to them (e.g., women religious, the laity of various social or religious categories, etc.) (CD 27; ES I, 14: 1–5).

Similarly, the Directory (184) suggests that in addition to territorially defined vicariates forane there can be personal, ritual, or functional deaneries, such as a deanery consisting of hospital chaplains or an ethnic vicariate for a particular language or ethnic group in a region.

The Eastern code requires the eparchial bishop to consult the presbyteral council before establishing, changing, or suppressing a district consisting of several parishes (CCEO 276, §2). While this is not required in the Latin code, the Directory (186) recommends that the bishop consult the priests' council before drawing up general constitutions for the deaneries or vicariates forane of the diocese. The constitution should define the composition of each deanery, the title of the leader, his faculties, and regulations for expediting the work of the vicariate. Otherwise, the Eastern code (CCEO 276–278) is substantially the same as the Latin code.

[2] For other reflections on these canons see Calvo, in Pamplona ComEng, 402–404; Janicki, in CLSA Com, 440–443; Read, in CLSGBI Com, 306–307.

Finally, too much weight should not be placed on the location of the canons on the vicar forane. In the 1917 code the canons on vicars forane (CIC 445–450) immediately preceded the canons on pastors (CIC 451–470). In the Eastern code as well the canons on protopresbyters (CCEO 276–278) immediately precede the canons on parishes, pastors, and parochial vicars. In the present Latin code, vicars forane are treated in the canons following parishes and parish personnel (cc. 515–552), perhaps because the division of the diocese into parishes is required and vicariates forane are now optional.

Title and Appointment of the Vicar Forane

Canon 553 — §1. A vicar forane, who is also called a dean, an archpriest, or some other name, is a priest who is placed over a vicariate forane.

§2. Unless particular law establishes otherwise, the diocesan bishop appoints the vicar forane, after he has heard the priests who exercise ministry in the vicariate in question according to his own prudent judgment.

Title

The vicar forane is known in some countries or dioceses as the dean, archpriest, urban vicar, area vicar, etc. In the Eastern churches he is known as a protopresbyter. These offices in both the Eastern and Western church were described by Vatican II (CD 30) and subsequent legislation (ES I, 19).

Appointment

A vicar forane is appointed by the diocesan bishop. Since the term "local ordinary" is not used, a vicar general or episcopal vicar could not appoint a vicar forane without a special mandate.

The law recommends that before appointing a vicar forane, the bishop consult with the priests who exercise ministry in the vicariate.

The canon also permits particular law to determine another way of naming the vicar forane. In some places, for example, the priests of the area select a candidate for appointment by the bishop. A broader selection process including members of the Christian faithful is also possible, provided the candidate is a priest; deacons and lay persons are excluded from the office of vicar forane.

Since a vicar forane is defined in law as a priest who is placed over a vicariate forane, the bishop may not dispense from the requirement of priesthood in order to appoint someone who is not a priest (c. 86).

Qualifications, Term of Office, Removal of the Vicar Forane

Canon 554 — §1. For the office of vicar forane, which is not tied to the office of pastor of a certain parish, the bishop is to select a priest whom he has judged suitable, after he has considered the circumstances of place and time.

§2. A vicar forane is to be appointed for a certain period of time determined by particular law.

§3. The diocesan bishop can freely remove a vicar forane from office for a just cause in accord with his own prudent judgment.

Qualifications

Both the 1917 code (CIC 446, §1) and the Eastern code (CCEO 277, §1) encourage the appointment of a pastor as vicar forane. The Latin code requires only that a suitable priest be appointed; he may be a pastor, a parochial vicar, a retired priest, or a chaplain; he may come from the diocesan priesthood, a religious institute, or society of apostolic life (c. 554, §1).

The office of vicar forane is not attached to a particular parish. Although attachment to a parish was not required by the 1917 code, it was customary in some places to designate a parish in the deanery as the central parish whose pastor was automatically the dean.

Suitability for the office ought to be judged in terms of the job description outlined in canon 555.

The Directory on the Pastoral Ministry of Bishops (187) recommends criteria for judging the suitability of a candidate for the office of vicar forane. He must be a priest who:

1. personally exercises the care of souls.
2. resides in the district.
3. is respected by the clergy and people for his learning, prudence, piety, and apostolic work.
4. is a person to whom the bishop may suitably grant faculties for the vicariate.
5. is able to promote and coordinate the joint pastoral program in the territory.

Term of Office

Like the episcopal vicar who is not an auxiliary bishop (c. 477, §1), the judicial vicar, his adjutant, and the diocesan judges (c. 1422), and members of the college of consultors (c. 502, §1), the vicar forane is to be appointed for a term of office. The length of the term and the question of re-appointment are to be determined by particular law either at the diocesan level (episcopal decree or diocesan synod) or perhaps by the conference of bishops (Directory 187). The appointment should be in writing (c. 156). Any faculties or additional powers or responsibilities not stated in common or particular law should be included in the letter of appointment.

Removal from Office

Because the vicar forane acts on behalf of the diocesan bishop in certain pastoral affairs, the bishop must have the freedom to appoint and remove the vicar. The law requires that there be a just cause for removal; an arbitrary or unjust reason is excluded. However, a serious cause is not required. Grave reasons ordinarily are required for the removal from office conferred for a specified period of time before the term has expired (c. 193, §2). The vicar forane is an exception. In order to be effective, the decree of removal must be communicated in writing (c. 193, §4). A just cause for removal might include failure to fulfill the job requirements or the urgent need to assign the vicar forane other duties incompatible with the office.

Faculties, Duties, and Rights of the Vicar Forane

Canon 555 — §1. In addition to the faculties legitimately given to him by particular law, the vicar forane has the duty and right:

1° of promoting and coordinating common pastoral activity in the vicariate;

2° of seeing to it that the clerics of his district lead a life in keeping with their state and perform their duties diligently;

3° of seeing to it that religious functions are celebrated according to the prescripts of the sacred liturgy, that the beauty and elegance of churches and sacred furnishings are maintained carefully, especially in the eucharistic celebration and custody of the Most Blessed Sacrament, that the parochial registers are inscribed correctly and protected appropriately, that ecclesiastical goods are administered carefully, and finally that the rectory is cared for with proper diligence.

§2. In the vicariate entrusted to him, the vicar forane:

1° is to see to it that, according to the prescripts of particular law and at the times stated, the clerics attend lectures, theological meetings, or conferences according to the norm of can. 279, §2;

2° is to take care that spiritual supports are available to the presbyters of his district, and likewise to be concerned especially for those who find themselves in more difficult circumstances or are beset by problems.

§3. The vicar forane is to take care that the pastors of his district whom he knows to be gravely ill do not lack spiritual and material aids and that the funeral rites of those who have died are celebrated worthily. He is also to make provision so that, on the occasion of illness or death, the registers, documents, sacred furnishings, and other things which belong to the Church are not lost or removed.

§4. A vicar forane is obliged to visit the parishes of his district according to the determination made by the diocesan bishop.

Particular law may legitimately grant certain faculties to the vicar forane. Among these faculties, pastoral needs might suggest the granting of certain matrimonial dispensations and permissions, granting of faculties for confession to visiting priests, or the faculty to administer confirmation (c. 884, §1).

The duties and rights attached to the office of vicar forane are ultimately the responsibility of the diocesan bishop. The vicar forane acts as the bishop's vicar in carrying out these responsibilities. This vicarious authority is pastoral, not governmental in the strict sense. The vicar forane is not a local ordinary. The responsibilities of the vicar forane listed in this canon could be further defined by particular law. A set of statutes or regulations for directing the work of the vicariate would also be helpful (Directory 186).

The code defines four general areas of rights and duties of the vicar forane to be further specified by particular law.

Promotion and Coordination of Common Pastoral Activity

The diocesan bishop is to promote and coordinate the various aspects of the apostolate within the diocese and its individual districts (c. 394, §1). The activity of the diocesan pastoral council may be coordinated with that of parish pastoral councils; parish councils grouped together in areas such as vicariates could choose representatives to serve on the diocesan council (Directory 204). The vicar forane assists the diocesan bishop as his vicar for apostolic and pastoral coordination. In doing so he is to respect the autonomy of the parishes and other institutions in his district. In accordance with diocesan policies and episcopal directives, he convenes the association of the vicariate's clergy, the representatives of parish pastoral councils, staffs of parishes and institutions involved in the apostolate and pastoral care, and members of laity involved in apostolic movements and associations.

Supervision of Clergy

The diocesan bishop is expected to demonstrate a special concern for his presbyters, protecting their rights, seeing that they fulfill the obligations proper to their state, making available means and institutions to foster their intellectual and spiritual life, providing for their decent support and social assistance (c. 384). The vicar forane acts as the bishop's vicar in exercising this broad pastoral responsibility toward the presbyters of the district and other clerics. He is concerned with the life-style and ministerial duties of the clergy (priests and deacons) in the district. Paragraphs two and three of the canon specify certain implications of such pastoral concern:

1. Continuing education of the clergy. Canon 279, §2 requires priests to attend pastoral and theological lectures, meetings, and conferences in accordance with prescriptions of particular law. The vicar forane reminds the clerics in the district to attend such functions or may even organize study days as directed by the diocesan bishop.

2. Spiritual needs of the presbyterate. The vicar forane assists the presbyters of his district to deepen their spiritual lives by encouraging days of recollection, attendance at retreats, and other means.

3. Social assistance for the clergy. Finally, the vicar forane is to embody a special concern for the pastors in his district who are seriously ill or need social assistance. He is charged with seeing to the details of their funerals, and ensuring the protection of the books, documents, sacred furnishings, and other things which belong to the Church.

Supervision of Liturgical and Temporal Administration

The diocesan bishop is to exercise vigilance throughout the diocese in the areas of ministry of the word, celebration of the sacraments and sacramentals, divine worship and veneration of the saints, and the administration of goods (c. 392, §2). The vicar forane assists him in fulfilling his duty of oversight by supervising liturgical functions in his district, the care of churches, the celebration of sacramentals, custody of the Blessed Sacrament, the maintenance of ecclesiastical records, especially of the sacraments, and the administration of parish goods, as well as general maintenance of the parish house and office.

Visitation of the Parishes in the Vicariate

The diocesan bishop is to complete a pastoral visitation of his diocese every five years, either personally or through another priest (e.g., his auxiliary bishop, vicar general, or episcopal vicar). He may enlist the vicar forane to assist in this visitation (c. 396). The vicar forane is also obliged to visit the vicariate by reason of his own office. The diocesan bishop is to regulate the frequency of the visitation, the pastoral issues to be discussed, and the manner of reporting to the bishop. At the very least the visitation should include the three general areas of common pastoral activities, life-style and ministerial duties of the clergy, and liturgical and temporal administration. When the bishop is legitimately hindered from personally visiting his diocese, visitation by the vicar forane might be an adequate substitute.

In addition to the responsibilities listed in this canon, the vicar forane is treated in other places in the code and in the Directory on the Pastoral Ministry of Bishops:

- Vicars forane are to be called to the diocesan synod as its members and are obliged to participate in it (c. 463, §1, 7°).

- The diocesan bishop is to hear the vicar forane when making a judgment as to the suitability of appointing a pastor to a vacant parish (c. 524). The Directory recommends that the vicar also be consulted when a pastor is transferred or removed (Directory 187 citing CD 29–30 and ES I, 19).

- If he judges it opportune, the diocesan bishop hears the vicar forane as well as the pastor or pastors before appointing a parochial vicar (c. 547).

Finally some deans may be chosen as ex officio members of the presbyteral council and the diocesan pastoral council unless the bishop makes other arrangements (Directory 188).

CHAPTER VIII
RECTORS OF CHURCHES AND CHAPLAINS
[cc. 556–572]

ARTICLE 1: RECTORS OF CHURCHES[3]
[cc. 556–563]

The Office of Rector

Canon 556 — Rectors of churches are understood here as priests to whom is committed the care of some church which is neither parochial nor capitular nor connected to a house of a religious community or society of apostolic life which celebrates services in it.

Rectors are given the care of a church building, i.e., a sacred building designed for divine worship to which the faithful have the right of entry for divine worship, especially its public exercise (c. 1214). The rector has at least minimal pastoral responsibilities and must be a priest. The rector, like the chaplain, treated subsequently, exercises some spiritual care of persons and is generally subordinate to the ministry of the local pastor. Because priesthood is constitutive of the office of rector, it cannot be dispensed from as a qualification for the office (c. 86).

[3] For other reflections on these canons see Calvo, in Pamplona ComEng, 404–406; Janicki, in CLSA Com, 443–445; Read, in CLSGBI Com, 308–310.

The church entrusted to a rector may not be a parish church (or mission of a parish), a capitular church, or a church connected with the house of a religious community or of a society of apostolic life actually used by these communities. However, other churches which may belong to such groups but are not used by them have rectors appointed or installed by the diocesan bishop.

In the United States, the pastor of the cathedral is sometimes referred to as the rector, but this is not a canonical term. In many countries the cathedral is not a parish and is entrusted to a rector in the sense of this canon. However, in the United States cathedrals are usually parish churches as well as churches for the diocese.

Appointment of Rectors

Canon 557 — §1. The diocesan bishop freely appoints the rector of a church, without prejudice to the right of election or presentation if someone legitimately has it; in that case, it is for the diocesan bishop to confirm or install the rector.

§2. Even if a church belongs to some clerical religious institute of pontifical right, the diocesan bishop is competent to install the rector presented by the superior.

§3. The rector of a church which is connected with a seminary or other college which is governed by clerics is the rector of the seminary or college unless the diocesan bishop has determined otherwise.

Ordinarily it is the diocesan bishop who appoints the rector of a church. The vicar general and episcopal vicar require a special mandate to do so, although canon 563 permits all these authority figures to remove the rector for a just cause.

In addition to free episcopal appointment, two other methods of provision of the office of rector are possible. If some other person or community has the right to elect or present a candidate, the diocesan bishop confirms the person elected (cc. 164–183) or installs the person presented (cc. 158–163). Finally, even if the church belongs to a clerical religious institute of pontifical right, the diocesan bishop installs the rector presented by the superior (c. 557, §2).

On the other hand, the rector of a seminary or college run by clerics is also the rector of the church connected with the institution. However, the bishop can make an exception.

Rights of Rectors

Canon 558 — Without prejudice to the prescript of can. 262, a rector is not permitted to perform the parochial functions mentioned in can. 530, nn. 1–6 in the church entrusted to him unless the pastor consents or, if the matter warrants it, delegates.

The rector is not allowed to perform the parochial functions especially entrusted to the pastor of the local parish unless he has the pastor's consent or has been directed to do so by the local ordinary (c. 560). In accordance with canon 530:

1. The rector may not administer solemn baptism. Ordinarily the rector would not conduct a catechumenate unless directed to do so by the local ordinary or with the permission of the pastor.

2. The rector may not administer confirmation even in danger of death without at least the presumed permission of the local pastor.

3. The rector may not administer Viaticum and anointing of the sick without at least the pastor's presumed permission.

4. The rector may not assist at marriages without delegation from the pastor and his permission to celebrate the marriage at the rector's church.

5. The rector may not conduct funerals unless he first informs the departed person's pastor.

6. Ordinarily the rector's church does not have a baptismal font. The rector may not lead competing processions in the territory of the parish. The celebration of Mass on Sundays and holy days of obligation should not conflict with the parish Masses.

The local ordinary, however, may direct the rector to celebrate some or all of these services for people who attend the church (c. 560).

Offerings received from the Christian faithful for parochial functions belong to the parish account unless the donor states otherwise (c. 531). The diocesan bishop, however, after consulting the presbyteral council, may decide to allocate all or a portion of these donations to the rector or his church.

The seminary is exempt from parochial governance (c. 262). Hence its rector is an exception to the general prohibition on the activities of rectors expressed in this canon. The seminary rector fulfills the office of pastor for all who are in the seminary with two exceptions: (1) He may not assist at marriage without proper delegation from the pastor or local ordinary nor may he delegate official ministers to assist at marriage (c. 1111); (2) he may not normally hear the confessions of the students (c. 985).

Liturgical Celebrations by the Rector

Canon 559 — A rector can perform liturgical celebrations, even solemn ones, in the church entrusted to him, without prejudice to the legitimate laws of the foundation, and provided that, in the judgment of the local ordinary, they do not harm parochial ministry in any way.

The rector of a church is ordinarily limited to non-parochial liturgical celebrations, e.g., the celebration of the Eucharist and the sacrament of reconciliation, the liturgy of the hours, exposition of the Blessed Sacrament, benediction, etc. The parochial functions listed in canon 530, 1°–6° are excluded from the rector's competency without permission of the pastor.

Other Parochial Services Which May Be Assigned to the Rector

Canon 560 — When the local ordinary considers it opportune, he can order a rector to celebrate in his church particular functions, even parochial ones, for the people and to make the church available for certain groups of the Christian faithful to conduct liturgical celebrations there.

The local ordinary may direct the rector to celebrate certain liturgical functions, even the parochial functions in canon 530, 1°–6° for the people who attend the church. He may also direct the rector to make the church available to other groups in the diocese who may not have their own church.

Required Permission of the Rector

Canon 561 — No one is permitted to celebrate the Eucharist, administer the sacraments, or perform other sacred functions in the church without the permission of the rector or another legitimate superior; this permission must be granted or denied according to the norm of law.

Since the rector is responsible for the proper celebration of liturgical functions in his church, his permission is required to use the church. Another legitimate superior such as the local ordinary or religious superior to whom the church belongs may also grant such a permission.

Canon 903 gives the norms for permitting a priest to celebrate Mass (the "celebret"). Canon 764 requires the presumed permission of the rector before a presbyter or deacon may preach.

Duties of Rectors

Canon 562 — The rector of a church, under the authority of the local ordinary and observing the legitimate statutes and acquired rights, is obliged to see to it that sacred functions are celebrated worthily in the church according to the liturgical norms and prescripts of the canons, that obligations are fulfilled faithfully, that goods are administered diligently, that the maintenance and beauty of sacred furnishings and buildings are provided for, and that nothing whatever occurs which is in any way unfitting to the holiness of the place and the reverence due to a house of God.

The principal responsibilities of a rector are listed in this canon:

1. To see that liturgical and canonical norms are followed in the celebration of sacred functions.

2. To see that special obligations associated with the church are fulfilled, e.g., prayers for donors or benefactors, Mass obligations and foundation Masses, etc.

3. To administer the goods of the church and maintain its furnishings and building.

4. To prevent use of the building in any way out of harmony with a sacred place.

In exercising these responsibilities, the rector is accountable to the local ordinary, not the pastor. He is bound to respect particular law and acquired rights which affect the church.

Removal of the Rector

Canon 563 — Without prejudice to the prescript of can. 682, §2, the local ordinary, for a just cause and according to his own prudent judgment, can remove the rector of a church from office, even if he had been elected or presented by others.

The diocesan bishop freely names the rector of a church, confirms the person elected, or installs the priest presented by a superior. However, the local ordinary, i.e., the diocesan bishop, the vicar general, or the episcopal vicar can remove the rector for a just cause. An unjust or arbitrary cause is excluded; however, a grave cause is not required. Notification of removal must be in writing (c. 193, §4). If the rector is appointed for a term, the letter of appointment should clarify whether removal may be effected for a just cause at the discretion of the local ordinary, or whether a grave cause is required. As always, a religious rector may be removed by the diocesan bishop who appointed him without the consent of the superior but with prior notice (c. 682, §2). The superior may also remove the rector with prior notice to the bishop.

The bishop does not have to obtain anyone's permission before he removes a rector who has been confirmed after election or installed upon presentation.

Article 2: Chaplains [cc. 564–572]

The Office of Chaplain[4]

Canon 564 — A chaplain is a priest to whom is entrusted in a stable manner the pastoral care, at least in part, of some community or particular group of the Christian faithful, which is to be exercised according to the norm of universal and particular law.

Canonically, a chaplain is a priest who serves in a stable manner "some community" or "particular group of the Christian faithful" (c. 516, §2). Although the office is pastoral, the chaplain is not a pastor; he does not serve a parish (c. 515) or quasi-parish (c. 516, §1). He may serve an institution such as a school, hospital, or prison, or he may serve a group such as immigrants, sailors and their passengers, or the military. He is not the rector of a church unless a non-parochial church is attached to the house of a community or group. The stability attaches to the office and not to the group, which may be itinerant or transient in nature.

[4] For other reflections on the canons see Calvo, in Pamplona ComEng, 406–408; Janicki, in CLSA Com, 445–447; Read, in CLSGBI Com, 310–313.

A deacon or lay minister cannot be a chaplain in the canonical sense. The current usage of the word "chaplain" to refer to anyone engaged in pastoral activity in hospitals, prisons, schools, etc., whether lay or religious, is a broad and analogous use of the term. The August 15, 1997 multi-congregation instruction on collaboration of the non-ordained faithful in the ministry of the priest forbids such usage (art. 1, §3).[5]

The canons in this article regulate the exercise of the canonical office of chaplain, yet there are other references to chaplains in the code. For example, canons 317–318 deal with chaplains of associations of the Christian faithful, and canon 813 refers to university chaplains. Other canons treat the right and duty of chaplains to bring Viaticum to the sick (c. 911), and to celebrate funeral rites in the church or oratory of a non-clerical institute of consecrated life or society of apostolic life (c. 1179).

Particular law should make more specific the basic framework on chaplains established by the code. Particular law should also determine the rights and obligations and norms regarding the appointment and removal of pastoral workers who assist chaplains as well as their relationship to him.

In summary, the code mentions several types of chaplains:

- The chaplain in hospitals, in prisons, and on board ship (c. 566, §2)
- The chaplain to a house of a lay religious institute (c. 567, §1)
- The chaplain to migrants, exiles, refugees, nomads, sailors (cc. 568; 383, §1)
- Military chaplains (c. 569; apconst Spirituali militum curae, April 21, 1986)
- The chaplain of a community or group with a non-parochial church (c. 570)
- The chaplain of an association of the Christian faithful (c. 317)
- The university chaplain for campus ministry (c. 813)

Particular law may establish other chaplaincies, e.g., to orphanages, boarding schools, airports, lay movements even without non-parochial churches, etc.

Appointment of Chaplains

Canon 565 — Unless the law provides otherwise or someone legitimately has special rights, a chaplain is appointed by the local ordinary to whom it also belongs to install the one presented or to confirm the one elected.

A chaplain is appointed in four ways:

1. He may be freely appointed and removed by the local ordinary, namely the diocesan bishop, vicar general, or episcopal vicar. By contrast pastors, parochial vicars, and vicars forane are appointed by the diocesan bishop and may be removed by him. Rectors of churches are also appointed by the diocesan bishop but may be removed by the local ordinary.

2. A chaplain may be presented by another authority, e.g., the administrator of a hospital, the principal of a school, a religious superior if this is specified in law. The person presented is installed by the local ordinary.

3. The chaplain may be elected by the group, e.g., a confraternity or other association of the faithful (c. 317). The local ordinary confirms the one elected.

4. The law may provide another manner for provision of this office or special rights of appointment may legitimately belong to someone other than the local ordinary. Military chaplains are governed by special laws (c. 569). Special agreements with the Holy See (concordats) may specify the right to appoint certain chaplains. The authority competent to erect a public association of the Christian faithful has the right by law to name the chaplain (c. 317, §1). Likewise the superior of an institute names or confirms the chaplain for an association erected by members of a religious institute in their own church or house (c. 317, §2).

[5] AAS 89 (1997) 863; Origins 27/24 (November 27, 1997) 403.

Faculties of Chaplains

Canon 566 — §1. A chaplain must be provided with all the faculties which proper pastoral care requires. In addition to those which are granted by particular law or special delegation, a chaplain possesses by virtue of office the faculty of hearing the confessions of the faithful entrusted to his care, of preaching the word of God to them, of administering Viaticum and the anointing of the sick, and of conferring the sacrament of confirmation on those who are in danger of death.

§2. In hospitals, prisons, and on sea journeys, a chaplain, moreover, has the faculty, to be exercised only in those places, of absolving from latae sententiae censures which are neither reserved nor declared, without prejudice, however, to the prescript of can. 976.

Since the chaplain is entrusted with some pastoral care of a community or group of the faithful which has not been or cannot be erected as a parish or even established as a quasi-parish (c. 516, §2), this canon lists the basic faculties needed for him to exercise pastoral care in a responsible fashion. The following faculties granted by universal law are attached to this office:

- to hear confessions of the faithful entrusted to his care
- to preach the word of God to them
- to administer Viaticum
- to anoint the sick
- to confirm those who are in danger of death.

Particular law or special delegation may grant additional faculties when needed, as, for example, in campus ministry, refugee camps, etc. Among such faculties are the authorization to perform solemn baptism, assist at marriages, and conduct funerals. Such faculties should be granted in writing. Particular law or the letter of appointment should also include norms on keeping sacramental records, informing the parish priest when sacraments are administered to his subjects, cumulative rights of the faithful to receive the sacraments from the chaplain as well as from their own pastor, etc.

Because of the difficulty of having recourse to the competent authority, chaplains to hospitals and prisons and on board ship have faculties to absolve from latae sententiae censures which are not reserved or declared. This faculty may be exercised in ordinary circumstances and is not limited to danger-of-death situations in which case every priest can absolve from all censures and sins (c. 976). This faculty is also more extensive than the faculty granted to the canon penitentiary which is limited to the sacramental forum (c. 508, §1).

Chaplains of Lay Religious

Canon 567 — §1. The local ordinary is not to proceed to the appointment of a chaplain to a house of a lay religious institute without consulting the superior, who has the right to propose a specific priest after the superior has heard the community.

§2. It is for the chaplain to celebrate or direct liturgical functions; nevertheless, he is not permitted to involve himself in the internal governance of the institute.

The local ordinary must consult with the superior before appointing a chaplain for the house of a lay religious institute. The superior has the right to propose a priest for the office after consulting the community. After this consultation, the superior is free to provide the more suitable candidate; and the local ordinary is equally free to appoint the more suitable candidate.

The chaplain may be the confessor for the house. The superior is nevertheless obliged to arrange for suitable confessors to be available for the members (c. 630, §2).

As in the 1917 code (CIC 524, §3), the present canon prohibits the chaplain from interfering in the internal government of the institute. His responsibility is limited to the celebration or supervision of liturgical functions.

Chaplains of Migrants and Others Deprived of Ordinary Pastoral Care

Canon 568 — As far as possible, chaplains are to be appointed for those who are not able to avail themselves of the ordinary care of pastors because of the condition of their lives, such as migrants, exiles, refugees, nomads, sailors.

Ordinary pastoral care is exercised by pastors (c. 519) and pastoral teams (c. 517). According to this canon the local ordinary is responsible for providing pastoral care for groups that cannot avail themselves of the services provided in parishes or quasi-parishes (c. 383, §1). The canon lists as examples of such groups migrants, exiles, refugees, nomads, and sailors. To this list could be added travelers, airport personnel, students (c. 813), and those confined to institutions such as hospitals and prisons.

Campus Ministers or University Chaplains

Canon 813 instructs the diocesan bishop to provide pastoral care for students by creating parishes for them, or establishing university centers at both Catholic and non-Catholic universities and appointing chaplains to serve these.

Chaplains to Public Associations of the Christian Faithful

The Holy See in the case of international associations, the conference of bishops for national associations, and the diocesan bishop (not the vicar general or episcopal vicar) for diocesan associations names the chaplain for public associations of the Christian faithful after hearing the major officials, unless of course the statutes provide otherwise (c. 317, §1). The chaplain may not act as moderator or chairman of non-clerical associations unless the statutes provide otherwise (c. 317, §3).

Military Chaplains

Canon 569 — Military chaplains are governed by special laws.

The special laws referred to in this canon are contained in the apostolic constitution of John Paul II Spirituali militum curae[6] and in statutes approved by the Holy See for each country.

Apostolic vicariates and military ordinariates are established by the Holy See in many parts of the world to provide for the pastoral needs of military personnel. Military chaplains are the equivalent of pastors of personal parishes. Besides the faculties mentioned in canon 566 they are usually granted pastoral faculties for solemn baptism, assisting at marriages, and conducting funerals. In the United States the military ordinariate (archdiocese) has its own chancery and tribunal. Its sacramental records are kept in central archives at that chancery office.

The jurisdiction of the military ordinary and of the chaplains is cumulative with that of the diocesan bishop and the local pastors. If there is no military chaplain to minister to their needs, the proper pastor of the territory where the military base is located has pastoral responsibility for military personnel in his parish.

Chaplains of a Non-Parochial Church

Canon 570 — If a non-parochial church is connected to the seat of a community or group, the chaplain is to be the rector of that church, unless the care of the community or of the church requires otherwise.

[6] April 21, 1986, AAS 78 (1986) 481–486.

This canon should be read in conjunction with canon 560 on the pastoral services of the rector of a church. Rectors of churches are ordinarily limited to liturgical celebrations such as Mass and the liturgy of the word and may not celebrate services specially entrusted to the pastor (c. 530) such as solemn baptism, assistance at marriage, conducting funerals, confirmation in danger of death, and even Viaticum and anointing of the sick without at least the presumed consent of the pastor (c. 558). However, the local ordinary may instruct the rector to provide even these parochial functions for the faithful who attend the church and to make the church available for groups of the Christian faithful (c. 560).

Canon 570 states that when the headquarters of a religious community, secular institute, society of apostolic life, or association of the Christian faithful is attached to a non-parochial church, the chaplain of the group should usually be appointed the rector of the church. As rector he performs liturgical functions in the church for the public. He also has those faculties granted him by law for the pastoral care of his community (c. 566). Finally, he may be granted certain parochial faculties either as rector of the church or as chaplain of his community or both.

The canon ends by admitting that even if the headquarters of a community or group is attached to a non-parochial church, the office of chaplain and rector may be separated.

Chaplain's Relation to the Local Pastor

Canon 571 — In the exercise of his pastoral function, a chaplain is to preserve a fitting relationship with the pastor.

The chaplain's role is complementary or supplementary to that of the local pastor. It is the duty of the chaplain to coordinate his ministry with the parish and to maintain good communications with the pastor. If the chaplain is given special faculties to celebrate solemn baptism, to witness marriages, and to conduct funerals, special agreements need to be arranged between the parish and chaplaincy and the directives of the local ordinary communicated to the pastor. For example, when the chaplain serves a hospital within the parish boundaries, arrangements should be made to cover emergencies when the chaplain is away. Conflicts between the chaplain and local pastor should preferably be settled by them; but if this proves impossible, they should be referred to the local ordinary for resolution.

Removal of Chaplains

Canon 572 — In what pertains to the removal of a chaplain, the prescript of can. 563 is to be observed.

The law for the removal of a rector (c. 563) is applicable to the removal of a chaplain. The chaplain as well as the rector can be removed for a just cause by the local ordinary in accord with his own judgment. While an unjust or arbitrary cause is excluded, a grave cause is not required.

The law does not discuss the situation where a chaplain is appointed for a term of office. Ordinarily a grave cause is required for removal from office of someone appointed for a term before the term has expired (c. 193, §2). However, although the vicar forane is appointed for a term, he may be removed for a just cause as an exception to the general norm (c. 554, §3). The same exception seems relevant to the ordinary in removing a chaplain whom he has freely appointed to a term. To avoid confusion, the letter of appointment should clarify whether appointment to a term of office implies the possibility of removal for a grave cause only or whether the chaplain continues to serve at the discretion of the local ordinary and may be removed for a just cause.

Religious chaplains can be removed from office by the local ordinary or superior after notifying the other but without necessarily receiving the other's consent (c. 682, §2).

Part III
INSTITUTES OF CONSECRATED LIFE AND SOCIETIES OF APOSTOLIC LIFE
[cc. 573–746]

Part three of Book II describes the Christian faithful from both the clerical and lay states who assume the three evangelical counsels by public vow or other sacred bond or who live in the spirit of the counsels in common life and a shared apostolic or missionary work. While they are gifts of the Spirit and an integral part of the life and holiness of the Church, these institutes and societies do not belong to its hierarchical structure addressed in Book II, part two, canons 330–572 of the code.

Part three of Book II is divided into two sections. Section one provides both general norms (cc. 573–606) and particular norms for religious institutes (cc. 607–709) and secular institutes (cc. 710–730). Members of these institutes of consecrated life assume the evangelical counsels of chastity, poverty, and obedience through a public vow or other sacred bond. Section two legislates for societies of apostolic life (cc. 731–746) in which members share common life and engage in apostolic or missionary work. These persons live in the spirit of the evangelical counsels which in some societies are embraced by a bond defined in the constitutions (c. 731, §2).

Although there are distinctions made between religious and secular institutes and between them as institutes of consecrated life and societies of apostolic life, twenty-one of the general norms for institutes of consecrated life apply to societies of apostolic life. Likewise, canons 598–602 apply to societies of apostolic life in which the members embrace the evangelical counsels by some bond defined in the constitutions (c. 732). Fourteen norms for religious institutes explicitly or implicitly apply to secular institutes;[1] forty-six canons for religious institutes explicitly or implicitly apply to societies of apostolic life.[2] This juridical overlapping shows the unity and complementarity of the Spirit's gifts and the difficulty of describing spiritual realities in legal terms. Besides these institutes and societies, there are individual Christian faithful who live an eremitical life (c. 603) or a life of consecrated virginity (c. 604) under the direction of the diocesan bishop. These two ancient forms of consecrated life have been renewed since the Second Vatican Council. Finally, the Church remains ever open to the gifts of the Spirit and the possibility of new forms of consecrated life (c. 605).[3]

Part three of Book II reflects the development of consecrated life in the history of the Church. From the New Testament to the present, there have been men and women under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit who have sought to live the example and teachings of Christ. Church authority studies and approves this vocation in a variety of forms: consecrated widowhood and virginity rooted in the New Testament; the eremitical life of the silence of solitude; monasticism and its daily horarium of liturgy, labor, contemplation, and meals in common; mendicancy characterized by poverty, preaching, charitable works, and mobility; the apostolic life offering the fruits of contemplation through dedicated apostolic service; and secular institutes with their hidden leaven-like presence in the world. Some faithful seek to follow Christ, poor, chaste, and obedient through assuming the counsels by public vow[4] or some other sacred bond in institutes[5] or individually.[6] Still others live

[1] See cc. 715, §2; 727, §2; 729; 730.

[2] See cc. 733; 734; 735, §2; 738, §§1–2; 741, §1; 743; 744; 746.

[3] A. Neri, "Nuove forme di vita consacrata (can. 605–CIC): Profili giuridici," ComRelMiss 75/3–4 (1994) 253–308.

[4] Canon 607, §2.

[5] Canon 712.

[6] Canon 603, §2.

the spirit of the counsels with or without vows or other bonds, either living in common in a society[7] or alone[8] in service to the Church.[9] The norms in this part of Book II are rooted in the rich legal tradition of the Church and in conciliar documents[10] and postconciliar texts.[11] Much criticism was directed at the 1977 draft on institutes of life consecrated by the evangelical counsels for its "levelling" of all institutes and attempting to categorize a variety of religious institutes. However, the code commission coetus on religious law contributed much in introducing principles that directed the laborious task of revising the 1917 code. The legislation was to respect: (1) the spiritual nature of this vocation, (2) the nature, spirit, and end of each institute, (3) subsidiarity with references to the proper law, (4) the cooperative nature of governance in institutes, and (5) the equality between institutes of men and women. These principles guided the coetus in its unenviable task of ordering the gifts of the Spirit within a legal framework.[12]

Title XII of the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches approaches consecrated life from an historical perspective in contrast to the more theoretical ordering of the Latin code. In the Eastern code, monastic religious life provides the pattern for religious orders and congregations as well as all other forms of consecrated life. The Eastern code legislates in detail for institutes of consecrated life, whereas the Latin text leaves significant latitude to the proper law of these institutes. There are other noteworthy distinctions between these two codes of law for consecrated life which order the gifts of the Spirit in accord with differing cultures and ecclesiastical structures.[13]

The 174 canons in part three of Book II of the Latin code show the evolution of this vocation in the Church. Some of the canons contain content which requires special examination: (1) exemption,[14] (2) governance in lay institutes,[15] (3) extraordinary administration,[16] (4) public vow,[17] and (5) juridical effects of eremitic life and consecrated virginity.[18]

Pope John Paul II's apostolic exhortation Vita Consecrata, issued after the 1994 synod of bishops, addresses the canonical issues raised by the synod members on the following topics: (1) new institutes, new forms, and new evangelical lifestyles,[19] (2) mixed institutes and equal rights of members,[20] (3) cloister for nuns,[21] (4) the nature and structure of associates joined to institutes,[22] (5) the order of virgins,[23] and (6) mutual relations between bishops and religious.[24] Furthermore, the pope exhorted institutes and their members to serve the special needs of today: the ecumenical movement and interreligious dialogue,[25] the new evangelization and inculturation,[26] evangelical poverty at the service of the

[7] Canon 731.
[8] Canon 604.
[9] L. Cada et al., "The Evolution of Religious Life: A Historical Model," in Shaping the Coming Age of Religious Life, 2nd ed. (Massachusetts: Affirmation Books, 1985) 11–50; J. Padberg, "Memory, Vision and Structure: Historical Perspectives on the Experience of Religious Life in the Church," in Religious in the U.S. Church (Mahwah, N.J.: Paulist, 1985) 64–78.
[10] LG VI; PC; CD 33–35; AG 18, 40.
[11] ES I: 22–40; II; III: 15–21; RC, VS, ET, and MR.
[12] ComCICRec, Schema of Canons on Institutes of Life Consecrated by Profession of the Evangelical Counsels, Eng. trans. by USCC (Washington, D.C.: 1977) 9–25.
[13] J. Abbass, "Forms of Consecrated Life Recognized in the Eastern and Latin Codes," ComRelMiss 76/1–2 (1995) 5–38; S. Holland, "A Spirit to Animate the Letter: CCEO Title XII," J 56/1 (1996) 288–306; R. McDermott, "Two Approaches to Consecrated Life: The Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches and the Code of Canon Law," Stud Can 29 (1995) 193–239.
[14] Canon 591.
[15] Canon 596, §1, §3.
[16] Canon 638, §1.
[17] Canons 607; 1192, §1.
[18] Canons 603, 604.
[19] VC 12, 62.
[20] VC 61.
[21] VC 59.
[22] VC 54–56.
[23] VC 57.
[24] VC 48–50.
[25] VC 101–102.
[26] VC 79–81.

poor,[27] and the field of social communications.[28] At the threshold of a new millennium, Pope John Paul II observed that consecrated life has "not only a glorious history to remember and recount, but also a great history still to be accomplished!"[29]

[27] VC 90.
[28] VC 99.
[29] VC 110; R. McDermott, "The Ninth Ordinary Session of the Synod of Bishops: Four Moments and Six Canonical Issues," ComRelMiss 77/3–4 (1996) 261–294.

CANONS AND COMMENTARY

SECTION I
INSTITUTES OF CONSECRATED LIFE
[cc. 573–730]

TITLE I
NORMS COMMON TO ALL INSTITUTES OF CONSECRATED LIFE
[cc. 573–606]

Nature of Consecrated Life[30]

Canon 573 — §1. The life consecrated through the profession of the evangelical counsels is a stable form of living by which faithful, following Christ more closely under the action of the Holy Spirit, are totally dedicated to God who is loved most of all, so that, having been dedicated by a new and special title to His honor, to the building up of the Church, and to the salvation of the world, they strive for the perfection of charity in the service of the kingdom of God and, having been made an outstanding sign in the Church, foretell the heavenly glory.

This foundational canon employs both spiritual and juridical norms in describing the vocation to consecrated life. Inspired by the Spirit, some of the faithful deepen their baptismal consecration through a free and total self-donation to God, who is loved above all through a new and special title or commitment.[31] This vocation is rooted in and more fully expresses the radical consecration of baptism.[32] Through profession of the evangelical counsels, both clerics and laity[33] seek a closer imitation of the chaste, poor, and obedient Christ[34] and strive for the perfection of charity in a permanent form of life.[35] The Church has long recognized the profession of the evangelical counsels as a kind of second baptism, a profound insertion into the Paschal Mystery of Christ.[36] Competent ecclesiastical authority constitutes consecrated life as a stable way of life with moral, social, and juridical effects.[37]

Trinitarian and Christological dimensions characterize life consecrated by the profession of the evangelical counsels lived in accord with the ap-

[30] CCEO 410 describes the religious state within the same theological context and seems to be a combination of cc. 573, §1 and 607, §2.

[31] Note that chapter 5 of LG deals with all those incorporated into Christ through baptism, whereas chapter 6 treats those called to consecrated life. In the 1983 code, the Christian faithful are provided for in the first section of Book II, and those consecrated through the profession of the evangelical counsels are addressed in this third part of Book II.
[32] LG 44, PC 5.
[33] Canon 207, §1.
[34] Mt 19:11–12, 21–29; Lk 9:23; Phil 2:7–8; LG 46.
[35] LG 39.
[36] LG 45.
[37] CIC 487; cc. 116; 120, §1; 607, §2; 712.

proved proper law of a particular institute.[38] Prompted by grace and motivated by charity, some of the faithful respond to this vocation and witness Christ's own life in love of the Father, openness to the Spirit, and service to people. The vocation manifests prophetic, apostolic, and eschatological elements. It witnesses to the very nature of the Church, contributes to its salvific mission, and anticipates eternal life.[39]

§2. The Christian faithful freely assume this form of living in institutes of consecrated life canonically erected by competent authority of the Church. Through vows or other sacred bonds according to the proper laws of the institutes, they profess the evangelical counsels of chastity, poverty, and obedience and, through the charity to which the counsels lead, are joined in a special way to the Church and its mystery.

Throughout the centuries, holy men and women guided by the Spirit have brought before the Church diverse expressions or ways of living the evangelical counsels. From these gifts of the Spirit, a wonderful variety of forms of consecrated life have been approved and canonically established by competent ecclesiastical authority.[40] This is an important concept, since consecrated life is a gift of the Spirit which the Church receives with gratitude and constitutes as a permanent way of life. Canons 603 and 604 describe hermits and consecrated virgins, individual persons totally dedicated to Christ.[41] Other canons in this section of the code provide for aggregates of persons or institutes of consecrated life.

Some members of the Christian faithful experience a call from God and an attraction to one of these canonically approved institutes of consecrated life. They respond of their own free will[42] and assume the obligations of the evangelical counsels of chastity, poverty, and obedience through vows or other sacred bonds in accord with the proper law of the institute.[43] While some institutes stipulate more or less than the three traditional evangelical counsels in the prescribed profession formula of the institute, all include the essential elements of Christ's total self-offering.[44]

Ecclesistical authority has great reverence for the proper law of each institute of consecrated life. Composed of constitutive or foundational norms approved by ecclesiastical authority and statutory or practical directives approved by the general chapter, the proper law articulates the nature, spirit, and purpose of the institute. It serves as a pedagogic and exhortatory document introducing candidates to the particular gift of God to be lived for the Church and encouraging members to persevere in their call. Imitating Christ's life in accord with a gift of the Spirit, the person lives a life of charity, witnesses gospel values, and is inextricably bound to the Church and its mystery in a special way.[45]

[38] Canons 578, 587.

[39] LG 43; VC 14–22; cc. 673, 713.

[40] LG 45, VC 5–11; see also cc. 116; 120, §1. Only competent ecclesiastical authority can change the nature of or suppress such institutes.

[41] Hermits undertake the three evangelical counsels by vows or other sacred bonds (c. 603, §2). Consecrated virgins assume a life of perpetual virginity and follow a way of life prescribed by the diocesan bishop (c. 604).

[42] Canons 219; 643, §1, 4°; 656, §4; 658; 721, §3.

[43] LG 43–44; cc. 607, §2; 712. The constitutions of each institute determine the kind of commitment and the proper object of the sacred bonds (cc. 587, §1; 598, §1). The bond is defined in the constitutions of societies of apostolic life in which the members assume the evangelical counsels (cc. 731, §2; 732).

[44] The Sermon on the Mount called all Christians to the living of the evangelical counsels. Members of religious and secular institutes profess to live chastity, poverty, and obedience in a more radical way in accord with the proper law of a specific institute. Formulas of profession differ. Members of one institute may profess obedience to the proper law which provides the way in which the evangelical counsels are lived. The formulas of other institutes contain a fourth vow or sacred promise of some particular virtue proper to the institute. A profession of stability and conversion of life, a vow to practice mercy or service to the destitute, and a vow of obedience to the Holy Father would be some examples included in the act of profession.

[45] LG 44; VC 29, 33.

Ecclesial Dimension of Consecrated Life[46]

Canon 574 — §1. The state of those who profess the evangelical counsels in institutes of this type belongs to the life and holiness of the Church and must be fostered and promoted by all in the Church.

This canon emphasizes the ecclesial nature of life consecrated by the evangelical counsels. The state neither belongs to the hierarchical ordering of the Church, nor is it an intermediate level between the clerical and lay state. Rather, consecrated life reflects the prophetic nature of the Church and enjoys a certain freedom and autonomy.[47] Each institute contributes to the life and holiness of the Church through its own gift.[48] Diocesan bishops, as well as all of the faithful, have a pastoral duty to promote and foster consecrated life.[49]

§2. Certain Christian faithful are specially called by God to this state so that they possess a special gift in the life of the Church and contribute to its salvific mission, according to the purpose and spirit of the institute.

Both clerics and laity can be called by God to respond through grace to live this state of consecrated life (c. 207, §2).[50] Guided by the Spirit, they enjoy a special gift in the Church and contribute to its salvific mission in accord with the spirit and purpose of their institute.[51]

Counsels Modeled on Christ

Canon 575 — The evangelical counsels, based on the teaching and examples of Christ the Teacher, are a divine gift which the Church has received from the Lord and preserves always through His grace.

Christ lived and taught the evangelical counsels of chastity, poverty, and obedience.[52] Of the many gospel counsels, these three best express his own consecration in the Paschal Mystery,[53] his love and obedience to the Father even to death on the cross.[54] Prominent in the life of the Mother of God,[55] chastity, poverty, and obedience have significant relevance in the Church. Throughout the centuries countless men and women as hermits, monastics, mendicants, apostolic religious, and secular persons have dedicated themselves through a total self-offering to live these evangelical counsels in imitation of Christ.[56] Through this total self-offering, the person manifests the Trinitarian and Christological characteristics which should mark every Christian life.[57] The counsels are a radical living of gospel spirituality and a continuance of Christ's life and mission.[58] The Church makes every effort to preserve and promote this divine gift. In studying and approving constitutions submitted by institutes of consecrated life, ecclesiastical authority ensures that the evangelical counsels are preserved and lived in accord with the nature and spirit of the institute.[59]

Church Interprets, Orders the Counsels

Canon 576 — It is for the competent authority of the Church to interpret the evangelical counsels, to direct their practice by laws, and by canonical approbation to establish the stable forms of living deriving from them, and also, for its part, to take care that the institutes grow and flourish according to the spirit of the founders and sound traditions.

[46] Cf. CCEO 411.
[47] Canon 586.
[48] LG 43, PC 1.
[49] LG 44; PC 24; MR 28; VC 49; cc. 385, 387; see also FC 53, AAS 74 (1982) 81–91, esp. 81.
[50] LG 43.
[51] LG 43–44, PC 2, VC 36.

[52] LG 43, PC 1.
[53] Jn 17:18–19.
[54] Phil 2:8.
[55] LG 46, VC 112.
[56] PC 12–14, 16–17; VC 6–11.
[57] VC 21.
[58] Mt 9:9, 19:16–22, 20:20–27; Lk 18:18–23.
[59] LG 42–43, 46; PC 1; VC 18, 20–21, 30; c. 587, §1.

This juridic canon reflects conciliar teaching and recognizes the fourfold responsibility of church authority regarding the evangelical counsels: (1) to interpret the evangelical counsels, (2) to legislate for their practice, (3) to constitute stable forms of living them, and (4) to monitor the growth and development of the institutes in accord with their particular charism.[60]

In some instances the Apostolic See acts; in others the diocesan bishop has this responsibility. Only the Apostolic See can approve new forms of consecrated life[61] and erect or approve institutes of pontifical right.[62] Diocesan bishops erect institutes of diocesan right in the particular churches they govern.[63]

An institute of consecrated life ordinarily begins with a small gathering or association of the faithful.[64] Even before formal approval, such an association would fall under the vigilance of the diocesan bishop. He or his delegate would monitor the life and activity of the de facto association.[65] The practice of Christian virtue and expressions of the evangelical counsels can be misguided or carried to excess. Competent church authority judges the genuineness of a founding charism and the manner in which the counsels are lived so as to build up the life and holiness of the Church.[66]

Ecclesiastical approval gives assurance and stability to those drawn to the institute and to the ecclesial community that this form of life is in accord with gospel spirituality and church doctrine. Church authority exerts a vigilance in pointing out any departures from the spirit of the founder or the sound traditions of the institute. The members have primary responsibility in nurturing and fostering their gift for the whole Church. Gospel spirituality, the spirit of the founder, church teaching, and the needs of today's world are the criteria that the Church places before canonically approved institutes to enable them to grow and flourish.[67]

Variety of Gifts, Institutes

Canon 577 — In the Church there are a great many institutes of consecrated life which have different gifts according to the grace which has been given them: they more closely follow Christ who prays, or announces the kingdom of God, or does good to people, or lives with people in the world, yet who always does the will of the Father.

The Spirit has blessed the Church throughout its history with a wonderful variety of institutes of consecrated life. Each reflects a particular way of living Christ's life in obedience to the Father's will. All manifest the commandment of love and are as branches of the one vine integrated into the life of the Church. Through the gifts given to the holy founders and foundresses of institutes, the members of those institutes continue Christ's witness through fidelity to their proper charism.[68]

Some live lives of prayer, sacrifice, and penance in a more contemplative lifestyle;[69] others announce the kingdom of God in apostolic institutes dedicated to preaching, missionary activity, or some form of spiritual or corporal work of mercy.[70] Still others live a consecrated secularity as spiritual leaven in the world.[71] The institutes reflect a rich complementarity of gifts. Contemplative institutes share in the mission of the Church through their contributions of prayer and sacrifice. Apostolic and secular institutes find the source for the vitality of their activity in contemplation. Each institute presents Christ in a particular way and at a particular time of salvation history. All share Christ's mission of carrying out the Father's will for the salvation of the world.[72]

[60] LG 12, 45.
[61] Canon 605.
[62] Canon 593.
[63] Canon 579.
[64] Canon 215.
[65] Canons 305; 397, §1.
[66] LG 45.

[67] PC 2.
[68] PC 8, VC 5–12.
[69] Canon 674, PC 7, AG 40, VC 8.
[70] Canon 675, PC 8, VC 9.
[71] Canon 710, PC 11, VC 10.
[72] LG 36, 46; PC 8; VC 5, 6–12.

Fidelity to Patrimony[73]

Canon 578 — All must observe faithfully the mind and designs of the founders regarding the nature, purpose, spirit, and character of an institute, which have been sanctioned by competent ecclesiastical authority, and its sound traditions, all of which constitute the patrimony of the same institute.

Fidelity to the spiritual patrimony of the institute becomes a sacred obligation for all institutes and their members. All that the founder or foundress intended regarding the nature (religious or secular), purpose (contemplation or apostolic service), spirit (particular spirituality), and character (monastic, conventual, apostolic) of the institute approved by competent ecclesiastical authority, as well as its wholesome traditions constitute the institute's patrimony.[74] Approved as a public juridic person in the Church, the institute and each of its members have a grave obligation to safeguard and promote this patrimony.

It can happen that accretions unrelated to the original inspiration and purpose of the founder or foundress become attached to and even approved constituent elements of the proper law of a particular institute of consecrated life. Such accretions prompt a reexamination of the original nature, spirit, and purpose of the institute. At times, the Church calls institutes to examine their proper law, particularly the fundamental code or constitutions, in order to ensure that the rich spiritual patrimony perdures.[75]

Erection and Suppression

The next seven canons (cc. 579–585) address the erection, suppression, and structural organization of institutes of consecrated life. The principles of autonomy, or respect for the institute's ability for internal governance, and subsidiarity, or allowing decisions to be made at the appropriate level with accountability to the higher authority, underlie these canons.

Ecclesiastical authority regulates the critical moments of erection and suppression of institutes of consecrated life, as well as any other structural change which would affect the identity and autonomy of an institute. The competent authority in the institute makes decisions for internal structural changes. The norms show how the Church protects gifts given her by the Spirit, guards the rights of both institutes and members, and regulates the temporal goods of suppressed institutes.

Erection of Diocesan Right Institute[76]

Canon 579 — Diocesan bishops, each in his own territory, can erect institutes of consecrated life by formal decree, provided that the Apostolic See has been consulted.

In erecting institutes of consecrated life, the Apostolic See is concerned that they not duplicate existing ones, prove useless, or lack sufficient resources to achieve their purposes.[77] Since 1900, diocesan bishops have been able to erect religious congregations of diocesan right[78] but the bishops [73] CCEO 426 prescribes the same fidelity to the patrimony of the institute for each and every religious.

[74] PC 2b, ES II: 14. The latter text instructed that whatever was out of date, changed with the passage of time, or only of local application was to be excluded from the basic texts of institutes.

[75] VC 37, 96–103. Pope John Paul II encourages institutes of consecrated life to creative fidelity in adapting the purposes of their institutes to the present needs of the people of God.

[76] The eparchial bishop can erect monasteries sui iuris (CCEO 435, §1), congregations (CCEO 506, §1), societies of apostolic life (CCEO 556), and secular institutes (CCEO 566). He cannot erect orders (CCEO 505, §1).

[77] PC 19. There has been a caution with regard to multiplying religious institutes since the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215 up to and including the Second Vatican Council. In promoting institutes, consideration should also be given to the needs of the people of the particular church, their culture, way of life, and local customs.

[78] See AAS 14 (1992) 644; CLD 1, 267–269, 272. The former code distinguished between religious institutes as are required to consult the Apostolic See before erecting these congregations.[79] The present norm provides that the bishop can erect an institute of consecrated life after such consultation. Ordinarily, institutes of consecrated life have humble beginnings. The diocesan bishop can initiate the process, but usually it begins with a small group of persons coming together as a de facto association.[80] The bishop or his delegate studies the association with regard to its nature and usefulness to the particular church, careful to ensure that it does not duplicate already existing institutes.[81] The association may possess unique features that differ significantly from already approved forms of consecrated life and require further scrutiny and approval by the Apostolic See.[82]

If the group meets the requirements for one of the existing forms of consecrated life, shows originality, attracts members, and proves resourceful, the diocesan bishop through a formal decree can erect it as a public association of the faithful and approve its statutes.[83] These statutes are the foundation for what will later be the proper law of the institute of consecrated life. At this point, the members of the association may want to make private vows with the consent of the bishop.[84] If the association is clerical,[85] the clerics belonging to it remain incardinated in their respective dioceses, religious institutes, or societies of apostolic life until the association is formally erected as an institute of consecrated life.

If the association continues to thrive, a brief is sent to the appropriate Roman congregation to obtain the nihil obstat before either the diocesan bishop or one equivalent to him in law[86] erects it as an institute of consecrated life of diocesan right.[87] The Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life has a thorough procedure for examining the materials to ensure correct doctrine. Consultation with the Apostolic See would seem to be required for the validity of the erection. When the nihil obstat is obtained, the diocesan bishop or his equivalent in law erects the institute of consecrated life by a formal decree. If the association is erected as a clerical institute of diocesan right,[88] the clerics become incardinated into it at the time of their perpetual profession or definitive incorporation, unless the constitutions prescribe otherwise.[89]

Formal erection as an institute of consecrated life of diocesan right presents the institute as an authentic expression of the gospel empowered to carry on its apostolate in the name of the Church. It remains the responsibility of the diocesan bishop to guide and encourage the growth of the institute in accordance with its proper nature, spirit, and end.[90]

Aggregation of Institute[91]

Canon 580 — The aggregation of one institute of consecrated life to another is reserved to the competent authority of the aggregating institute; the canonical autonomy of the aggregated institute is always to be preserved.

This canon addresses a relationship between institutes of consecrated life that does not interfere orders, or those with solemn vows, and congregations, or those with simple vows (CIC 488, §2).

[79] CLD 1, 268–269.

[80] LG 45; cc. 215, 299.

[81] Canon 305, §1. The proliferation of institutes has been a constant concern of the Church. See PC 19, VC 12.

[82] Canon 605. In his apostolic exhortation, Vita consecrata 62, John Paul II deemed it appropriate to set up a commission to deal with questions relating to new forms of consecrated life.

[83] Canons 312–314.

[84] Canon 1192, §1.

[85] Canon 302.

[86] Canons 381, §2; 368.

[87] These guidelines are found in CLD 7, 458–459. The Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life, the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples, or the Congregation for the Eastern Churches would be the appropriate congregation.

[88] Canon 588, §2.

[89] Canon 268, §2.

[90] Canon 576; M. Joyce and R. McDermott, "Canon 579: Erection of a Diocesan Institute," RRAO 1984–1993, 159–163.

[91] Cf. CCEO 440, §1.

with the autonomy of the individual institutes. Aggregation refers to the spiritual bond or affiliation between first, second, and third orders of mendicants (Dominicans, Franciscans, Carmelites, Augustinians, etc.). Another example is the affiliation of Benedictine monasteries of women religious with Benedictine monasteries of men. The institutes share a common spirituality and support one another in their consecrated life. Some secular institutes are aggregated to religious institutes.[92]

The institute desiring aggregation would petition for it, and the act of aggregation would be reserved to the competent authority (superior general or general chapter) of the aggregating institute according to its proper law. The norm states that the aggregating authority has no jurisdiction over the aggregated institute. This bonding of institutes of consecrated life enables them to collaborate and share personnel and resources in preserving and promoting their spirituality and works, while each institute maintains its distinct nature and autonomy.[93]

Structural Divisions of Institute[94]

Canon 581 — To divide an institute into parts, by whatever name they are called, to erect new parts, to join those erected, or to redefine their boundaries belongs to the competent authority of the institute, according to the norm of the constitutions.

This canon employs the principle of subsidiarity in recognizing the competence of the proper authority of an institute to order its internal structures. The authority (supreme moderator or general chapter) and the parts to which the institute can be divided are defined in the constitutions.[95] Some institutes name the general chapter as the competent authority; others prefer to leave such structural adjustments to the supreme moderator and council. The general council meets more regularly than the chapter and may be better informed regarding particular geographic areas and availability of personnel.

The competent authority can divide the institute into parts (provinces,[96] vice-provinces, regions),[97] erect new parts, and join or realign those already existing according to the norms of the constitutions. The nature, size, and purpose of an institute often determine its particular structure. Such structures are effective channels in distributing personnel and resources to carry on the work of the institute.

There may be no provision in the constitutions to erect a needed structure, e.g., a province. Or the competent authority may need to suppress all of the provinces due to the small number of members. Such acts require a constitutional change which would be authorized by the competent ecclesiastical authority after a two-thirds vote of the general chapter.[98] Lack of personnel and resources often necessitates the union of existing parts, as well as the suppression of parts of the institute.[99] While the norm does not require consultation with the diocesan bishops of the places where such changes are made, courtesy and concern for the mission of the particular churches certainly warrant informing bishops of the structural changes of the institute in their dioceses.[100]

[92] CLD 3, 156.

[93] At times in accord with the will of the founder and the institutes concerned, the Apostolic See has permitted institutes of women religious to be directed by an institute of men religious who share the same founder. For examples, the Daughters of Charity of St. Vincent dePaul are directed by the superior general of the Congregation of the Mission (Vincentians); the Daughters of Mary, Help of Christians, by the superior general of the Salesians; and the Daughters of Wisdom by the superior general of the Montfort Fathers. See E. Gambari, Religious Life (Boston: Daughters of St. Paul, 1986) 461.

[94] Cf. CCEO 508, §§2–3; 556.

[95] Canon 587, §1.

[96] Canon 621.

[97] The constitution and erection of houses are provided for in cc. 608 and 609.

[98] Canons 587, §2; 593; 595, §1.

[99] Canon 585.

[100] The diocesan bishop's consent is required for the erection of a house (c. 609, §1) and he is to be consulted at the suppression of a house (c. 616, §1).

Mergers/Unions/Confederations/Federations[101]

Canon 582 — Mergers and unions of institutes of consecrated life are reserved to the Apostolic See only; confederations and federations are also reserved to it.

The structures described in this canon extend beyond the internal life and governance of the institutes involved. In addition, merger (fusion) and union affect the juridical nature, governance, and autonomy of the institutes involved.[102] The Apostolic See approves all mergers and unions of institutes of consecrated life. Neither of these two terms is defined; they are often used interchangeably and imply the extinction of one or more juridical persons.

The term "merger" (fusion) is most often employed to describe the extinction of one institute through union with another. This often occurs when a smaller institute begins to lose its vitality due to a lack of personnel or resources and seeks to unite with another institute that is similar to it in nature, spirit, and goals. Conciliar and postconciliar documents encourage such mergers or fusions, particularly when there seems to be no reasonable hope for growth and development in an institute.[103] The smaller or less prosperous institute loses its identity while being absorbed into the larger one.[104]

Another type of union is the coming together of two or more institutes, all of which lose their identity to form a new institute. The institute is erected from the uniting ones with a new name and personality. This union would necessitate the structuring of governance, the drafting of proper law, and all other requisites for the formation of a new institute.[105]

In all such mergers or unions, the good of the Church, each institute, and the individual members should be the foremost concerns.[106] Such restructuring needs to address all civil and canonical issues regarding personnel, temporal goods, and apostolic works involved in the union. There should be careful remote and proximate spiritual, psychological, and juridical preparation of the members of the institutes involved, particularly when the identity of the institute is lost.[107] Individual members have the freedom to choose to belong to the new entity, to transfer to another institute, or to petition for an indult of departure from the institute with a dispensation from their sacred bonds.[108]

A federation occurs when certain institutes sharing the same nature and spirit join together for common purposes, while each institute retains its autonomy. Some examples of federations would be the congregations of Benedictine and Cistercian monasteries[109] and canons regular such as the Premonstratensians. Each of the abbeys, monasteries, or canonries retains its autonomy, while all are under a superior of the congregation who does not possess the full authority of major superiors.[110] Federations of monasteries of nuns provide mutual assistance in areas such as formation, finances, personnel transfers for reasons of health or education, and the opening of new foundations with volunteers from the respective monasteries. Several apostolic institutes of like charism, such as the Sisters of St. Joseph, have federations to foster their spirit and mutually support one another. The statutes of each federation or congregation of monasteries provide details regarding these issues.

Confederations are groupings of federations into a still larger structure. Examples of this phenomenon are the Confederation of Benedictine Monasteries and the Confederation of Canonries of St. Augustine. The confederation is composed of monastic or canonical congregations presided over [101] CCEO 439, §§1–3 provides for the erection of a federation; CCEO 440, §§2–3 provides for its suppression.

[102] PC 21–22, ES II: 39–41.
[103] PC 21, ES II: 41.
[104] CLD 6, 445–446; 7, 459–461; 8, 324–325; 9, 292–294.
[105] CLD 9, 294–295; C. Darcy, The Institute of the Sisters of Mercy of the Americas: The Canonical Development of the Proposed Governance Model (New York: University Press, 1993).

[106] ES II: 40.
[107] CLD 8, 324.
[108] Darcy, 167–170.
[109] Canon 613.
[110] Canon 620.

by a major superior with limited powers determined in the statutes of the confederation.[111] Again, there is no loss of the autonomy of the individual monastery or abbey. The formation of federations and confederations, composed of monasteries, abbeys, or canonries that share the same nature, spirit, and end, as well as the approval of their statutes are reserved to the Apostolic See. These unions enable the institutes to support one another morally through research and study of their common patrimony and spirituality, while retaining their identity and autonomy. Certain limited powers are given to the president of the federation or confederation in the statutes approved by the Apostolic See in order to give stability to the structure.

Unlike aggregation, which is described in canon 580 and its commentary, the effects of structures such as mergers, unions, federations, and confederations extend beyond the internal governance of the individual institutes. In mergers and unions, some institutes lose their original identity. In federations and confederations, there is a yielding of a limited but certain power over the institute to an authority beyond the institute. Hence, the erections of such structures are reserved to the Apostolic See.[112] The Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life recognizes the grave importance of protecting the rights of institutes and/or individual members in all such ventures. In mergers and unions, the dicastery provides certain options for members unwilling to join the new structure. Prescribed procedures must be carried out carefully to ensure justice and equity for all concerned.[113]

Matters Approved by Apostolic See

Canon 583 — Changes in institutes of consecrated life affecting those things which had been approved by the Apostolic See cannot be made without its permission.

[111] Canon 620.

[112] PB 106, par. 2.

[113] See, for example, CLD 7, 543–545; 8, 320–323; Darcy, 167–171.

This norm reflects a basic principle of law. The competent authority that erects or approves elements of an institute of consecrated life is the same authority to authorize a change in these elements or a dispensation for the institute. No inferior authority can change without permission what is reserved to the Apostolic See.[114] The inferior authority would seek the change from the higher authority. Only the Apostolic See can approve changes in the constitutions of institutes of pontifical right.[115] If the Apostolic See has intervened in any matters pertaining to the constitutions of institutes of diocesan right, the bishop of the principal seat of the institute is not competent to permit changes in those matters without the approval of the Apostolic See.[116]

In subsequent norms, there are references to various competent authorities: the Apostolic See, diocesan bishop, general chapter, supreme moderator, or other major superior. In terms of authority, diocesan bishops, general chapters, and major superiors of institutes of consecrated life are inferior to the Apostolic See. If the Apostolic See intervenes or approves certain measures for an institute of consecrated life, neither the diocesan bishop nor the internal authorities of the institute can approve or effect changes in the same without authorization from the Apostolic See.

Suppression of Institute[117]

Canon 584 — The suppression of an institute pertains only to the Apostolic See; a decision regarding the temporal goods of the institute is also reserved to the Apostolic See.

The norm shows the legislator's reverence for a gift of the Spirit given for the life and holiness of the Church as well as for the perpetual and universal nature of a public juridical person.[118] An in-[114] No bishop, for example, could make changes in mergers, unions, federations, or confederations (c. 582).

[115] Canon 587, §2.

[116] Canon 595, §1.

[117] Cf. CCEO 438, 507, 556, 566.

[118] Canons 120; 574, §1; 590, §1.

stitute of consecrated life is a gift to the universal Church with a potential for witness and service to many particular churches. Only the Apostolic See can suppress such an institute. The norm constitutes an exception to the general principle that the authority competent to erect can suppress, since a diocesan bishop cannot suppress an institute of diocesan right which he erected. Because of the extreme consequences of such an act, grave reasons are required for this course of action, e.g., few surviving members with little hope of development.[119] The suppression of an institute of consecrated life implies the cessation of its spiritual patrimony (c. 578) as well as its temporal goods.

It is rare that an institute of consecrated life gives grave scandal, deviating from its original spirit and end. In such an instance, suppression would be a penal measure. However, in most instances, an institute is no longer able to sustain itself because of a lack of vocations over a prolonged period of time. Conciliar and postconciliar documents encourage such institutes to merge or unite.[120] Besides through a formal act of suppression, an institute can cease to exist if it has remained inactive for a hundred years and there are no surviving members.[121] In all such sad and grave situations, it is important to remember the wise counsel of Pope John Paul II:

> While individual Institutes have no claim to permanence, the consecrated life itself will continue to sustain among the faithful the response of love towards God and neighbor. (Thus) it is necessary to distinguish the historical destiny of a specific Institute or form of consecrated life from the ecclesial mission of the consecrated life as such. The former is affected by changing circumstances, the latter is destined to perdure.[122]

The Apostolic See disposes of the temporal goods of the suppressed institute, even if these consist of but one house.[123] In such an instance one must attend to the proper law of the institute, its liabilities, the will of founders or donors, acquired rights, and provision for any surviving members.[124] All is to be accomplished in equity and charity with due regard for the rights of those concerned.

Suppression of Parts of Institute

Canon 585 — It belongs to the competent authority of an institute to suppress its parts.

The suppression of parts of an institute complements the provisions of canon 581 on its division, and should be included in its constitutions or fundamental law along with norms on its erection and realignment. Such internal structures of an institute would include: provinces, vice provinces, regions, and/or districts. Canon 616 provides for the suppression of houses of a religious institute. The competent authority of an institute can suppress its parts. Ordinarily, there must be a grave or very serious reason for such an action, since it has implications for the life and mission of the Church as well as for the institute. As with a suppressed house of religious,[125] concern for the pastoral needs of the people of the particular church and courtesy would prompt the major superior to be in consultation with the diocesan bishop in whose diocese the structure or part of the institute is located. The temporal goods of the suppressed part belong to the institute and are to be disposed of in accord with canon and civil law as well as the institute's proper law, the will of the founder, and any acquired rights.[126]

Autonomy of Life/Governance

Canon 586 — §1. A just autonomy of life, especially of governance, is acknowledged for individual institutes, by which they possess their own discipline

[119] PC 21, ES II: 41.
[120] PC 21, ES II: 41, c. 583.
[121] Canon 120.
[122] VC 63.
[123] Canon 616, §2.
[124] Canons 123; 1257, §1; 1258; 1300.
[125] Canon 616, §1.
[126] Canons 123, 1300.

in the Church and are able to preserve their own patrimony intact, as mentioned in can. 578.

Ecclesiastical authority reverences the gift of each approved institute of consecrated life and gives it the necessary authority to preserve and foster its patrimony as described in canon 578. This norm employs the principle of subsidiarity rooted in conciliar and postconciliar documents. Each approved institute is a public juridical person[127] witnessing gospel spirituality and contributing to the Church's mission. It enjoys a rightful autonomy of life, particularly in governance through which it orders its life and ensures proper discipline of the members. This autonomy is not absolute, since all institutes of consecrated life are subject to ecclesiastical authorities in accord with the universal law. Several norms in the universal law ensure autonomy to all institutes in accord with their particular nature, character, and purpose.[128] Autonomy applies to the internal life and governance of the institute; however, members of institutes of consecrated life are subject to diocesan bishops in matters pertaining to the care of souls, public exercise of divine worship, and other apostolic works.[129]

Superiors and chapters of institutes of consecrated life possess authority according to universal and proper law in areas of internal governance: formation, profession/incorporation, missioning members, administering temporal goods, visitation, and separation from the institute. Moreover, the universal law emphasizes the obligation of all members of each institute to preserve and foster the institute's special gift by a life of fidelity to their vocation.[130]

§2. It is for local ordinaries to preserve and safeguard this autonomy.

As pastor of the particular church, the diocesan bishop is responsible to know, respect, promote, and coordinate the vocation and mission of institutes for the good of the faithful.[131] The law obliges him and other clergy to support and assist consecrated persons, enabling them to offer their witness and service in the many spiritual and pastoral initiatives of the diocese, always remaining faithful to their proper nature and end.[132] For their part, institutes of consecrated life and their members cannot invoke autonomy in external apostolic initiatives which should always be carried out in dialogue between bishops and the competent authorities of the various institutes.[133]

Proper Law of Institute

Canon 587 — §1. To protect more faithfully the proper vocation and identity of each institute, the fundamental code or constitutions of every institute must contain, besides those things which are to be observed as stated in can. 578, fundamental norms regarding governance of the institute, the discipline of members, incorporation and formation of members, and the proper object of the sacred bonds.

This canon addresses the practical instrument through which the patrimony of an institute of consecrated life is preserved and lived. Each institute has its own proper law (ius proprium), as distinguished from the universal law and the particular law of dioceses and episcopal conferences. This proper law by which the institute is ordered consists of two parts: a fundamental code, or constitutions, and a supplementary text, or statutes.[134] Both terms are used in the canons addressing in-

[127] Canon 634, §1.

[128] Canons 580; 591; 593; 594; 596, §2; 614; 615; 732.

[129] Canon 678, §1. However, even in the external works of the institute, the bishop is obliged to respect their autonomy (cc. 674; 678, §2; 680; 681, §1; 683, §1).

[130] Canons 661, 662, 673.

[131] Canon 385.

[132] Canon 680.

[133] Canon 678, VC 49–50.

[134] Some institutes have provincial statutes or directories which determine specific applications of the constitutions and/or general statutes for the particular situation or culture. The provincial statutes are approved by the supreme moderator of the institute.

stitutes of consecrated life. The proper law serves the institute in ways that are both pedagogic and exhortatory. It teaches candidates and other externs the nature, character, and purpose of the institute; it calls members to persevere and mature in accord with the obligations they assumed at the time of incorporation into the institute.

The fundamental code (constitutions) contains the essential elements describing the patrimony of the institute[135] and the basic norms pertaining to governance, temporal goods, formation, incorporation, the proper object of the sacred bonds, and the discipline of members. Several canons in this section of the code contain elements that are to be included in this fundamental law.

Regarding governance, constitutions should describe the basic structures of governance, the convocation and membership of the general chapter, how major moderators are constituted, their terms of office, councils and how decision-making is effected, and all essential elements of local governance.

In areas of formation and incorporation, the constitutions or fundamental code should contain a description of the various stages of formation, their requirements, purpose, and length; the competent authority to admit or refuse admission to different stages; the juridical effects of temporary and perpetual or definitive profession; the nature of the sacred bonds and the rights and obligations assumed at temporary and perpetual or definitive profession.

The constitutions should contain the essential elements of the religious or secular life, key elements in living the spiritual life, and the juridical process for separation from the institute.

Regarding the administration of temporal goods, the fundamental code should include the key elements for ordinary and extraordinary administration, as well as for acts of alienation of the temporal goods of the institute.

If the canons indicate that certain elements be in accord with the constitutions, they must be placed in that fundamental code. If the canons state that the elements be in the proper law of the institute, they can be placed either in the constitutions or in the statutory section of the proper law.[136]

Institutes and their members have the obligation of obeying the canons of the code applicable to them, and there is no need to repeat these norms in the proper law of the institute. They can be implicitly included with a phrase such as "in accord with universal law," or "in accord with the norms of canon law." However, it is advisable that some canons of major importance be known by the members and added as an appendix to the constitutions of an institute of consecrated life for ready reference.[137]

§2. A code of this type is approved by competent authority of the Church and can be changed only with its consent.

The fundamental code describes the gift of the Holy Spirit to the Church and contains the essential elements through which it is preserved and developed. Therefore, its approval and any changes in it are reserved to the competent ecclesiastical authority. The initial approval of the fundamental code or constitutions takes place at the time of the erection of the institute of consecrated life. The Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life approves the constitutions of an institute of pontifical right (an institute erected or approved by the Apostolic See)

[135] Canon 578.

[136] For an outline of canons that belong in the constitutions or in either the constitutions or statutes of an institute of consecrated life, see J. Hite, "Canons That Refer to the Constitutions and Proper Law of Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life," in A Handbook on Canons 573–746 (hereafter Hite, Handbk), ed. J. Hite, S. Holland, and D. Ward (Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1985) 371–381.

[137] For example, major superiors and vocation directors involved in interviewing or admitting candidates to the institute should be aware of the invalidating impediments to admission to the novitiate (c. 643, §1). Major superiors should know when the consent or advice of the council is required in the universal law. A good summation of the latter can be found in Hite, Handbk, 392–398.

and confirms any changes legitimately introduced into them.[138] The diocesan bishop of the principal seat of the institute has this same competence for an institute of diocesan right (an institute erected by a diocesan bishop) except in matters in which the Apostolic See has intervened.[139] If the members of the institute want to modify the constitutions, a two-thirds vote of the general chapter[140] is needed, and the petition for the change together with the recommended revised text is presented to the competent ecclesiastical authority.

Dispensations from the proper law depend on the nature of the law and the authority with the right to dispense. If the dispensation is from a norm of the universal law, it would be petitioned of the Apostolic See;[141] in the case of institutes of diocesan right, the diocesan bishop can grant the dispensation from the constitutions in a particular case.[142]

Major superiors of clerical religious institutes and societies of apostolic life of pontifical right are ordinaries for their members;[143] they can dispense from disciplinary laws, both universal and proper for their members, if it is difficult to make recourse to the Holy See and there is danger of grave harm in delay. This also applies to those dispensations reserved to the Holy See, provided the dispensation is one which the Holy See customarily grants in similar circumstances without prejudice to canon 291.[144] It is always good to study the text of the approved constitutions; many permit superiors to grant dispensations in routine matters.[145]

§3. In this code spiritual and juridic elements are to be joined together suitably; nevertheless, norms are not to be multiplied without necessity.

This paragraph reflects the first of the basic principles that guided the coetus in revising the universal law on consecrated life.[146] It is difficult to discuss a divine vocation in purely juridical terms without introducing spiritual elements that express a life totally dedicated to God. Recognizing this, the legislator requires that, in the formulation of the fundamental code or constitutions of an institute of consecrated life, the spiritual nature of the vocation be respected. Juridical norms fall short of describing the inspiration and spirit of the founder. However, the fundamental code is a juridical text that contains the essential elements of the vocation. Clarity, precision, and economy should be the hallmarks of the fundamental code; unnecessary norms should not be part of this document. Some institutes include pertinent canons in the appendix of the fundamental law or constitutions for easy referral.

§4. Other norms established by competent authority of an institute are to be collected suitably in other codes and, moreover, can be reviewed appropriately and adapted according to the needs of places and times.

There are norms in proper law that, while not as essential as constitutive elements, are nevertheless necessary for the harmonious ordering of the institute. Institutes have general statutes or directories with norms that follow from and determine more specific applications of the fundamental code. Often provinces of institutes have provincial statutes providing for particular provinces of the institute in a variety of cultures and geographic locations. The general chapter approves and enacts general statutes for the entire institute; provincial chapters approve and promulgate provincial statutes for the province. These same bodies can interpret, modify, or abrogate the norms they enact. Provincial statutes formulated or modified by the provincial chapter must be approved by the su-

[138] Canon 593.
[139] Canon 595, §1.
[140] Canon 631, §1.
[141] Canons 593; 595, §1.
[142] Canon 595, §2.
[143] Canon 134.
[144] Canon 87, §2.
[145] B. Gangoiti, "The Power of Major Superiors to Dispense from Common Laws and from the Laws of Their Own Institute," Con Lif 15/1 (1990) 85–99.

[146] ComCICRec, Schema of Canons on Institutes of Life Consecrated by Profession of the Evangelical Counsels (Draft) (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1977) xiii.

preme moderator of the institute in accord with its proper law.

In addition to having juridical texts, many institutes of consecrated life have formularies or books of prayer, spiritual exercises, traditions, and customs indigenous to the institute. While not legal texts, these books are revered in the institute and reflect its sound traditions.

Clerical/Lay Institutes

Canon 588 — §1. By its very nature, the state of consecrated life is neither clerical nor lay.

Although they are described as "clerical" or "lay," institutes of consecrated life are neither clerical nor lay in essence. Rather, Christian faithful from both the clerical and lay states inspired by the Holy Spirit are drawn to a particular charism, consecrated to God through the profession of the evangelical counsels, and serve the mission of the Church.[147]

The Clerical Institute[148]

§2. That institute is called clerical which, by reason of the purpose or design intended by the founder or by virtue of legitimate tradition, is under the direction of clerics, assumes the exercise of sacred orders, and is recognized as such by the authority of the Church.

An institute is said to be clerical if, in accord with the design of the founder and/or legitimate tradition, it meets the following criteria: (1) it is under the supervision of clerics, (2) it assumes the exercise of sacred orders, and (3) it is recognized as such by ecclesiastical authority.[149] The Society of Jesus (Jesuits) and the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer (Redemptorists) are examples of clerical institutes. Many clerical institutes have lay brothers who had not been permitted to hold office in the institute. Conciliar and postconciliar documents provided that brothers take a more active part in the life and governance of the clerical institute and be eligible for certain offices.[150] However, the offices of superior and vicar were reserved to clerics.[151]

Deacons as well as priests are clerics.[152] If a member of a clerical institute wishes to remain a permanent deacon and there is no provision in the proper law, the general chapter would petition for such a provision to be included in the constitutions of the institute.[153]

The Lay Institute

§3. That institute is called lay which, recognized as such by the authority of the Church, has by virtue of its nature, character, and purpose a proper function defined by the founder or by legitimate tradition, which does not include the exercise of sacred orders.

An institute is called lay if, in accord with the purpose of the founder and/or legitimate tradition, it meets the following conditions: (1) the end or function of the institute does not include the exercise of sacred orders and (2) it is recognized as lay by ecclesiastical authority. All institutes of women and brothers are lay institutes. Conciliar

[147] LG 43; c. 207, §2.

[148] CCEO 505, §3; 554, §2.

[149] This is more descriptive than CIC 488,4° where the distinction seemed to be based on the number of clerics in the institute.

[150] PC 15, ES II: 27.

[151] Gradually, brothers were permitted to be local superiors by rescript. See CLD 7, 467–471; 8, 342–343; 9, 341, 346. In one reported case, an OFM Cap. brother was permitted to be vice-provincial. The rescript required that a priest be designated by name to carry out acts of jurisdiction requiring orders (CLD 10, 106–107). See W. Woestman, "De Institutis Clericalibus Vitae Consecratae et Superioribus Non Clericis," ME 110 (1985) 411–420.

Subsequent to the 1994 synod of bishops on consecrated life, Pope John Paul II established a special commission to study the issues surrounding the concept of "mixed institutes" (VC 61).

[152] Canon 207, §1.

[153] Paul VI, mp Sacrum diaconatus ordinem 32, June 18, 1967, AAS 59 (1967) 697. See CLD 6, 583–584.

teaching permitted general chapters of institutes of brothers to decide if some members could be admitted to orders, while the lay character of the institute remained intact.[154] In such institutes, admission to orders would be regulated by the code[155] and the proper law of the institute. While some institutes of brothers have availed themselves of this provision, others have not, e.g., the Brothers of the Christian Schools.

Competent ecclesiastical authority decides the clerical or lay status of the institute after a study of its nature, spirit, and purpose when the institute is approved and erected as a public juridical person in the Church.

At present, there is an interesting discussion regarding this norm as institutes review their founders' original inspiration and design. St. Francis desired that the members of his institute, both clerical and lay, would be brothers with equal rights and obligations. Some members describe the Franciscan Order as a "mixed institute." The issue is being studied by a special commission in Rome and by individual Franciscan institutes to determine how best to describe and live the original inspiration.[156]

Institute of Pontifical/Diocesan Right[157]

Canon 589 — An institute of consecrated life is said to be of pontifical right if the Apostolic See has erected it or approved it through a formal decree. It is said to be of diocesan right, however, if it has been erected by a diocesan bishop but has not obtained a decree of approval from the Apostolic See.

Institutes of consecrated life have their own proper autonomy,[158] but it is not absolute. They are subject to ecclesiastical authority in accord with their pontifical or diocesan right status in those internal matters of governance and discipline which exceed the competence of legitimate authority within the institute.[159]

An institute erected or approved through a formal decree by the Apostolic See is an institute of pontifical right. Some diocesan right institutes petition for pontifical right status after significant growth in personnel and expansion into several dioceses. Institutes of pontifical right are immediately subject to the Apostolic See in internal matters exceeding the competence of the authority within the institute. The Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life and the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples have authority over institutes of pontifical right.[160]

A diocesan right institute is erected by a diocesan bishop[161] and has not sought and obtained a decree of approval as a pontifical institute from the Apostolic See. The diocesan bishop of the principal see of the institute would be competent in those concerns of internal governance and discipline exceeding the competence of the legitimate superiors within the institute. Institutes of diocesan right remain under the special vigilance of the diocesan bishop in several matters.[162]

The authority of ecclesiastical superiors should not be confused with that of the competent internal superiors of the institute. An institute of consecrated life enjoys a rightful autonomy of life, particularly of governance.[163] Ecclesiastical authorities respect and safeguard this autonomy given to institutes to protect and develop their proper gifts and would address only those matters which extend beyond the competence of internal authority, i.e., the approval of changes in the fundamental code[164] and serious matters such as sub-

[154] PC 10, CLD 7, 135–136.
[155] Canon 1019.
[156] See note 151; PC 15; prop. 10, VC 61.
[157] Cf. CCEO 413; 434; 505; 554, §2; 563, §2.
[158] Canon 586.
[159] Canons 593, 594. See also c. 732.
[160] PB 90, 108. Religious institutes of the Eastern churches sui iuris are subject to the CEC.
[161] Canon 579.
[162] Canons 625, §2; 628, §2, 2°; 637; 638, §4; 688, §2; 700.
[163] Canon 586; V. Koluthara, Rightful Autonomy of Religious Institutes (Rome: CHS, 1994).
[164] Canon 587, §2.

stantial alienations of temporal goods[165] or definitive departures from the institute.[166]

Subjection to Supreme Authority

Canon 590 — §1. Inasmuch as institutes of consecrated life are dedicated in a special way to the service of God and of the whole Church, they are subject to the supreme authority of the Church in a special way.

This norm attests to the ecclesial and universal character of each institute in that it is a special gift of the Spirit for the life and holiness of the Church.[167] As public juridic persons, institutes of consecrated life belong at the very heart of the Church and have a special relationship with the Roman Pontiff and the college of bishops. A diocesan bishop seeks the nihil obstat of the Apostolic See before he erects an institute of consecrated life.[168] The authority possessed by competent authority within these institutes (superiors and chapters) comes from God through the ministry of the Church.[169] Only the Apostolic See can suppress an institute of consecrated life, whether it be of pontifical or diocesan right.[170]

§2. Individual members are also bound to obey the Supreme Pontiff as their highest superior by reason of the sacred bond of obedience.[171]

The pope possesses supreme, full, immediate, and universal ordinary power in the Church which he can always freely exercise.[172] While all of the Christian faithful are subject to him, members of institutes of consecrated life are subject to him as their ecclesiastical superior in a special way through their bond of obedience. While it would be rare, the pope can command members of institutes of consecrated life to do something within the context of their proper law. Likewise, he can delegate his authority to one of the congregations of the Roman curia.[173] In the constitutions of the Society of Jesus, provision is made for some members to profess a fourth vow of obedience to the pope regarding their mission.[174] Religious consecrated bishops remain religious, but they are subject to the pope alone by reason of their vow of obedience.[175]

Exemption of Institutes[176]

Canon 591 — In order to provide better for the good of institutes and the needs of the apostolate, the Supreme Pontiff, by reason of his primacy in the universal Church and with a view to common advantage, can exempt institutes of consecrated life from the governance of local ordinaries and subject them to himself alone or to another ecclesiastical authority.

While institutes of consecrated life enjoy autonomy in life and governance, they do not act independent of church authority. From earliest times, popes secured the autonomy of monasteries in granting them exemption or protection in their internal life from interference by bishops. Gradually, religious orders and even some congregations were exempt or attached to the Apostolic See, particularly regarding their apostolic activity.[177] Popes were careful to note that this exemption, while providing for the general good of the Church, did not preclude the obedience of religious to bishops in their exercise of episcopal authority.

[165] Canon 638, §§3–4.
[166] Canon 691, §2.
[167] LG 44, VC 29.
[168] Canon 579.
[169] Canons 618, 631.
[170] Canon 584.
[171] Cf. CCEO 412, §1; 555; 564.
[172] Canon 331.

[173] These congregations act in the pope's name and by his authority (c. 360). CICLSAL has competence for institutes of consecrated life (PB 105–111); CEP enjoys competence over missionary societies of apostolic life (PB 90, par. 2).
[174] Gambari, 117, fn. 13.
[175] Canon 705.
[176] Cf. CCEO 412, §2.
[177] See CIC 488, §2; 615; 618, §1.

Conciliar teaching on the Church as communio, the greater authority given diocesan bishops in the particular churches, and the jurisdiction given to all major superiors of clerical religious institutes and societies of apostolic life of pontifical right have greatly mitigated the importance of exemption.[178] In his concern for the universal Church and by reason of his supreme authority, the pope can remove an institute of consecrated life and its members from the authority of diocesan bishops and subject them to himself alone.[179] However, many provisions once reserved to exempt institutes are now applicable to all clerical institutes of pontifical right.[180] Therefore, it is difficult to explain the nature of exempt institutes. There seems little distinction between exempt clerical institutes and clerical institutes of pontifical right. Exemption refers primarily to the internal ordering of institutes of consecrated life, since all institutes are subject to the governance of diocesan bishops in the care of souls, the public exercise of divine worship, and other works of the apostolate.[181]

Pope John Paul II encourages religious to a fruitful and ordered ecclesial communion:

> It is helpful to recall that, in coordinating their service to the universal Church with their service to the particular Churches, Institutes may not invoke rightful autonomy, or even the exemption which a number of them enjoy, in order to justify choices which actually conflict with the demands of organic communion called for by a healthy ecclesial life. Instead, the pastoral initiatives of consecrated persons should be determined and carried out in cordial and open dialogue between Bishops and Superiors of the different Institutes. Special attention by Bishops to the vocation and mission of Institutes and respect by the latter for the ministry of Bishops, with ready acceptance of their concrete pastoral directives for the life of the Diocese, these are two intimately linked expressions of that one ecclesial charity by which all work to build up the organic communion—charismatic and at the same time hierarchically structured—of the whole People of God.[182]

Communion with Apostolic See[183]

Canon 592 — §1. In order better to foster the communion of institutes with the Apostolic See, each supreme moderator is to send a brief report of the state and life of the institute to the Apostolic See, in a manner and at a time established by the latter.

This canon obliges the supreme moderator of an institute of consecrated life to make brief periodic reports on the state of the institute in order that communion with the Apostolic See be preserved and strengthened. The norm implicitly shows the responsibility of the Apostolic See to remain informed of the institutes through these reports.

Until 1967, the institute's report was extremely detailed and had to be sent to Rome every five years.[184] In a circular letter in 1988, the Congregation for Religious and Secular Institutes advised the supreme moderators of institutes of consecrated life and societies of apostolic life that the report presented to the general chapter by the general council could be sent to that dicastery in a more [178] LG 45; CD 35, par. 3; and AG 30. For an explanation of the principle of exemption, see J. Huels, "The Demise of Religious Exemption," J 54 (1994) 40–55; and idem, "What Became of Exemption?" Conference of Major Superiors of Men Forum 66 (Spring, 1994) 8–16.

[179] CD 35, 3–4; ES I: 22–40; AG 30; and MR 22.

[180] Canons 134; 397, §2; 596, §2; etc.

[181] Canon 678, §1.

[182] VC 49.

[183] Cf. CCEO 419. In the Eastern churches the report is sent every five years to the authority to which the institute is immediately subject. Superiors of institutes of eparchial or patriarchal right send a copy of the report to the Apostolic See.

[184] CLD 7, 479–480.

concise form. If the general chapter did not take place every five or six years, the report was still to be sent to the congregation every six years.[185] Both the canon and the letter address the supreme moderator; there is no mention of this obligation for the superior of an autonomous monastery or house. The periodic report should contain information on: statistics regarding members, houses, and provinces; the government, discipline, and life of the institute; programs for vocations and formation; experience of common life and the apostolate; financial condition and voluntary or involuntary separations from the institute.[186]

§2. The moderators of every institute are to promote knowledge of documents of the Holy See which regard the members entrusted to them and are to take care about their observance.

Moderators of institutes have the obligation to promote knowledge of the documents of the Holy See which affect the members entrusted to them and to be concerned about their observance. In some institutes, these documents were read aloud along with the constitutions during certain seasons.[187] The provision assists moderators in fostering the vocations of those entrusted to them. Today, many members have easier access to ecclesial documents in their institute's libraries or in places of apostolic service. After the Second Vatican Council, moderators of institutes of consecrated life initiated programs of renewal and adaptation in keeping with conciliar teachings. John Paul II's apostolic exhortation Vita consecrata[188] is an example of a document on consecrated life that moderators and other members should read and implement.[189]

Apostolic See/Pontifical Right Institutes[190]

Canon 593 — Without prejudice to the prescript of can. 586, institutes of pontifical right are immediately and exclusively subject to the power of the Apostolic See in regards to internal governance and discipline.

The autonomy[191] accorded each institute through which it orders its life and protects its patrimony pertains to the internal life of the institute but is not absolute.[192] Institutes of pontifical right are subject to the Apostolic See regarding internal matters that extend beyond the competence of moderators governing the institute.[193] This norm applies also to societies of apostolic life,[194] and there are several examples of such accountability in the law.[195]

Diocesan Bishop/Diocesan Right Institutes[196]

Canon 594 — Without prejudice to can. 586, an institute of diocesan right remains under the special care of the diocesan bishop.

Institutes of diocesan right likewise have a rightful autonomy of life in internal matters, but they remain subject to the diocesan bishop in those matters which exceed the competence of internal authorities. Bishops are ecclesiastical authorities, not internal moderators of institutes. They should not interfere in those affairs clearly prescribed for the moderators of the institute in [185] AAS 80 (1980) 104–107.

[186] Ibid.; c. 704.
[187] CIC 509, §2, 1°.
[188] The apostolic exhortation can be found in Origins 25/41 (April 4, 1996) 681, 683–719.
[189] This norm applies also to societies of apostolic life. See c. 732.

[190] Cf. CCEO 413.
[191] Canon 586, §1.
[192] All institutes are subject to the diocesan bishop in matters concerning divine worship, care of souls, and apostolic works (c. 678, §1). See CD 35, 4; AG 30; ES I: 22–40; MR 52–53; VC 49. See also V. Koluthara, Rightful Autonomy of Religious Institutes.
[193] PB 108.
[194] Canon 732.
[195] Canons 583; 584; 587, §2; 638, §3; 684, §5; 686, §1; 686, §3; 691, §2; 700; 727, §1; 729; 730; 732; 741; 743; 744, §2; 746.
[196] Cf. CCEO 413.

universal or proper law. The code offers several examples of the authority of bishops regarding diocesan institutes.[197]

Bishop/Principal Seat of Institute[198]

Canon 595 — §1. It is for the bishop of the principal seat to approve the constitutions and confirm changes legitimately introduced into them, without prejudice to those things which the Apostolic See has taken in hand, and also to treat affairs of greater importance affecting the whole institute which exceed the power of internal authority, after he has consulted the other diocesan bishops, however, if the institute has spread to several dioceses.

An institute of diocesan right enjoys a relationship with the diocesan bishop of its principal seat (generalate) which is parallel to that of the relationship of an institute of pontifical right with the Apostolic See. The diocesan bishop approves the constitutions of the institute of diocesan right once he receives the nihil obstat[199] for its erection from the Apostolic See. He also approves any modifications in this fundamental code recommended by a two-thirds vote of the general chapter of the institute.[200] The exception here would be in any matter in which the Apostolic See has intervened.

The diocesan bishop of the principal seat of the institute addresses issues of greater importance affecting the entire institute which exceed the power of its competent authority, after consulting with the other diocesan bishops where the institute has spread.[201] This latter provision respects both the universal character of the institute and the importance of consultation with the bishops in dioceses where the religious give witness and serve.[202]

§2. A diocesan bishop can grant dispensations from the constitutions in particular cases.

A dispensation is the relaxation of an ecclesiastical law in a particular case.[203] It would seem that the norm does not refer to ordinary matters of discipline which the proper law leaves to the judgment of the competent moderator. Likewise, it does not apply to the universal law for consecrated life, but to the norms of the constitutions. A dispensation is given in a particular case;[204] if it affects the entire institute, then it would seem that the diocesan bishop of the principal seat of the institute would dispense from it.

Internal Authority of Institutes[205]

Canon 596 — §1. Superiors and chapters of institutes possess that power over members which is defined in universal law and the constitutions.

An approved institute of consecrated life enjoys internal autonomy to govern itself and protect its patrimony. The universal law and the proper law of the institute describe the nature and the limits of this power. Superiors and chapters of institutes of consecrated life and societies of apostolic life possess ecclesiastical power of governance within the limits of universal and proper law. This ecclesiastical power is public authority given by the Church and carried out in its name.[206]

[197] Canons 628, §2, 2°; 637; 638, §4; 686, §3; 688, §2; 691, §2; 700; 727, §1; 729; and cc. 732, 741, 746 regarding societies of apostolic life.

[198] Cf. CCEO 414; 554, §2; 566.

[199] PB 106, 1; c. 579.

[200] The bishop of the principal seat of the institute also presides at the election of the supreme moderator of the institute (c. 625, §2).

[201] The bishops of the dioceses where the houses of an institute are located have certain responsibilities toward the houses and members. See cc. 628, §2, 1°–2°; 637; 638, §4; 686, §3; 688, §2; 691, §2; 700; 727, §1; 729; 732; 741, §1; 746.

[202] This norm applies also to societies of apostolic life of diocesan right (cc. 732, 734).

[203] Canon 85.

[204] Canon 87.

[205] Cf. CCEO 441, §1; 511, §1; 557.

[206] CLD 3, 119; CLD 6, 425–433; cc. 617–640, 717, 732, 734.

Superiors and chapters of institutes can bind members with general or particular norms, insist on their implementation, and admonish offending members (c. 618). The competent superiors of institutes admit to the novitiate and profession, provide for formation, appoint to offices and apostolates, monitor the life and discipline of the institute, administer temporal goods, and process voluntary and involuntary separation from the institute. This norm recognizes and supports the autonomy of institutes in their internal life and governance. Canons 617–640 address the internal governance of religious institutes; canon 717, of secular institutes; canons 732 and 734, of societies of apostolic life. The constitutions of an institute should clearly define the nature and extent of the power of the superiors and chapters at each level of government.

§2. In clerical religious institutes of pontifical right, however, they also possess ecclesiastical power of governance for both the external and internal forum.[207]

The second section of this norm follows from canon 129, §1. Superiors and chapters of clerical religious institutes of pontifical right also possess ordinary executive power or jurisdiction for both the internal and external forum for their members.[208] The same is true for superiors of clerical societies of apostolic life of pontifical right.[209] Superiors and chapters of clerical secular institutes of pontifical right are not included in this norm, since the members of these institutes are incardinated into the dioceses they serve. Only in very few cases are members incardinated into the secular institute by apostolic indult.[210]

§3. The prescripts of cann. 131, 133, and 137–144 apply to the power mentioned in §1.

This section of the canon applies the norms governing the exercise of the executive power of governance or jurisdiction to superiors and chapters mentioned in canon 596, §1. The canons describe ordinary (proper or vicarious) and delegated power of governance (c. 131), the use of delegated power (c. 133), the delegation and subdelegation of ordinary executive power and its interpretation (cc. 137–138), the effects of approaching higher authority (c. 139), the provisions for several persons delegated in the same manner (cc. 140–141), and the cessation or suspension of the power (cc. 142–143). Canon 144 addresses jurisdiction supplied by the Church (Ecclesia supplet) in cases of common error and positive and probable doubt. There are many unresolved questions and continuing discussion on the nature of the exercise of the ecclesiastical power of governance by lay persons. Developments in this area of law will surely affect the role of authority in lay institutes of consecrated life.[211]

[207] Cf. CCEO 441, §2; 511, §2; 557.

[208] In the former code (CIC 198, §1; 501), only superiors and chapters of clerical exempt religious institutes had ecclesiastical jurisdiction in accord with the code and their constitutions. Paul VI in Cum admotae, November 6, 1964, extended ecclesiastical jurisdiction to superiors general of clerical religious institutes, clerical societies of apostolic life, and clerical secular institutes of pontifical right with regard to their ordained subjects incardinated in the institute. See CLD 6, 147–153.

In the present code, the major superiors (c. 620) of clerical religious institutes of pontifical right and major superiors of clerical societies of apostolic life of pontifical right are ordinaries for their own subjects (c. 134, §1).

[209] Canon 732.

[210] Canon 266, §3; see also c. 715.

[211] There is much discussion about the exercise of jurisdiction by lay persons in the Church based on c. 129, §2, which provides that lay persons can cooperate in the exercise of ecclesiastical governing power. See, for example, J. Beal, "The Exercise of Jurisdiction by Lay Religious," Bulletin on Issues of Religious Law 13 (Winter, 1997) 1–6; also idem, "The Exercise of the Power of Governance by Lay People: State of the Question," J 55/1 (1995) 1–92; J. Pfab, "The Right and Duty of the Superior General to Intervene in Certain Matters," Con Lif 11/1 (1986) 84–97; J. Provost, "The Participation of the Laity in the Governance of the Church," Stud Can (1983) 417–449.

Qualifications for Admission[212]

Canon 597 — §1. Any Catholic endowed with a right intention who has the qualities required by universal and proper law and who is not prevented by any impediment can be admitted into an institute of consecrated life.

This canon provides the essential elements for admission to all institutes of consecrated life and societies of apostolic life.[213] Each institute and society is unique and often prescribes other more specific requisites or qualities for admission in its proper law. Admission presupposes a response to a divine call, the grace to make a total dedication of self in praise of God and service in the Church.[214] It is left to the competent authorities in keeping with the provisions of universal and proper law to judge the person's suitability for consecrated life. Subsequent canons[215] and the proper laws of the respective institutes and societies have more detailed provisions to assist those making this determination.

The person must be a Catholic, one who has been baptized in or received into the Catholic Church, sharing the same faith, sacraments, and ecclesiastical governance.[216] Proofs of Catholicity will be certificates of baptism and confirmation.[217] If a person from another Catholic church sui iuris requests admission to a religious institute of the Latin church, the person can licitly be admitted with permission of the Apostolic See.[218] If the person leaves the institute, he or she returns to the rite of the church of baptism.

The person must have the right intention. Right intention or motivation refers to the reason that brought the person to request admission to the institute. The ideal intent is to offer a total gift of oneself in service to God and others in accord with the spirit and mission of the institute. The person may not yet have reached this level of spiritual maturity, but the qualities of faith, generosity, and selflessness should certainly be present in response to the question, "What prompted you to enter this institute?" Often, the best incentive for a person is the witness of a member of the institute; the candidate desires to emulate such a life of dedication.

The person being admitted must have the requisite qualities in universal and proper law. Subsequent canons on admission to institutes and societies as well as the pertinent proper laws will address the qualities of health, suitable disposition, and sufficient maturity.[219] These qualities can, if necessary, be established by the use of experts in the medical field and behavioral sciences with due regard for privacy and the reputation of the candidate.[220] Such qualities should be considered in view of the particular nature of the institute.[221]

The person can be prevented from admission by impediments set down in the universal or proper law. Canons 643, §1; 721, §1; and 735, §2 address invalidating impediments for admission to institutes and societies in the universal law. Proper law can set down other invalidating impediments.[222] Requirements for licit admission to an institute of consecrated life that are set forth in universal law are addressed subsequently in this commentary.[223]

§2. No one can be admitted without suitable preparation.

[212] Cf. CCEO 448–449; 517, §1; 518.
[213] Canon 732.
[214] LG 42; PC 1; ET 1, 4.
[215] Canons 641–645, 720–721, 735.
[216] Canon 205.
[217] Canon 645, §1.
[218] This procedure, called "accommodation," is not addressed in the Latin code, but is provided for in CCEO 451; 517, §2. Permission can be obtained from the apostolic nuncio.

[219] Canons 642; 721, §3; 735, §§1–2
[220] Canons 642, 220.
[221] Canons 642; 735, §2.
[222] Canons 643, §2; 721, §2.
[223] Canons 644–645; 721, §2; 735, §2. See also Congregation for Catholic Education/Seminaries, "Instruction on Admitting Candidates Coming from Other Seminaries or Religious Communities," Origins 26/22 (November 14, 1996) 358–360.

The norm leaves to the proper law of individual institutes the norms for the preparatory period before a person begins the canonical formation period in the life of the institute or society. The format and duration of this initial preparation should be ordered in keeping with the nature and end of the institute or society, as well as the needs of the candidate. Christian principles, a deeper knowledge of Christ, liturgical prayer, and the spiritual tradition of the institute should be included in this important time of preparation.[224]

Observance of Proper Law

Canon 598 — §1. Each institute, attentive to its own character and purposes, is to define in its constitutions the manner in which the evangelical counsels of chastity, poverty, and obedience must be observed for its way of living.

The evangelical counsels of chastity, poverty and obedience are of the very essence of consecrated life.[225] Canon 587, §1 and this norm oblige each institute and society in which the members embrace the counsels to prescribe in its fundamental code or constitutions the proper object and manner of living the public vows or other sacred bonds in accord with the nature and spirit of the institute. The next three canons will provide the essential elements or what is applicable to all institutes and societies in which the members embrace the three counsels by vow or other sacred bond. The content of these norms should be incorporated into the constitutions. However, in accord with the nature, spirit, and purpose of the institute, there are other specifics with regard to the way poverty or obedience may be lived in particular institutes. The canon shows the importance of the constitutions in protecting the patrimony of the institute and in guiding the members in the following of Christ, chaste, poor, and obedient, in accord with the particular nature of the institute.

§2. Moreover, all members must not only observe the evangelical counsels faithfully and fully but also arrange their life according to the proper law of the institute and thereby strive for the perfection of their state.[226]

Members assume the evangelical counsels and accept the obligations of their call as described in the proper law of the institute. That is why from the very beginnings of the formative process they are introduced to the law of the institute. Profession is made in a particular institute and according to its constitutions.[227] This clearly shows their obligations and protects them from arbitrary commands of superiors contrary to proper law. They are obliged to live in accord with the proper law of the institute. The constitutions approved by competent ecclesiastical authority contain essential elements regarding the evangelical counsels and other responsibilities assumed with membership in the institute. Through these fundamental norms, the members order their lives in striving for the perfection of charity according to the patrimony and traditions of the institute.[228]

The Evangelical Counsels

Canons 599–601 contain norms regarding the three evangelical counsels of chastity, poverty, and obedience. Societies of apostolic life in which the members embrace the counsels by a sacred bond defined in the constitutions are also bound by these canons.[229] Each institute and society provides more specific norms in its constitutive law [224] PI 42–44. While these directives are for formation in religious institutes, they are also helpful to those involved in formation work in secular institutes and societies of apostolic life. VC 65–68.

[225] LG 41–47, PC 12–14, c. 573. In religious institutes, the members make profession of the counsels by public vows (cc. 607, §2; 654). In secular institutes and societies of apostolic life the constitutions determine the kind of bond (cc. 712; 731, §2).

[226] Cf. CCEO 426.

[227] Canon 654.

[228] Canons 578; 587, §1.

[229] Canons 731, §2; 732.

for the living of the evangelical counsels in accord with the nature, spirit, and purpose of the institute or society.

Chastity

Canon 599 — The evangelical counsel of chastity assumed for the sake of the kingdom of heaven, which is a sign of the world to come and a source of more abundant fruitfulness in an undivided heart, entails the obligation of perfect continence in celibacy.

All Christians are obliged to live chaste lives in accord with their vocations. Through the profession of evangelical chastity, a person in imitation of Christ sacrifices marriage and those acts pertaining to the marriage state for the sake of the kingdom. The evangelical counsel of chastity obliges a person to live a celibate life in perfect continence.[230] This counsel assumed for the sake of the kingdom frees the heart for greater love of God and people, enables a wholehearted dedication to the apostolate of the institute, and challenges a hedonistic culture.[231]

Unlike poverty and obedience, evangelical chastity admits of no degrees or gradations. General instructions on admission to institutes and policies of institutes of consecrated life help in determining candidates who can live a chaste, celibate lifestyle. Proper laws encourage members in the values of prayer, self-discipline, health care, and supportive friendships as means of persevering in their commitment.[232]

[230] This is true likewise for clerics (c. 277, §1) with the exclusion of permanent married deacons.

[231] PC 12, VC 88.

[232] PC 12; PI 13. Persons bound by a public perpetual vow of chastity in a religious institute invalidly attempt marriage (c. 1088). Such an action would lead to the incurring of certain penalties, e.g., cc. 694, §1, 2°; 194, §1, 3°, 1394, §§1–2. Members of secular institutes and societies of apostolic life would be dismissed from their respective institutes (cc. 729, 746). There are penalties for other offenses against the counsel of chastity, e.g., cc. 695; 696, §1; 1395.

Poverty

Canon 600 — The evangelical counsel of poverty in imitation of Christ who, although he was rich, was made poor for us, entails, besides a life which is poor in fact and in spirit and is to be led productively in moderation and foreign to earthly riches, a dependence and limitation in the use and disposition of goods according to the norm of the proper law of each institute.

All Christians are called to poverty of spirit inspiring them to share their goods and resources with the less fortunate of the world.[233] Those who assume the evangelical counsel of poverty imitate Christ and commit to a life that is poor in fact as well as in spirit.[234] They are obliged to labor in accord with the nature and ends of the institute and in dependence on the institute.[235] Both the universal law and the proper law of the institute regulate the limits, use, and disposition of their temporal goods.[236]

Besides the individual witness given by members through their personal lives, collective witness to evangelical poverty is given by institutes of consecrated life.[237] It should be noted that this is evangelical poverty rooted in the nature of the institute and willed by the members in imitation of Christ and for the mission of the Church. It is not the poverty of destitution experienced by so many persons deprived of the basic necessities of life and a poverty which Christ and his Church strive to eliminate.

Unlike the counsel of chastity, poverty admits of a wide variety of expressions in accord with the nature, spirit, and purpose of each institute. The effects and obligations of a vow of poverty made in a religious institute with common life can differ significantly from those assumed in a secular institute with a more individualized lifestyle.

[233] Acts 2:44–45; 4:32–35.

[234] 2 Cor 8:9; PC 13.

[235] Canon 670.

[236] PC 13; cc. 668; 712; 722, §2; 732; 741, §2.

[237] Canons 634, §2; 635, §2; 640; 718.

Likewise, the juridical effects of the vow of poverty made in a contemplative institute may differ from those of the vow of poverty made in an apostolic institute.

The various apostolates of institutes of consecrated life witness to the dignity of human labor and the life of service to which the members are called. While education, health care, and social services are traditional apostolates, frequently members of institutes work in other areas to alleviate hunger, ignorance, sickness, unemployment, and the deprivation of basic liberties. Often, too, from their own resources they help provide for those in such circumstances. By their example and teachings, some institutes and their members encourage respect for natural resources and challenge others to reduce consumption through greater simplicity of life and the curbing of wants.[238]

Obedience

Canon 601 — The evangelical counsel of obedience, undertaken in a spirit of faith and love in the following of Christ obedient unto death, requires the submission of the will to legitimate superiors, who stand in the place of God, when they command according to the proper constitutions.

Christ's obedience to the Father's will even to his death on the cross is a central mystery of the Christian life and the motivating force for the sacred bond of obedience.[239] Imitating Christ's love of God's will, members of institutes of consecrated life are to submit their wills in a spirit of faith and love to legitimate superiors who receive their authority from God through the ministry of the Church.[240] In a spirit of service and concern for the members, superiors give commands in accord with the universal law and the proper constitutions of the institute.[241] Thus, authority and obedience practiced in institutes of consecrated life reflect the Father's love of Christ and Christ's obedience to the Father.

Sharing a charism or gift of the Spirit, those in authority and other members of the institute are to seek God's will in a spirit of peace, love, unity, and concern for the good of the Church, the institute, and each member. However, this searching ceases with the decision of the superior, who is indispensable in every community. Even small or satellite communities should have a superior vested with personal authority to whom the members are accountable. There is no provision in law for communities without superiors or for "team governance."[242]

The authority entrusted to the superior by the Church is not absolute. The superior must always respect the human dignity of the member, conform to universal and proper law, and exercise authority in a spirit of charity. The member should know when he or she is commanded by virtue of the vow or bond in a grave matter.[243] In obeying the commands of superiors, members live in a spirit of faith and in imitation of Christ who always did the Father's will. Their way of life testifies to the truth that there is no contradiction between obedience and freedom.[244]

Communion of Life

Canon 602 — The life of brothers or sisters proper to each institute, by which all the members are united together as a special family in Christ, is to [238] PC 13, PI 14, VC 89–90, c. 640.

[239] PC 14.

[240] PC 14, c. 618.

[241] PC 14, ES II: 18. Canon 590, §2 recognizes the Supreme Pontiff as the highest superior of members of institutes of consecrated life whom they are bound to obey by reason of their sacred bond of obedience.

[242] ET 25; VC 43, 92; c. 618. See also CICLSAL, instr Fraternal Life in Community, Congregavit nos in unum Christi amor (FL), February 2, 1994, Origins 23/40 (March 24, 1994) 693, 695–712, esp. 47–53, 58–64.

[243] It should be made very clear to the member that he or she is being commanded by virtue of the vow of obedience. Also, all formalities have to be fulfilled by the superior in order to command by virtue of the vow, e.g., the issuance of a canonical warning commanding in the name of obedience. The constitutions should indicate clearly which superiors can give such commands. A formal canonical warning is given in writing or before two witnesses to a member for a grave offense. See cc. 697, §2; 729; 746.

[244] PC 14, PI 13, VC 91.

be defined in such a way that it becomes a mutual support for all in fulfilling the vocation of each. Moreover, by their communion as brothers or sisters rooted and founded in charity, members are to be an example of universal reconciliation in Christ.

The norm addresses fraternal life (vita fraterna) as distinguished from life in community or the canonical common life prescribed for religious institutes.[245] Members of institutes share their baptismal life and a gift of the Holy Spirit which unites them as a family in Christ. Their love and concern for one another witness to the mystery of the ecclesial communion in which the Trinity dwells. Through mutual support they carry out the purpose of their institute and manifest the "reconciling power of grace which overcomes the divisive tendencies present in the human heart and in society."[246]

This communion in love is evident not only in religious and secular institutes, but also in societies of apostolic life where members live common life. Hermits, consecrated virgins, widows and widowers in their generous response to the gifts of the Spirit witness Christ's love for His Father and all humanity.[247]

Eremitical Life[248]

Canon 603 — §1. In addition to institutes of consecrated life, the Church recognizes the eremitic or anchoritic life by which the Christian faithful devote their life to the praise of God and the salvation of the world through a stricter withdrawal from the world, the silence of solitude, and assiduous prayer and penance.

Paragraph one describes the eremitical or anchoritic[249] life which traces its roots to the third century and the desert fathers such as Paul and Anthony. This ancient form of consecrated life marked the beginnings of monasticism in the Church. Men and women experienced the call to live in the solitude of silence, prayer, fasting, and penance in love of God and intercession for the world. They witness the sublime vocation of being always with the Lord.[250]

The norm does not address the eremitical lifestyle provided for in the proper law of some religious institutes such as the Carthusians, Camaldolese, and Carmelites. Professed members of these institutes live as hermits under obedience to their legitimate superiors in accord with their proper law.[251] Rather, it addresses solitary men or women living under the authority of a diocesan bishop.

§2. A hermit is recognized by law as one dedicated to God in consecrated life if he or she pub-

[245] Members of religious institutes ordinarily live together in a house of the institute, share its resources, receive support from the institute, and are missioned to an apostolate in the name of the institute. See cc. 607, §2; 665; 668, §3; 670; 678, §2. Members of societies of apostolic life are also obliged to live common life in accord with their proper law (c. 740).

[246] VC 41.

[247] PC 15, VC 42. While VC 42 includes widows and widowers, there is no norm for consecrated widows and widowers in the Latin code. However, canon 570 of the Eastern code permits particular law of sui iuris churches to provide for consecrated widows.

[248] Cf. CCEO 481–485. The five canons in the Eastern code describe the hermit as a perpetually professed member of a monastery sui iuris who, with the permission of and subject to the superior, gives himself/herself over totally to contemplation and lives the eremetical life in accord with the typicon or proper law of the monastery.

[249] While the terms are used interchangeably, the term "anchorite" applies to a solitary living near and provided for by a community of the faithful, or a religious living the eremitical lifestyle in accord with the norms of the proper law under the authority of the competent superior.

[250] LG 43, PC 1, VC 7.

[251] The 1977 draft of this canon (c. 92, §2) recognized a hermit as one who professed the three evangelical counsels stabilized by vow and observed his/her proper rule of life under the guidance of the local ordinary or a competent religious moderator. The Eastern code provides for religious as hermits in cc. 481–485. Solitaries who are not religious and live such lives in accord with the particular law of a sui iuris church are called ascetics in the Eastern code (CCEO 570).

licly professes in the hands of the diocesan bishop the three evangelical counsels, confirmed by vow or other sacred bond, and observes a proper program of living under his direction.[252]

Paragraph two of the norm provides the juridical norms for this form of consecrated life. A person publicly professes chastity, poverty, and obedience by means of a vow or other sacred bond in the hands of the diocesan bishop.[253] Likewise, he or she lives a plan of life approved by the bishop and under his direction. The diocesan bishop may delegate another, e.g., the vicar for religious, to monitor the hermit.

One contemplating an eremitical lifestyle should follow the counsel of a wise and experienced spiritual director. The qualities required for admission to an institute of consecrated life can be applied to this vocation.[254] It would seem within the competence of the diocesan bishop to dispense from the vow or other sacred bond of the hermit,[255] or to dismiss the hermit from this form of consecrated life for a grave reason.[256]

Order of Virgins*[257]

Canon 604 — §1. Similar to these forms of consecrated life is the order of virgins who, expressing the holy resolution of following Christ more closely, are consecrated to God by the diocesan bishop according to the approved liturgical rite, are mystically betrothed to Christ, the Son of God, and are dedicated to the service of the Church.

Both men and women lived consecrated virginity in the early Church. The practice led to the formulation of a solemn rite in the Roman Pontifical which constituted the candidate a sacred person, a sign of the Church as Bride of Christ, and an eschatological witness of the world to come.[258] Gradually, only certain orders of contemplative nuns used the ancient solemn rite within the context of their profession ceremonies.[259] The Constitution on the Liturgy ordered the revision of the rite which was published on May 31, 1970.[260] The diocesan bishop may consecrate nuns and women living in the world under the following conditions:

> nuns: a) that they have never married nor lived in public or flagrant violation of chastity; b) that they have made their final profession, either in the same rite or on an earlier occasion; c) that their religious family uses this rite because of long-established custom or by new permission of the competent authority.

> women living in the world: a) that they have never been married nor lived in public or flagrant violation of chastity; b) that by their age, prudence, and universally attested good

[252] Cf. CCEO 484.

[253] While the term "public vows" is used only in c. 607, §2, describing a religious institute, it would seem that vows made by a hermit in the hands of the diocesan bishop meet the description of c. 1192, §1. However, the hermit's perpetual vow of chastity is not a diriment impediment to marriage (c. 1088).

[254] Canon 597.

[255] The diocesan bishop is competent to grant an indult of departure to members of institutes of consecrated life. See cc. 691, §2 and 727, §1.

[256] H. MacDonald, "Hermits: The Juridical Implications of Canon 603," Stud Can 26 (1992) 163–189; R. McDermott, "Recent Developments in Consecrated Life," Bulletin on Issues of Religious Law 9 (Fall, 1993) 1–9.

[257] Cf. CCEO 570.

[258] OrConVir 1.

[259] Despite the ancient beginnings of consecrated virginity, in 1927 the Sacred Congregation for Religious refused the request of bishops for the faculty to consecrate women living in the world as virgins (CLD 1, 266). However, by 1950, diocesan bishops and Benedictine abbots in the U.S. could confer the consecration of virgins on Benedictine sisters of simple perpetual vows (CLD 4, 166–168). This faculty extended the provision in art. III.3 of the apconst Sponsa Christi of Pope Pius XII (November 21, 1950) which reserved the ancient solemn rite of the consecration of virgins for nuns (CLD 3, 234).

[260] SC 80; SCDW (May 31, 1970), AAS 62 (1970) 650; CLD 7, 421–425. The revised rite provides only for women, but par. 34 of the instrumentum laboris for the 1994 synod of bishops raised the possibility of this form of life for men.

character they give assurance of perseverance in a life of chastity dedicated to the service of the Church and of their neighbor; c) that they be admitted to this consecration by the bishop who is the local ordinary.[261]

The rite further indicates that it is for the bishop to decide on the conditions under which women living in the world are to undertake a life of perpetual virginity.[262] While they make no profession of the evangelical counsels, a life lived in the spirit of the evangelical counsels is implied. Through their sanctum propositum or sacred resolution they consecrate their chastity for love of Christ and in service to the Church. Their consecration is received through the ministry of the diocesan bishop.[263] These women resolve to live celibate, chaste lives in perfect continence and are dedicated to the service of the Church in their respective dioceses. The ritual provides for the giving of the veil and ring in accord with local custom.

§2. In order to observe their own resolution more faithfully and to perform by mutual assistance service to the Church in harmony with their proper state, virgins can be associated together.

Virgins can offer mutual support to one another in their sacred resolution and service to the Church through associations. This is not obligatory for a consecrated virgin, and the norm is not referring to community life[264] of institutes of consecrated life nor the common life lived by members of religious institutes and societies of apostolic life.[265]

New Forms of Consecrated Life[266]

Canon 605 — The approval of new forms of consecrated life is reserved only to the Apostolic See. Diocesan bishops, however, are to strive to discern new gifts of consecrated life granted to the Church by the Holy Spirit and are to assist promoters so that these can express their proposals as well as possible and protect them by appropriate statutes; the general norms contained in this section are especially to be utilized.

The norm shows the openness of the Church to recognize the gifts of the Spirit that contribute to its life and holiness. New forms of consecrated life would be forms distinct from those already approved by the Apostolic See and described in this section of the code.[267] Only the Apostolic See can approve new forms and give them juridical status.[268] For example, secular institutes as a form of consecrated life were approved in 1947.[269] Diocesan bishops assist the Apostolic See in discerning the vitality and authenticity of such gifts in their respective churches. The general norms in this section of the code (cc. 573–606) serve as guides to the bishops in this process. Also, the pope has set up a commission to deal with questions relating to new forms of consecrated life and [261] OrConVir 3–5.

[262] Ibid., 5.

[263] The code does not provide for the consecration of widows as does CCEO 570. Nothing would prohibit a widow from making a private vow of perpetual chastity as a sign of the kingdom of God, devoting herself to prayer and the service of the Church. Decisions such as this should always be made after serious prayer, reflection, and the counsel of an experienced spiritual director.

[264] Canon 602.

[265] German Bishops' Pastoral, "Consecrated Virgins in the World," trans. R. Barringer, Canadian Catholic Review (January 1988) 17–19; A. Jiminez, "El Ordo 'Virgenes Consagradas' a la luz del Codigo vigente," ComRelMiss 75 (1994) 221–242; D. Pichard, "The Renewal of the Consecration of Virgins," RfR (January/February 1986) 17–24; A. Selvaggi, "An Ancient Rite Restored—Consecrated Virgins Living in the World," Canadian Catholic Review (January 1987) 6–11.

[266] Cf. CCEO 571.

[267] The forms of consecrated life approved by the Church are hermits (c. 603), religious institutes (c. 607, §2), and secular institutes (c. 710). The order of virgins (c. 604, §1) and societies of apostolic life (c. 731, §1) are described in law as "approaching" (accedunt) consecrated life. This distinction seems to be made because a profession of the three evangelical counsels is not required for these vocations.

[268] VC 12.

[269] Pius XII, apconst Provida Mater Ecclesia, February 2, 1947, AAS 39 (1947) 114–124.

to determine criteria to assist diocesan bishops in discerning them.[270]

History teaches that new forms do not supplant the former ones, but often evolve from them. They are yet another way of following the chaste, poor, and obedient Christ in striving for perfect charity.[271] It is important that such new forms possess the essential theological and canonical elements proper to consecrated life as described in this section of the law.[272]

Canon 606 — Those things which are established for institutes of consecrated life and their members are equally valid in law for either sex, unless it is otherwise evident from the context of the wording or the nature of the matter.

This norm reflects one of the principles directing the labors of the committee in revising the 1917 code. The code treats institutes of men and women equally, unless the nature of the matter or some particular situation warrants otherwise. While the former code contained the same norm,[273] there is greater equality achieved in the present law. For example, the diocesan bishop or his delegate no longer presides at the elections of women's institutes of pontifical right, nor does he interview women candidates before their admission to religious profession.[274]

The norms do make distinctions between clerical and lay institutes and diocesan and pontifical right institutes. The provisions for the cloister of contemplative nuns in canon 667, §§3–4 seem somewhat discriminatory, since the nuns cannot provide for cloister in accord with the nature and end of their institute. Also, the diocesan bishop permits entrance and egress from these sui iuris monasteries of nuns.[275] The bishops at the 1994 synod addressed cloister for nuns[276] and proposed to the Supreme Pontiff that more authority be given major superiors of nuns in granting dispensations from enclosure for just and sufficient reasons.[277] In response, the pope assured a study of cloister which would consider the many forms and degrees of monastic and contemplative life.[278]

TITLE II
RELIGIOUS INSTITUTES
[cc. 607–709]

In title II, 103 canons address religious institutes, one form of consecrated life. The title begins with an introductory canon describing the nature and purpose of the religious vocation and religious institutes. The title then is divided into six chapters on religious institutes: (1) the organizational structure of a religious institute in a particular church, (2) the institute's internal governance and the administration of temporal goods, (3) the admission of candidates and formation of members, (4) the obligations and rights of institutes and members, (5) the apostolates of institutes, and (6) the separation of members. Two final chapters consider a religious named bishop and the conferences of major superiors.

Nature/End of Religious Life[279]

Canon 607 — §1. As a consecration of the whole person, religious life manifests in the Church a wonderful marriage brought about by God, a [270] Prop. 13, VC 62. See also J. Galante, "Consecrated Life: New Forms and New Institutes," CLSAP (1986) 118–125; R. McDermott, "Recent Developments in Consecrated Life"; A. Neri, "Nuove forme di vita consacrata (can. 605–CIC): Profili giuridici," ComRelMiss 75/3–4 (1994) 253–308.

[271] VC 12.

[272] Ibid.

[273] CIC 490.

[274] R. McDermott, The Legal Condition of Women in the Church: Shifting Policies and Norms (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1979).

[275] Canon 667, §§3–4.

[276] ES II, 30–31; PC 7, 16; VS VI.

[277] Canon 667, §4; prop. 22, VC 59.

[278] VC 59, par. 5.

[279] CCEO 410 gives a theological description of the religious state which is similar to the description of religious life in c. 607.

sign of the future age. Thus the religious brings to perfection a total self-giving as a sacrifice offered to God, through which his or her whole existence becomes a continuous worship of God in charity.

Paragraph one contains a theological description of religious life, one form of consecrated life. In making profession of the evangelical counsels, the religious offers a total self-donation to God in order to derive even more fruit from the grace of baptism. The entire life of the religious becomes a continuous worship of God and service to his people in love. Religious life witnesses to Christ's love for his Church and foreshadows the future kingdom.[280] Besides giving canonical status to religious life, the Church sets it forth liturgically as a state of consecration to God. It receives the vows of religious,[281] intercedes for them in its public prayer, bestows on them a spiritual blessing, and associates their self-offering with the sacrifice of the Eucharist.[282] Living the fullness of the gospel through the profession of the evangelical counsels, religious offer a witness to the Church far exceeding any apostolic service.[283] While there are essential elements in this consecration, each institute further expresses it in accord with its own nature, spirit, and end.[284]

Religious Institute: Juridical Elements[285]

§2. A religious institute is a society in which members, according to proper law, pronounce public vows, either perpetual or temporary which are to be renewed, however, when the period of time has elapsed, and lead a life of brothers or sisters in common.

Paragraph two provides the juridical elements of a religious institute. It is a society, an organized group of persons with a special nature, spirit, and end. When canonically erected, a religious institute becomes a public juridical person.[286] The members of a religious institute (1) profess public vows and (2) live community life in common as brothers or sisters.

1. Public Vows

A vow is a deliberate and free promise made to God concerning a possible and better good which must be fulfilled by reason of the virtue of religion.[287] A public vow is a vow accepted in the name of the Church by a legitimate superior.[288] There are requirements in the code for the validity and liceity of religious profession which will be discussed in subsequent canons.[289] The law no longer distinguishes between solemn and simple vows in religious institutes. Canons 599–601 contain the essential elements of the evangelical counsels; the effects of profession are described in the constitutions of each institute.

Members of religious institutes are required to make temporary vows for the time defined in the proper law.[290] Temporary profession pre-280 LG 44; PC 12; ET 13; VC 26, 84.

281 Canons 656, 5°; 658.

282 LG 45; VC 8–9.

283 LG 44; c. 673.

284 CDW, "Rite of Religious Profession" (February 2, 1970) in The Rites of the Catholic Church, vol. 2 (Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1991) 199–297. See esp. 204, par. 4.

285 Cf. CCEO 410.

286 Canons 116; 634, §1. See cc. 579, 589 for the beginnings and approval of religious institutes.

287 Canon 1191, §1. Public vows constitute both temporary and perpetual religious profession. RC permitted institutes to substitute promises or another form of bond in place of temporary profession. See SCRIS, instr. Renovationis causam, January 6, 1969, AAS 61 (1969) 103; CLD 7, 487–508. However, John Paul II ruled against this proposed provision and it was excluded from the 1980 schema. (Sec. of State, August 12, 1980, Prot. no. 41829). Secular institutes and some societies of apostolic life assume the counsels by vows or other sacred bonds defined in the constitutions (cc. 712; 731, §2).

288 Canon 1192, §1.

289 Canons 656, 658, 668. The proper law of the institute can posit other requirements.

290 Canon 655. The time in temporary vows may not be less than three years nor more than six years. In a particular case, the competent superior in accord with the proper law can extend the period of temporary profession, but sumes the right intention on the part of the religious of moving toward perpetual or definitive profession.

Final profession in a religious institute may be in the form of perpetual vows or perpetually renewed vows. No matter which form, the profession is perpetual or definitive, i.e., for life. In institutes where the members perpetually renew temporary vows, the constitutions should state clearly the time at which the member is definitively incorporated into the institute.[291]

2. Common Life

Besides the fraternal/sisterly life described in canon 602, members of religious institutes are obliged to common life. It is left to the proper law of the institute to describe the way common life is lived in accord with the nature of the institute. Some elements of the common life can be found in canon 665, §1 (residence in a house of institute), canons 668, §3 and 670 (sharing resources), and canon 669 (common habit or style of dress). Members of institutes dedicated to contemplation share this hidden apostolate (c. 674). Institutes dedicated to works of the apostolate have works proper to the institute, i.e., works which derive from the very nature and purpose of the institute (c. 675, §1). Members are missioned in the name of the institute (cc. 671, 682). The Eucharist is the central focus of the local community of all religious institutes (cc. 608, 934, §1, 1°) and the members share communal prayer (c. 663, §2).

Public Witness[292]

§3. The public witness to be rendered by religious to Christ and the Church entails a separation from the world proper to the character and purpose of each institute.

Consecrated and sent forth to carry on Christ's mission, religious are intimately concerned for and involved in the world, yet separated from it by their public witness of the chaste, poor, and obedient Christ.[293] It is precisely this witness that sets religious apart from worldly values and achievements which are often antithetical to Christian life and the nature and purpose of their institutes.[294] Religious live a common life of prayer and mutual support in chaste celibacy, labor, and dependence on the institute. They sacrifice personal goals for the goals of the institute in service to the Church. These values challenge the promiscuity, hedonism, and individualism often prevalent in society.[295]

CHAPTER I
RELIGIOUS HOUSES AND THEIR ERECTION AND SUPPRESSION
[cc. 608–616]

Religious institutes enjoy a universal character; their members witness and serve wherever the mission of the Church extends. In reality, however, houses are situated and members serve within a particular church. This chapter addresses the constitution and erection of houses of a variety of religious institutes, the rights and responsibilities accorded the houses and their members, the apostolic works within the particular church, the suppression of erected houses, and the disposition of their temporal goods.

the entire time spent in temporary vows may not exceed nine years (c. 657, §2).

[291] The code does not explicitly describe perpetually renewed temporary vows. But the two forms of final profession can be implicitly recognized in cc. 623; 1019, §1; and 1052, §2. The time for definitive profession is left to the proper law of the institute and should be stated in the constitutions.

[292] Cf. CCEO 410.

[293] The traditional fuga mundi or flight from the world has taken on a more nuanced meaning since the teachings of the Second Vatican Council, particularly Gaudium et spes. Apostolic religious labor among the people of God and witness the values of their vowed lives. Cloistered religious embrace the world in hiddenness through prayer and penance (LG 46; PC 7; AG 40; VC 8; cc. 673–675).

[294] PC 24; c. 673.

[295] VC 45.

Constituted House[296]

Canon 608 — A religious community must live in a legitimately established house under the authority of a superior designated according to the norm of law. Each house is to have at least an oratory in which the Eucharist is to be celebrated and reserved so that it is truly the center of the community.

This norm addresses a constituted house as distinct from a canonically erected house as described in canon 609.[297] Many houses of religious such as faculty houses, parish convents, rectories, residences for religious in hospital or social service ministries are constituted houses. More than one house or community of religious can be constituted within a larger building; often satellite houses are constituted within the generalate or provincialate. At times, large faculty houses accommodate the religious of two or more religious institutes. The elements necessary for a constituted house are the following:

1. The house must be legitimately constituted by the competent authority in accord with the proper law of the institute. Often such houses are established in response to the needs of a particular apostolate or to those of members engaged in addressing diversified apostolates in a given area. Courtesy, good mutual relations, and a possible future need for sacred ministers would prompt the superior to advise the diocesan bishop and the pastor of the parish in which the house is located.

2. The religious community lives under the authority of a superior designated according to the norm of law. In the case of small or satellite communities,[298] the members may be accountable to a provincial or regional superior. In larger communities, a local superior resides in the house possessing personal authority in accord with canon 618 and the proper law of the institute.

3. The house is to have an oratory in which the Eucharist is celebrated and reserved as the center of the community. This right is congruent with the obligations of religious institutes and their members.[299] The Eucharist is the center of the community. The local ordinary has the responsibility of examining the suitability of the place and the arrangement provided for the oratory in houses of lay religious institutes; the competent major superior in accord with the proper law designates the place for clerical religious institutes of pontifical right.[300] While this right should not be denied religious, reverence for the Eucharist warrants serious consideration both on the part of the local ordinary and the major superior in situations where care and safety may present difficulty.

Erected House[301]

Canon 609 — §1. Houses of a religious institute are erected by the authority competent according to the constitutions, with the previous written consent of the diocesan bishop.

Once a house is canonically erected, the law gives it juridical personality[302] with all of the rights and obligations pertaining to public juridical persons unless limited by the proper law of the institute. Often, it is the generalate or provincialate of an institute which is canonically [296]There does not seem to be an equivalent norm in the Eastern code.

[297]See S. Holland, "'Religious House' according to Canon 608," J 50 (1990) 524–552.

[298]ET 40–41. At times, two or three religious live in common and serve one or more apostolates.

[299]Canons 662; 663, §2.

[300]Canons 134, §1; 1223; 1224. A religious should be designated to care for the oratory, and the Eucharist should be celebrated there at least twice a month (c. 934, §2).

[301]CCEO 436, §2 and 509, §1, providing for the erection of dependent or filial monasteries and houses of orders and congregations, are similar to c. 609, §1.

[302]Canons 634, §1; 116, §2.

erected.[303] The bishop gives previous consent through a written decree which would seem to be a condition for validity. The competent authority to erect the house should be named in the constitutions or fundamental code. An erected house of the institute has greater stability than the residences or faculty houses constituted for an apostolic need. Here, too, good mutual relations and the need for sacred ministers on the part of lay religious would prompt the superior to advise the pastor of the parish in which the house is located.

Erection of Monastery of Nuns[304]

§2. In addition, the permission of the Apostolic See is required to erect a monastery of nuns.

In the case of a monastery of nuns, the permission of the Apostolic See is also required before its erection. These monasteries are sui iuris in character or autonomous. Therefore, it would seem that there is concern regarding the ability of the monastery to fulfill the requirements to be addressed in the next canon. The permission of the Apostolic See would precede the consent of the diocesan bishop. However, the bishop or his delegate should thoroughly investigate the potential of the monastery to sustain itself before presenting the petition to the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life.

Usefulness to Particular Church

Canon 610 — §1. The erection of houses takes place with consideration for their advantage to the Church and the institute and with suitable safeguards for those things which are required to carry out properly the religious life of the members according to the proper purposes and spirit of the institute.

A public juridic person is by its nature perpetual.[305] Concerns for its usefulness to the particular church and the institute should be seriously considered by the diocesan bishop and the major superior before the canonical erection of a house takes place. The norm shows the essential requisites to erect a house. The religious institute does not need to own the building in which the religious house is canonically erected. Besides the usefulness of the house, the community and each member must have those things necessary for the living out of their lives in accord with the nature and end of the institute. Practical measures of sufficient members, financial resources, and the availability of appropriate apostolate(s) ensure the stability of the house, the care of the members, and the ability to carry on the life and works of the institute. The perpetuity of a canonically erected house distinguishes it from the house that is constituted in order to accommodate a specific pastoral need, e.g., a parochial school.

Provision for Members

§2. No house is to be erected unless it can be judged prudently that the needs of the members will be provided for suitably.

Both the diocesan bishop who gives his written consent and the major superior who erects the house in accord with the constitutions of the institute must study thoroughly its viability. Sufficient members, an apostolate that addresses the needs of the people, the presence and work of other religious in the area, support of the members, and availability of sacred ministers are some considerations to be taken into account in determining this viability. Since the house will become a public juridic person with rights and obligations, prudence and justice to both the particular church and the institute would require that the members have the essentials necessary to live in accord with the nature, spirit, and end of the institute.

[303] At times major superiors request the consent of the bishop required for a canonically erected house, since the juridical status of the house has implications for chapter delegates and temporal goods in the constitutions of the institute.

[304] CCEO 434 provides for the erection of monasteries sui iuris by the Apostolic See (pontifical right), the patriarch (patriarchal right), and the eparch (eparchial right).

[305] Canon 120, §1.

Rights Flowing from Consent of Diocesan Bishop

Canon 611 — The consent of the diocesan bishop to erect a religious house of any institute entails the right:

1° to lead a life according to the character and proper purposes of the institute;

The diocesan bishop's consent to erect a house assures the following rights:

Members have the right to live their life in accord with the character and purpose of their institute.[306] This provision in law assures the autonomy of the institute.[307] The norm is in keeping with canon 610, §1 regarding the establishment of religious houses.

2° to exercise the works proper to the institute according to the norm of law and without prejudice to the conditions attached to the consent;[308]

Members have the right to engage in works proper to their institute in accord with canon law and the law of the institute. Works proper to the institute would be those that derive from its very nature, spirit, and end.[309] It may be that, in giving his consent, the diocesan bishop indicates specific works in keeping with the pastoral needs of the diocese. The religious would then be limited to performing those works. They would need to seek the consent of the bishop to perform other apostolates even though proper to the institute.[310]

3° for clerical institutes to have a church, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1215, §3 and to perform sacred ministries, after the requirements of the law have been observed.[311]

Members of a clerical institute[312] have the right to a church, but the diocesan bishop must agree to the site.[313] This is a practical provision, inasmuch as the church of the religious may interfere with a parish church or may not be necessary. Often clerical religious are entrusted with a parish church, and waive this right. Clerics of these institutes have the right to carry out sacred ministries in accord with the law. They would need faculties for hearing confessions[314] and for assisting at marriages.[315] Any requirements of particular law with regard to preaching[316] and liturgical laws[317] should be observed, as well as respect for parochial functions.[318] It is important that the consent of the bishop be most clear regarding any conditions or limitations placed on the works proper to a religious institute.

Change(s) in Apostolic Works[319]

Canon 612 — For a religious house to be converted to apostolic works different from those for which it was established, the consent of the diocesan bishop is required, but not if it concerns a change which refers only to internal governance

[306] This right would include the right to have the reservation of the Blessed Sacrament (cc. 608; 934, §1, 1°). In lay religious institutes, the local ordinary would examine the construction and arrangement (cc. 1223–1224).

[307] Canon 586, §1.

[308] Cf. CCEO 437, §1; 509, §2. Written permission of the eparchial bishop is required in the case of any monastery for the construction and opening of schools, guest-houses, or similar buildings distinct from the monastery (c. 437, §2).

[309] Canons 675, §1; 677, §1; CCEO 437, §1; 509, §2.

[310] Canons 381, §1; 383; 678, §1.

[311] Cf. CCEO 437, §1; 509, §2.

[312] Canon 588, §2. The norm includes clerical institutes of diocesan right.

[313] Canon 1215, §3.

[314] Canons 966, §1; 969, §1.

[315] Canon 1108, §1.

[316] Canon 764; 772, §1.

[317] Canon 678, §1.

[318] Canon 530.

[319] Cf. CCEO 437, §3; 509, §2.

and discipline, without prejudice to the laws of the foundation.

This norm follows from canon 611, 2° and protects two values already established in the code. It respects the authority of the diocesan bishop in his pastoral care of the people of the diocese.[320] It also assures the rightful autonomy of religious in their internal life and governance.[321] It is important to know the conditions attached to the consent of the diocesan bishop to erect a religious house.[322] If the bishop gives his consent to erect a house without any conditions attached, the religious have the right to exercise all works proper to the institute. An attitude of courtesy and a concern for good mutual relations would prompt advising the bishop of the apostolic activity of the institute and of any changes subsequent to his initial consent. Such decisions have implications for the pastoral care of the diocese for which the bishop is responsible. If the bishop gave his consent to erect the house only for the apostolate of teaching, then his consent would have to be obtained to change this work or to initiate another work proper to the institute. For example, if the religious decided to initiate a soup kitchen in this house for the poor of the area, they would need the bishop's consent.

It is different if the change involves the internal life or discipline of the institute. For example, if the religious institute decides to move its novitiate house or villa for senior members to the house under discussion, there is no need to procure the consent of the diocesan bishop. This alteration pertains to the internal life and discipline of the institute. Again, an attitude of courtesy and concern for good relations would prompt notifying the bishop of this change in the internal life of the religious house. Such internal changes often necessitate the services of a confessor or chaplain, and the major superior petitions the diocesan bishop for a sacred minister.

[320] Canons 383; 678, §1.
[321] Canon 586, §1.
[322] Canon 611, 2°.

Houses of Canons Regular and Monks[323]

Canon 613 — §1. A religious house of canons regular or of monks under the governance and care of its own moderator is autonomous unless the constitutions state otherwise.

Houses of canons regular and monks enjoy a tradition of autonomy with their own moderator as major superior, unless the fundamental code determines otherwise.[324] These autonomous houses of male religious often unite in congregations or confederations[325] with limited authority given to an abbot primate or moderator in accord with the statutes.[326]

Moderator of Autonomous House[327]

§2. The moderator of an autonomous house is a major superior by law.

The moderator of an autonomous house is a major superior by law.[328] In autonomous clerical houses of pontifical right, the moderator is an ordinary.[329] While the abbot primate or superior of a monastic congregation or confederation is comparable to a major superior, he would not have all the power which universal law grants to major superiors. It would be necessary to study the statutes of the respective congregation or confederation in order to determine his limited authority as first among equals.

Aggregation of Monastery of Nuns[330]

Canon 614 — Monasteries of nuns associated to an institute of men maintain their own way of life

[323] Cf. CCEO 433, §2.
[324] Canons 613, §2; 620.
[325] Canon 582.
[326] Canon 620.
[327] Cf. CCEO 418, §1.
[328] Canon 620; the canon provides that the vicars of these moderators are also major superiors.
[329] Canon 134, §1.
[330] There does not seem to be a canon similar to this norm in the Eastern code.

and governance according to the constitutions. Mutual rights and obligations are to be defined in such a way that spiritual good can come from the association.

This norm applies to monasteries of nuns, women religious with solemn vows.[331] Many of these monasteries are autonomous; others are joined together as a monastic congregation under a major superior. Many monasteries of nuns associate or aggregate with monasteries of men of the same institute, e.g., Passionists, Carmelites, Poor Clares, Benedictines, Cistercians, Norbertines, Dominicans, Carthusians. At times, as explained in the commentary on canon 580, these bonds involve more than spiritual affiliation.

It is clear from the present norm that the monasteries of nuns enjoy the autonomy of life and governance assured to all religious in canon 586, §1. The constitutions or documents in each case provide norms that describe the association and enable it to be mutually enriching. At times, monasteries of men provide confessors, chaplains, spiritual guides, and professors who assist the nuns in initial and ongoing formation as well as in other areas of religious life. Through mutual efforts these men and women religious enhance the patrimony and wholesome traditions they share.

Sui Iuris Monastery[332]

Canon 615 — An autonomous monastery which does not have another major superior besides its own moderator and is not associated to another institute of religious in such a way that the superior of the latter possesses true power over such a monastery as determined by the constitutions is entrusted to the special vigilance of the diocesan bishop according to the norm of law.

This canon applies for the most part to monasteries of nuns, although there could be isolated monasteries of men. The monasteries do not belong to a monastic or canonical congregation of monasteries with centralized authority and a superior with limited power. This provision in the universal law for such a sui iuris monastery, i.e., the vigilance of the diocesan bishop, protects the rights of the members and renders the superior of the monastery accountable for his/her actions.

Such monasteries enjoy a just autonomy of life and governance.[333] Canon 609, §2 requires the permission of the Apostolic See for the erection of these monasteries. Most are of pontifical right, immediately and exclusively subject to the authority of the Apostolic See in internal discipline and governance,[334] as well as for approval of, changes in, and dispensations from their constitutions.[335] The moderator of a sui iuris monastery is a major superior;[336] there is no accountability to a higher superior. The vigilance of the diocesan bishop in no way interferes with the true authority of the moderator, but affords a certain monitoring of the more important government activities such as elections, religious discipline, finances, egress, departure, and dismissal.[337]

Suppression of House[338]

Canon 616 — §1. The supreme moderator can suppress a legitimately erected religious house according to the norm of the constitutions, after the diocesan bishop has been consulted. The proper law of the institute is to make provision for the goods of the suppressed house, without prejudice

[331] CIC 488, 7°. The 1983 code does not distinguish between solemn and simple profession. The constitutions of religious institutes provide for the effects of the vow of poverty; the public perpetual vow of chastity in a religious institute is a diriment impediment to marriage (c. 1088).

[332] Cf. CCEO 433, §2.

[333] Canon 586.

[334] Canon 593.

[335] Canon 587.

[336] Canon 620.

[337] The following canons show the vigilance of the diocesan bishop: cc. 625, §2; 628, §2, 1°; 637; 638, §4; 667, §4; 688, §2; 699, §2.

[338] CCEO 510 requires prior consultation with the eparchial bishop for the validity of the suppression of a house of an order or congregation.

to the intentions of the founders or donors or to legitimately acquired rights.

The norm addresses the suppression of a canonically erected religious house.[339] This act is reserved to the supreme moderator in accord with the provisions of the constitutions. The constitutions may require the consent of the council in such an important matter. It would be important that the law distinguish clearly between the suppression of a canonically erected house[340] which this norm addresses and the withdrawal of members from a constituted house of the institute.[341] The latter is not an act of suppression, since a constituted house is not a juridic person. Withdrawal of the members could be effected by another major superior, e.g., a provincial superior, in accord with the proper law.

In most instances, suppression and/or withdrawal are not enviable tasks, inasmuch as such decisions necessarily weaken the vitality of the institute and limit its contribution to the mission of the particular church. A shortage of members and financial difficulties often prompt such action. The diocesan bishop is to be consulted before the decision is made, but his displeasure or opposition to the suppression does not impede the action of the supreme moderator who is obliged to act for the good of the institute. In such instances a concern for the people of God and mutual relations with the bishop would prompt the supreme moderator in case of suppression or competent major superior in case of withdrawal to give ample advance notice. The diocesan bishop bears the responsibility for the care of souls of the diocese and he would need to assess the situation. Since this norm addresses a public juridical person, all provisions in Book V regarding ecclesiastical goods,[342] as well as civil law, the will of the founders, the donors, and all vested rights are to be observed. The proper law of the institute should make provisions for the allocation of the temporal goods of a suppressed house.[343]

Suppression of Only House[344]

§2. The suppression of the only house of an institute belongs to the Holy See, to which the decision regarding the goods in that case is also reserved.

A house of the institute is normally distinguished from the institute.[345] The suppression of its only house would seem to terminate the life and activity of the institute. For this reason, the suppression pertains to the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life, since it is equivalent to suppressing the institute. The congregation reserves the right to determine what is to be done with the temporal goods in such a case. The care of the surviving members of the institute is of primary concern. Likewise, attention must be given to all of the issues mentioned in the first paragraph of this norm in accord with Book V on temporal goods[346] and the pertinent civil law.

Suppression of Autonomous House[347]

§3. To suppress the autonomous house mentioned in can. 613 belongs to the general chapter, unless the constitutions state otherwise.

[339] Canon 609.
[340] Ibid.
[341] Canon 608.
[342] Canon 1257.

[343] Canon 123.
[344] CCEO 510, 507. The Apostolic See suppresses the only house of an order and disposes the property. The Apostolic See or the patriarch within the territorial boundaries of the matriarchal church can suppress the only house of a congregation of patriarchal or eparchial right after consultation with interested parties and with the consent of the permanent synod and of the Apostolic See.
[345] Canon 584, §1.
[346] Canon 1257, §1.
[347] CCEO 438 provides for the suppression of sui iuris or filial pontifical, patriarchial, and eparchial right monasteries as well as subsidiary monasteries and for the disposition of property.

The suppression of a self-governing house described in canon 613 should be provided for in the constitutions. If there is no such provision, the general chapter[348] decides. Since there is no mention of the disposition of the temporal goods, it would seem the constitutions should provide for such. If not, the general chapter would do so in keeping with all that is required with regard to the disposition of the goods of a public juridical person.

Suppression of Sui Iuris Monastery of Nuns[349]

§4. To suppress an autonomous monastery of nuns belongs to the Apostolic See, with due regard to the prescripts of the constitutions concerning its goods.

[348] Canon 631, §1.
[349] CCEO 438, §2.

An autonomous monastery of nuns cannot be erected without the permission of the Apostolic See.[350] Although the monastery remains under the vigilance of the diocesan bishop,[351] the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life reserves the right to suppress such a sui iuris monastery. The constitutions should provide for its temporal goods. In the absence of such, the Apostolic See would provide. The welfare of the surviving nuns is to be safeguarded. Furthermore, the norms in Book V on ecclesiastical goods, provisions of civil law, as well as the will of founders and donors and invested rights are to be observed.

[350] Canon 609, §2.
[351] Canon 615.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bibliographical material for canons 573–616 can be found after the commentary on canon 746.

CHAPTER II
THE GOVERNANCE OF INSTITUTES
[cc. 617–640]

Governance in a religious institute occurs through three coalescing instrumentalities: persons, bodies, and laws. Individuals with personal authority govern the institute in accord with the norm of law. Bodies may be collegial or non-collegial, e.g., chapters, councils, and other lawfully designated groups. Laws may be universal, particular for a region or diocese, or proper to the institute. Governance in every religious institute incorporates these three elements with variations reflecting its spirit and character. The canons of this chapter on governance, and in fact the entire part three of Book II of the code, emphasize the importance of the institute's own law. The proper law applies the Church's general law to a particular institute, expressing its charism, its spirit, and the intent of the founder.

ARTICLE 1: SUPERIORS AND COUNCILS
[cc. 617–630]

Authority of Superiors

Canon 617 — Superiors are to fulfill their function and exercise their power according to the norm of universal and proper law.

Canon 617 introduces the fourteen canons on superiors and councils. It identifies the legal source of power exercised by religious superiors as the universal law of the Church and the proper law of the institute;[1] these provide parameters and some of the processes for superiors' exercise of their office.[2] Universal law includes law promulgated for the entire Latin church or for all Latin church religious institutes; proper law includes the institute's constitution and secondary document, often called a directory or statutes, as well as chapter enactments and other legislation of the institute. Canon 617 and the two following canons apply to superiors at all levels within religious institutes. The broad wording of these canons provides for the differing traditions found within the various institutes.

Superiors need to be cognizant both of universal law pertaining specifically to religious and of other universal law affecting the members, the institute, or its apostolate. Examples of universal law which could limit or augment the exercise of a superior's function or power would be the canons on juridic persons and juridic acts, those dealing with fundamental Christian obligations and rights, and many of the norms in Book V having to do with temporal goods.[3] In addition, universal law identifies the diocesan bishop as having the pastoral care of the apostolates within his diocese and superiors in apostolic institutes need to be mindful of his responsibilities in overseeing the institute's apostolate.[4]

Exercise of Authority

Canon 618 — Superiors are to exercise their power, received from God through the ministry of the Church, in a spirit of service. Therefore, docile to the will of God in fulfilling their function, they are to govern their subjects as sons or daughters of God and, promoting the voluntary

[1] The Eastern code distinguishes between monks and other religious, i.e., those in orders and congregations. CCEO 441 identifies the legal source of power for the superior of a monastery and CCEO 511 does the same for the superior of an order or congregation.

[2] T. Rincón Pérez adds that this canon serves as a reminder that superiors themselves are subject to both universal law and the institute's proper law. See Pamplona ComEng, 430.

[3] See cc. 113–128, 208–223, and 1254–1310.

[4] See cc. 394 and 673–683 and MR 52–59.

obedience of their subjects with reverence for the human person, they are to listen to them willingly and foster their common endeavor for the good of the institute and the Church, but without prejudice to the authority of superiors to decide and prescribe what must be done.

This canon, largely based on Perfectae caritatis 14, combines theological, spiritual, and legal understandings of the power exercised by superiors in a religious institute. It also describes the pastoral manner in which the superior is to exercise his or her authority.[5]

The canon asserts that superiors receive their power from God through the ministry of the Church, and, like all power in the Church, it is to be exercised in a spirit of service. Religious institutes receive their ecclesial identity through recognition by the Church, and superiors exercise lawful authority within their institutes because of this intermediary ministry of the Church and their legitimate selection in accord with the proper law. Canon 618 then indicates the close connection between the source and purpose of this power and the manner of its exercise. The canon incorporates the conciliar teaching on promoting greater participation of members in the internal governance of the institute.[6] Superiors themselves are to seek the will of God and relate to their subjects as the children of God whom they are; superiors are to be open to the insights and opinions of the members, and are to foster the good of the institute and the Church.

The canon concludes by unequivocally affirming the superior's authority and responsibility to decide and to take action, a right in no way diminished by participative pre-decisional consultative processes. The superior acts, of course, according to the norm of universal and particular law. Superiors should also cultivate an ecclesial awareness because many of their decisions have ramifications external to the religious institute.

[5] No equivalent theological and pastoral description of the superior's role is found in the Eastern code.

[6] PC 4 and 14.

Although the superior has a personal responsibility to each member under his or her care, the superior need not always exercise this responsibility personally. At times personal intervention may be neither possible nor advisable; for instance, the general superior of a large international institute cannot possibly hear each member personally before acting. Superiors themselves, or the institute's proper law, may designate other persons or structures at various levels of the institute to assist the superior in serving the members.

The words "power" (potestas) and "authority" (auctoritas) are both used in this canon; they are related to each other but are not identical. Power is the ability or capacity to act. All power, whether natural, physical, intellectual, or spiritual, has its source in God. Authority, on the other hand, connotes the possession or use of a power whose exercise is grounded in some moral or legal right. Superiors possess power by virtue of their office, and they are to exercise their authority in accord with its purposes.

The authority of superiors in religious institutes has as its correlative the obedience of the members. Neither exists without the other; each actualizes the other. In exercising their function, superiors serve the members and, consequently, the Church. This canon speaks of superiors promoting the voluntary obedience of the members. In fact, there is no other kind. Ecclesiastical superiors in general and religious superiors in particular possess only moral and legal authority, not physical power, with respect to the members. Superiors may, however, exercise this authority by restricting, penalizing, or dismissing members for appropriate cause.

Threefold Office

Canon 619 — Superiors are to devote themselves diligently to their office and together with the members entrusted to them are to strive to build a community of brothers or sisters in Christ, in which God is sought and loved before all things. Therefore, they are to nourish the members regularly with the food of the word of God and are to draw them to the celebration of the sacred liturgy. They are to be an example to them in cultivating virtues and in the observance of the laws and traditions of their own institute; they are to meet the personal needs of the members appropriately, solicitously to care for and visit the sick, to correct the restless, to console the faint of heart, and to be patient toward all.

This canon describes the superior's threefold office of teaching, sanctifying, and governing, an organization of functions found throughout the code.[7] The pastoral manner in which superiors are to exercise their office is emphasized by the canon's exhortative rather than prescriptive tone, unlike many of the more juridic norms for superiors found elsewhere.[8] The wording of this canon derives partly from Perfectae caritatis 6 which was directed to all members of religious institutes; here it guides the superior in fulfilling his or her pastoral responsibility toward the members.

Although the threefold functions of teaching, sanctifying, and governing are distinct, they often overlap in their exercise. The superior exercises the teaching function by breaking open the word of God and by the personal example of a religious life. The superior exercises the sanctifying function by centering the life of the community in God and drawing it to liturgical celebration, by example of personal virtue and religious discipline, and by solicitude for all. The superior exercises the governing function by animating the community, by coordinating and responding appropriately to the personal needs of members, and by correcting, consoling, and encouraging members as needed.[9] While all in the institute share many of these responsibilities by virtue of membership, the superior has a particular responsibility by virtue of office. Centuries of experience of religious life, as well as recent documents from the Holy See, confirm the pivotal and personal role of the superior in the animation of the community.[10]

The canon concludes by naming certain especially needy members for whom the superior should have particular solicitude—the sick, the restless, the faint of heart. This canon echoes the call of the prior canon for the superior to exercise power in a spirit of service; it challenges superiors not only to see to it that these members have the care they need, but even to minister personally to them when possible.

The superior's role as described here may seem daunting, but it reflects the demanding spiritual, personal, interpersonal, and legal responsibilities assumed with this office.

Major Superiors

Canon 620 — Those who govern an entire institute, a province of an institute or part equivalent to a province, or an autonomous house, as well as their vicars, are major superiors. Comparable to these are an abbot primate and a superior of a monastic congregation, who nonetheless do not have all the power which universal law grants to major superiors.

This canon defines major superiors and those comparable to them.[11] The level and scope of responsibility exercised, rather than the number of persons for whom one is responsible, identify a superior as a major superior. Major superiors are individual physical persons who exercise authority by reason of their office over a whole institute, a province of an institute, a part of the institute equivalent to a province, or an autonomous or sui iuris house. Also identified as major superiors are the vicars of these persons, that is, those persons designated by the institute's proper law to take the [7] See c. 375 re bishops, cc. 528–529 re pastors, and the organization of the code itself, especially Books III and IV. CCEO 421 similarly describes the superior in both monasteries and in orders and congregations.

[8] For example, cc. 625, 639, 647, and 686.

[9] For a more extensive development of this threefold responsibility, see MR 13.

[10] FL 47–53 and VC 43.

[11] CCEO 418 gives a comparable definition of major superiors.

place of an absent or impeded major superior. However, those substituting for a major superior in an ad hoc manner, exercising delegated power, are not major superiors.[12]

The canon also identifies as comparable to major superiors the abbot primate and the superior of a monastic congregation comprised of several or many independent foundations (e.g., Benedictines and Trappists); however, such persons do not possess all the authority of a major superior over the constituent monasteries of the institute. The particular scope of responsibilities of such an abbot or superior will vary from institute to institute according to its proper law.

In clerical religious institutes of pontifical right, major superiors are also ordinaries who, in virtue of this ecclesiastical power of governance, exercise certain additional powers regarding their own members, e.g., granting dimissorial letters, faculties, and dispensations, giving blessings, and imposing or remitting penalties.[13] The proper law of each institute should identify clearly the respective roles of the supreme moderator and other major superiors in the institute.

Provinces

Canon 621 — A grouping of several houses which constitutes an immediate part of the same institute under the same superior and has been canonically erected by legitimate authority is called a province.

This canon defines a province as a grouping of several houses of an institute under one superior, a grouping canonically erected by legitimate authority in such a way that the resulting entity is an immediate part of the institute.[14] In other words, the resulting unit relates directly to the highest superior of the institute with no intervening levels of government. Each separate province, upon establishment, is usually comprised of at least three separate houses.[15]

The proper law of the institute, specifically the constitutions, should indicate the authority competent to establish or suppress provinces or other equivalent units. This authority may reside with the highest superior after receiving the advice or consent of the council or with the general chapter of the institute. The 1917 code reserved to the Holy See the right to erect and suppress provinces, but in accord with the 1983 code the revised constitutions of most religious institutes now identify an internal authority.[16]

As a result of apostolic realignments, diminishing numbers of members, and new missionary endeavors, religious institutes sometimes find it necessary or helpful to reorganize their internal governance structures. In doing so it is important to identify the status of each governmental unit of the resulting structure, i.e., whether it is a province or its equivalent which, by the law, has its own juridic personality and whose superior is, consequently, a major superior exercising authority by reason of office. Other organizational units, such as regions or sectors, do not enjoy separate juridic personality and the nature of the unit superior's authority would be different.

Extent of Superior's Authority

Canon 622 — The supreme moderator holds power over all the provinces, houses, and members of an institute; this power is to be exercised according to proper law. Other superiors possess power within the limits of their function.

The code frequently uses generic terms descriptive of an office, a role, or an entity rather than appropriating a particular title from one or another tradition or culture. The term "supreme [12] Neither chapters nor authorities external to the institute can be called superiors in the strict sense of the word, according to Rincón Pérez. See Pamplona ComEng, 431.

[13] See c. 596, §2 for the general statement of this power and cc. 967, §3; 968, §2; 969, §2; and 1019, §1 for some specific articulations.

[14] CCEO 508, §1 recognizes provinces within orders and congregations and defines them similarly.

[15] Canon 115, §2.

[16] Canon 581.

moderator" is an example of this.[17] The supreme moderator is the highest superior, having authority over the entire institute, all provinces and equivalent subdivisions, all houses and all members of the institute.[18] In many institutes the highest superior is called "president" or "superior general," but different traditions identify the person who holds this office with a title incorporating the institute's spirit or tradition such as "minister general" in the Franciscan tradition, "father abbot" in the Benedictine tradition, or "prioress general" and "master general" in the Dominican tradition.

The authority of the supreme moderator is exercised in accord with the proper law of the institute; the scope and expression of this authority can vary greatly. Institutes with a more centralized government may give considerable authority to the supreme moderator. In other institutes, whose organizational structure provides for provinces or regions, more authority may reside at a lower level with provincial superiors or, occasionally, with local superiors. The proper law of each institute should establish clearly the limits of authority to be exercised by superiors at each level and provide for the coordination of those responsibilities which are shared.

Prerequisite for Office

Canon 623 — In order for members to be appointed or elected validly to the function of superior, a suitable time is required after perpetual or definitive profession, to be determined by proper law, or if it concerns major superiors, by the constitutions.

The role of superiors, whether major or local, is integral to the internal life of the religious institute. Hence the common law of the Church seeks to ensure that only persons experienced in the way of life of the institute and committed to it are named as superiors.[19] This canon specifies that eligibility for appointment or election as superior at any level, whether major or local, requires that the member be perpetually or definitively professed. The election or appointment of a novice, a member in temporary vows, or a transfer member still in the probationary period would be invalid, unless a postulation has been admitted.[20]

In addition to the threshold requirement of perpetual or definitive incorporation, the proper law of the institute identifies any additional requirements for the office of superior. For instance, each institute designates what additional period of time after final profession is suitable before a member becomes eligible for the office of superior; in a clerical religious institute, superiors may be required to be ordained. When these additional requirements concern the office of major superior, they are to be in the constitution; for other superiors, inclusion in the statutes or other secondary document of the institute suffices.

Other requirements of the 1917 code, such as age and legitimacy of birth, intended to protect the office of superior from unworthy officeholders and ensure it appropriate respect, no longer obtain. Institutes may establish in their proper law other requirements for the office of superior which accord with the institute's charism, spirit, and tradition and which respect the cultures within which it

[17] The Eastern code uses the term "superior" for one who governs a monastery and "superior general" for one who governs an order or congregation.

[18] In recent years some religious institutes of men which traditionally have been composed of both ordained and non-ordained members have sought a dispensation from the prohibition against a non-ordained superior exercising authority over the ordained members, thus allowing the institute to choose those persons best qualified to lead it regardless of their status. In each case, however, the dispensation has required that a priest be delegated to carry out all acts of jurisdiction. See CLD 9, 346; CLD 10, 106–107.

[19] The requirements for superior in the Eastern code are more restrictive than those in the Latin code. CCEO 442 requires that the superior of a monastery be at least ten years professed and forty years of age, and CCEO 513 requires that major superiors in orders and congregations be at least ten years professed and, in addition, that general superiors be at least thirty-five years old.

[20] Canons 180–183.

serves. However, an institute should not define eligibility for the office of superior too narrowly; the gifts of the Spirit, present in many guises, are to be welcomed in its service. On a practical level, for the good of the institute, efforts should be made to increase the pool of those available for this ministry through mentoring, personal encouragement, and ongoing educational opportunities.

Term of Office

Canon 624 — §1. Superiors are to be constituted for a certain and appropriate period of time according to the nature and need of the institute, unless the constitutions determine otherwise for the supreme moderator and for superiors of an autonomous house.

§2. Proper law is to provide suitable norms so that superiors, constituted for a definite time, do not remain too long in offices of governance without interruption.

§3. Nevertheless, they can be removed from office during their function or be transferred to another for reasons established in proper law.

Canon 624 circumscribes the exercise of authority by superiors in two ways: (1) by limiting the time any one person may serve in the office of superior, and (2) by providing methods by which a superior may be relieved of office.[21] The general directives of the canon are applicable to all superiors. The proper law of each institute is to explicitate these directives for the particular institute.

All superiors, both major and local, are to have specific and limited terms of office, except for the two situations discussed below. Indefinite terms are proscribed. The length of the term of office may vary from institute to institute and even from one level of superior to another within the same institute, according to its nature and needs. For instance, an international missionary institute would have very different needs from those of a small semi-cloistered institute engaged in retreat work or a large apostolic institute whose members are concentrated in a few neighboring dioceses.

The two exceptions to the general requirement of a definite and limited term of office are the supreme moderator of an institute and the superior of an autonomous house. If an institute, according to its tradition, elects the highest superior for life, it may continue to do so, incorporating this provision into its constitutions, e.g., the Society of Jesus and some Benedictine monasteries.

The canon also suggests a rationale for term limitations and a general approach to their implementation. Fixed and limited terms in office are intended to ensure regular change in leadership at every level of the institute, and its proper law is to make suitable provision that this happens. In the constitutions and secondary documents of religious institutes, revised in accord with Vatican Council II,[22] the terms of superiors frequently vary greatly from one institute to another. Some institutes allow for several short successive terms for local superiors while other institutes designate a single longer term without the possibility of an immediate second term. Some institutes require an interval before the same person would again be eligible for the office of superior. Each institute must balance the need for continuity, stability, and the time necessary for the superior to know the members and plan responsibly with the need to develop leadership and benefit from new blood and new energy.

The canon also affirms the possibility of removal or transfer of a superior during his or her term in office (§3). Removal from office may be necessitated by illness, incapacity, incompetence, conflicting responsibilities, or other serious reasons. Transfer to another office may be prompted by a greater need elsewhere or personal needs or desires made known by the superior during his or her term of office. The reasons for removal or transfer of superiors and an appropriate process [21] In CCEO 444 the term of the superior of a sui iuris monastery is indeterminate, and resignation is required upon completion of seventy-five years of age. Canon 514 of the Eastern code is similar to the Latin code in prescribing certain and limited terms for superiors in orders and congregations.

[22] PC 3.

should be prescribed, at least generically, in the institute's proper law, i.e., in the constitution for the major superior and in other legislation for other superiors. Also relevant are the general norms regarding transfer and removal from ecclesiastical office.[23]

Besides removal or transfer, resignation is another means through which a superior may lose his or her office. A superior should resign only for serious reason, and the resignation must be submitted in writing to the authority competent to make provision for the office, e.g., the one who appointed the superior, or the next immediate superior if the superior was elected by an electoral body. Unless the proper law provides otherwise, the resignation of the supreme moderator is tendered to the general chapter if it is in session or, if the chapter is not in session, to the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life for pontifical institutes and the diocesan bishop for diocesan institutes.

Manner of Designating Superiors

Canon 625 — §1. The supreme moderator of an institute is to be designated by canonical election according to the norm of the constitutions.

§2. The bishop of the principal seat presides at the elections of a superior of the autonomous monastery mentioned in can. 615 and of the supreme moderator of an institute of diocesan right.

§3. Other superiors are to be constituted according to the norm of the constitutions, but in such a way that, if they are elected, they need the confirmation of a competent major superior; if they are appointed by a superior, however, a suitable consultation is to precede.

This canon regulates the manner in which superiors are designated.[24] The supreme moderator is designated by canonical election, which is regulated by canons 164–179 and any complementary norms in the proper law of the institute.[25] For most institutes the general chapter elects the supreme moderator; however, certain institutes, small in number and limited geographically, have received approval for direct election of the supreme moderator by all of the perpetually or definitively professed members. Requests from larger institutes to allow direct election of the supreme moderator have been consistently denied by the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life. Because election is both a religious act and a juridic act, certain conditions should be present: an atmosphere of prayerful discernment, knowledge of potential candidates, objectivity, freedom of voters, allowance for the convergence of insight in the assembly, and the avoidance of politicking or campaigning. [26]

The election of the supreme moderator of the institute is a significant ecclesial event, hence institutes sometimes invite the diocesan bishop to be present for the election. However, his role in the election of major superiors has changed substantially with the 1983 code, and the constitutions of many institutes have been modified accordingly. He now presides only at the election of superiors of autonomous monasteries, i.e., those with no other major superior and no jurisdictional link with another institute, and at elections in diocesan institutes both of men and women. The responsibility to preside falls to the bishop of the diocese where the generalate is located. Since the responsibility of presiding at elections no longer entails the right to confirm or rescind the election, this responsibility may be and often is delegated. The bishop or his delegate does not preside at [24] Canons 443 and 515 of the Eastern code treat similar material regarding the designation of superiors in monasteries and in orders and congregations, respectively.

[23] Canons 190–195.

[25] Rincón Pérez is of the opinion that the institute's proper law regarding elections must conform to the universal law for canonical elections (see Pamplona ComEng, 434), but E. Williamson implies that legitimate exceptions exist (see CLSGBI Com, 343).

[26] CLD 7, 480; CLD 8, 354–357; CLD 9, 356–358; and CLD 10, 102–106.

other elections (e.g., election of members of the council) or at the chapter of affairs.

Most institutes have, in addition to a supreme moderator, provincial, regional, and/or local superiors. This canon also provides for their designation, either by appointment or by election, emphasizing the importance of the institute's proper law. For those elected, confirmation by the competent major superior is required before the office is actually acquired. The institute's proper law may require the prior consent or advice of the council, but the confirmation itself is an act of the individual person with whom the authority rests. The capacity to confirm entails the capacity to deny the confirmation.[27] If an election is not confirmed, the electing body proceeds to another election. For those offices of superior designated by appointment, a suitable consultation is to precede the appointment. This requirement reflects the strong tradition of some religious institutes and the code's emphasis that those who are affected have some part in selecting superiors.

Besides the two ways of designating superiors mentioned in this canon there is also the possibility of postulation, unless this method is specifically proscribed by the constitution. Postulation, no longer reserved by law to extraordinary cases, allows the members of an electoral body, e.g., a general chapter, to request designation of a person barred by a canonical impediment, e.g., a limitation on number of terms, but who is otherwise deemed qualified for the office. The results of the postulation are forwarded to the authority competent to dispense from the impediment. For example, the postulation of the supreme moderator of a pontifical institute is forwarded to the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life; that of the supreme moderator of a diocesan institute to the diocesan bishop; and that of a provincial superior to the supreme moderator of the institute for referral to the proper ecclesiastical authority. If the dispensation is not granted, the electing body, upon being informed, elects another person. The requirements for postulation differ from those of election and canons 180–183 need to be followed carefully.

Abuses to Be Avoided

Canon 626 — Superiors in the conferral of offices and members in elections are to observe the norms of universal and proper law, are to abstain from any abuse or partiality, and are to appoint or elect those whom they know in the Lord to be truly worthy and suitable, having nothing before their eyes but God and the good of the institute. Moreover, in elections they are to avoid any procurement of votes, either directly or indirectly, whether for themselves or for others.

This canon looks to the dispositions of those responsible for appointing or electing superiors and other office holders, and it proscribes certain actions detrimental to an open and free selection.[28] Those responsible for designating officeholders must first know the requirements of their own proper law and the norms of the code pertaining to elections, rights and obligations, and related matters. In addition, those responsible, whether superiors or other members, are called to act with the same impartiality expected of those elected or appointed in the exercise of their office, that is, they are to place the good of the institute above personal preference.

Actions specifically proscribed in this canon are abuse and partiality, and, in the case of elections, the procuring of votes either directly or indirectly, for oneself or for others. Abuse would include deliberate deception, impeding or manipulating the election process in any way, voting by those not eligible, etc. In the past, religious institutes often conducted elections in secret and in silence; at times this hindered capitulars from voting knowledgeably. Appropriate discernment, both personal and communal, is now understood to require knowledge about persons who are being considered for office. Such information is often not immediately accessible to all the members of a group involved in designating a person for office, e.g., council members giving advice or consent before the superior appoints or chapter members electing a supreme moderator and council members. The need to seek information about candidates is especially important in large institutes and in those with diverse and/or international apostolates.

[27] Canon 179 details procedures and time constraints for confirming elections. However, any provisions of proper law would supersede the universal law

[28] There is no comparable norm in the Eastern code.

The supplementary documents of some institutes identify appropriate means of promoting respectful discussion and obtaining consultation prior to the selection of superiors. Other institutes leave the design and conduct of these procedures to the competent authority. Discussion and consultation may include pre-chapter gatherings of the entire institute for reflection on qualities and roles, circulation of curricula vitae of prospective candidates, preference balloting by the membership, and open forums for the presentation of views by candidates. In addition, individuals may seek information through personal consultation.

A delicate balance needs to be maintained in the conduct of these various participative processes. While those responsible for designating officeholders need adequate knowledge, the persons being considered maintain their right to privacy and their good reputation.[29] Any discussion of persons should be respectful, sensitive, and confidential. If an institute or province conducts a discussion forum, a candidate need not participate. Similarly, if an institute conducts a preference ballot among the membership, the appointing superior or the electoral body is not bound to these results, unless the institute's own law specifically states otherwise. The freedom of the superior or of the electing body is presumed; any restriction on it must be explicit.[30]

This canon does not indicate the consequences of its violation. However, an election whose freedom is impaired in any way whatever is invalid.[31] For the sake of peace in the community, any suspicion or allegation either of abuse or of procurement of votes should be taken seriously and investigated by the authority competent to do so. Should an election be deemed invalid, the competent superior would have to declare it so and call a new election.

[29] Canon 220.

[30] Canon 18.

[31] Canon 170.

Role of Council

Canon 627 — §1. According to the norm of the constitutions, superiors are to have their own council, whose assistance they must use in carrying out their function.

§2. In addition to the cases prescribed in universal law, proper law is to determine the cases which require consent or counsel to act validly; such consent or counsel must be obtained according to the norm of can. 127.

Although every superior exercises personal authority, this canon requires that superiors be assisted by a council in fulfilling their responsibilities.[32] The council is normally not a decision-making body but is an integral part of the decision-making process regarding serious matters. Council members give advice or consent as required by the institute's proper law, but they also assist the superior by sharing insights, evaluating initiatives, raising issues, extending support, and generally participating in council discussions with candor, courage, and creativity.

It is important to note the distinct roles of superior and council, i.e., that the superior has a council and is not part of it. One practical consequence of this distinction is manifested when the council votes: the superior is attentive to but does not vote with the council.[33] The only exception in [32] Canon 422 of the Eastern code specifies a permanent council for all superiors.

[33] In 1985 the Holy See issued an authentic interpretation on this matter; see CLD 11, 16. For further discussion see L. Wrenn, Authentic Interpretations on the 1983 Code (Washington, D.C.: Canon Law Society of America, 1993) 19–20 and Rincón Pérez in Pamplona ComEng, 435. Nevertheless, the proper law of some institutes, usually older institutes whose traditions predate universal law concerns the dismissal of a member; such a vote is taken as a collegial body with the supreme moderator's vote carrying the same weight as that of each council member.[34]

Canon 627 leaves to the constitutions of each institute decisions regarding the composition of the council at each level of the institute, the manner of operating, and the qualifications for the role of councilor.[35] If the general council is composed of fewer than four persons, provision should be made in the proper law for augmenting the council in the event of a dismissal because the dismissal process requires for validity at least four members of the council.[36] Other matters for which the institute's proper law should make provision are the manner of selecting councilors, qualifications for eligibility, frequency of meetings, and circumstances in which the entire local community could serve as the local council.

In many religious institutes councilors also carry out administrative responsibilities in the service of their institutes. Council members are chosen because of their wisdom, experience, and ability to assist the superior with good advice and appropriate consent. The distribution of administrative responsibilities usually occurs following the selection of the council members. Position descriptions for any administrative responsibilities, with clear lines of communication and accountability and with opportunity for evaluation of these administrative responsibilities, enable council members serving in these positions to separate council roles from other administrative roles.

Certain offices or functions within the institute present some difficulties and conflicts of interest, making them incompatible with council membership, e.g., members responsible for formation and spiritual directors of other members of the institute. Such members should not participate in council decisions affecting persons whom they direct. Other offices within the institute, such as that of treasurer or secretary, do not raise the moral dilemmas presented by the positions of novice director or spiritual director, but if such officers serve as council members, this could limit the range of insight, wisdom, or diversity of experience brought to the council discussions. Each institute may determine the composition of the council, having only the good of the institute in mind, and such provisions should be incorporated into its proper law.

The superior is required to use the assistance of the council in two ways, namely in seeking its advice or its consent when expressly determined in universal and proper law. The council's consent or advice is required by the universal law in more than a dozen instances, most of them concerning the status of members or the temporal goods of the institute.[37] An institute's proper law may include additional instances when the council's advice or consent is required in accord with canon 127. These instances often flow out of an institute's tradition and spirit, but they should not be so numerous as to hamper the superior unnecessarily or prevent appropriate flexibility and timeliness in responding to situations. Even if the code requires only the advice of the council, the institute's proper law may require consent.

When the universal law or the proper law of the institute requires the advice or consent of the council, an act placed without such advice or consent is invalid. Canon 127 gives details regarding how this advice or consent is to be sought and rendered. The council must be convened as a group, not informed and polled individually. In the case of consent, the consent of an absolute majority of council members present must be obtained. In the case of advice, the advice of all council members present is to be sought. Those whose advice or consent is sought must be adequately informed of relevant matters, and their the codification of law, provide for situations in which the superior votes collegially with the council.

[34] Canon 699, §1.

[35] Religious institutes belonging to the Eastern churches may determine in their proper law whether local houses with six or fewer members are to have a council. See CCEO 422, §2.

[36] Canon 699, §1.

[37] See, e.g., cc. 638, §3; 647, §§1–2; 656, 3°; 684, §1; 688, §2; 690, §1; and 694, §2.

advice or consent is to be given forthrightly. Finally, when advice or consent is required, the superior may bind the council to secrecy, if the nature of the matter requires it.

In accord with canon 127, when consent is required and the council vote results in a tie, the required consent has not been received, and the superior may neither act nor break the tie by voting himself or herself.[38] When consent is required and has been given by the council, the superior is free to act but is not bound to do so. For a serious reason, perhaps based on confidential information known only to the superior, he or she may refrain from acting. Should the superior act without having obtained the required advice or consent, the act is invalid.

With due regard for the limitations placed on the superior's authority by the occasional requirements of advice and consent, it should be noted that the actions taken after receiving the necessary advice or consent are actions of the superior and not of the council. The requirements of advice and consent are intended to serve the good of the community by bringing to the decision-making process a wider range of knowledge and experience, thereby preventing ill-advised or arbitrary actions regarding the members and the goods of the institute.

Visitation

Canon 628 — §1. The superiors whom the proper law of the institute designates for this function are to visit the houses and members entrusted to them at stated times according to the norms of this same proper law.

§2. It is the right and duty of a diocesan bishop to visit even with respect to religious discipline:

1° the autonomous monasteries mentioned in can. 615;

2° individual houses of an institute of diocesan right located in his own territory.

§3. Members are to act with trust toward a visitator, to whose legitimate questioning they are bound to respond according to the truth in charity. Moreover, it is not permitted for anyone in any way to divert members from this obligation or otherwise to impede the scope of the visitation.

Visitation of religious houses is an ancient and respected institution within religious life; it symbolizes communion within the institute and with the larger Church and, at the same time, provides a vehicle for support, communication, and correction. This canon discusses the various ways in which visitation occurs.[39]

The most common form of visitation is carried out by a superior of the institute designated in accord with the institute's own law. Which superior or superiors hold this responsibility and the frequency and manner of visitation are left to that proper law. Major superiors are ordinarily charged with this duty at least once during their term in office. In large institutes or in special circumstances, e.g., the protracted illness of the superior, responsibility for visitation may be delegated. Besides making the ordinary visitations identified in the proper law, supreme moderators may visit a house of the institute at any time in virtue of the authority vested in them according to canon 622.

During the visitation the superior or delegate usually meets privately with each member and with the local community as a group, depending on the purpose of the visitation. The superior may also meet with the diocesan bishop, the pastor of the parish in which the house is located, or the administrator of the apostolic work.

Visitation is a privileged opportunity for the superior to come to know the members of the institute, to hear first-hand their hopes and burdens, and to offer encouragement and support. It also enables the superior to learn about the apostolates of members of apostolic institutes, to meet some of those with whom and to whom they minister, and to give some direction when appropriate. Visitation likewise provides members time and opportunity to share important aspects of their lives, to seek direction or advice, to request a change of assignment, and to discuss community issues and apostolic initiatives. Furthermore, visitation enables the superior to address in a timely and knowledgeable manner any problems with religious discipline. In religious institutes whose structure includes an intermediate level of provinces or their equivalent, coordination of visitations and careful attention to the principles of subsidiarity and co-responsibility are necessary for good order.

[38] See note 33, above, and the commentary on c. 127 for a fuller discussion of the requirements of advice and consent.

[39] Canons 414, §§1, 3° and 2, and CCEO 420, §§1–2 regulate internal and hierarchical visitation.

The diocesan bishop also has a limited responsibility regarding visitation of religious institutes (§2). He has the right and the duty to visit the autonomous monasteries and all individual houses of diocesan right institutes located within his diocese. This would include both the principal house (general house) of the latter and any of its houses located within the diocese (c. 615). By such visitation the bishop affords these religious access to ecclesiastical authority. He may investigate any laxity in religious discipline, or he may simply support the religious in their way of life. The code is silent regarding the frequency of the diocesan bishop's visitation; therefore he may go as often as he judges desirable. However, since diocesan institutes have superiors designated in their proper law for visitation, these superiors and the diocesan bishop should coordinate the focus and timing of their visitations to preclude duplicating work or unduly burdening the members.

The members have certain responsibilities in relation to a visitator. The fabric of religious life is woven from trust, and this canon exhorts members to extend that trust to those who conduct an official visitation. Regardless of the purpose of a visitation, religious are obliged to respond truthfully and charitably to any legitimate question asked by the visitator. One limitation on such legitimate questioning would be the prohibition of superiors from inducing from any member a manifestation of conscience (c. 630, §5). However, all religious in the house and any other persons, lay or clerical, must respect the visitator and in no way impede the purpose of the visitation.

Obligation of Residence

Canon 629 — Superiors are to reside in their respective houses, and are not to absent themselves from their house except according to the norm of proper law.

The superior's obligation to reside in his or her own house is intended to ensure the fulfillment of his or her responsibilities by reason of office.[40] Previous canons have identified in a general way some of the superior's responsibilities: to build community, to give personal example of the religious life, to listen willingly to members, to foster cooperation, to assist members in need. Such personal availability and service is difficult to achieve at a distance. Bishops and pastors are obliged to a similar residency for similar reasons.[41]

The obligation of residence binds all superiors, major and local. Major superiors are to reside in their principal house (general or provincial house) even when another member has been designated as the local superior. By "house" is meant a lawfully constituted house designated according to law; it need not be identified with one particular building. A religious "house" may be constituted as one part of a large community, or it may be constituted from several small residences grouped together and designated as a unit under one superior.[42]

The obligation of residence is not absolute; superiors may be absent from their respective houses according to the institute's own law. Lawful absences may be occasioned by apostolic service, temporary responsibilities related to the institute, vacation and retreat, and other just causes in ac-

[40] Canon 446 of the Eastern code also requires that the superior of a monastery reside in the monastery.

[41] Canons 395 and 533.

[42] Canon 608.

cord with the proper law. Some religious institutes find it impractical, if not impossible, to have a local superior residing in every house where religious reside. This is particularly true for some apostolic institutes whose members live in small communities or alone. The norm obliges superiors to residence in their respective houses in accord with the institute's proper law. This allows the institute, in keeping with its own tradition and needs, to identify as area or regional superiors members who reside in one place and serve as superior for several small communities.

Confessors and Freedom of Members

Canon 630 — §1. Superiors are to recognize the due freedom of their members regarding the sacrament of penance and direction of conscience, without prejudice, however, to the discipline of the institute.

§2. According to the norm of proper law, superiors are to be concerned that suitable confessors are available to the members, to whom the members can confess frequently.

§3. In monasteries of nuns, in houses of formation, and in more numerous lay communities, there are to be ordinary confessors approved by the local ordinary after consultation with the community; nevertheless, there is no obligation to approach them.

§4. Superiors are not to hear the confessions of subjects unless the members request it on their own initiative.

§5. Members are to approach superiors with trust, to whom they can freely and on their own initiative open their minds. Superiors, however, are forbidden to induce the members in any way to make a manifestation of conscience to them.

This canon balances the individual's freedom of conscience with the common good of the institute manifested through religious discipline. The canon is located in the section on governance, placing the burden primarily on superiors to respect appropriate boundaries and ensure the availability of confessors and spiritual directors,[43] while at the same time maintaining religious discipline. This canon is an abbreviated and more pastoral treatment of the 1917 code's regulations regarding confessors for religious (CIC 518–530 and 874–876). None of the former restrictions remain; all religious, including women, may choose those from whom they will seek the sacrament of reconciliation and spiritual direction. This canon reflects the emphasis on freedom of conscience found in the conciliar documents and elsewhere in this code.[44] The canon calls for a careful but generous balancing of individual needs with the common good and for mature discretion by both superiors and members.

The first paragraph of the canon resembles the teaching of Perfectae caritatis 14, establishing the freedom of each member regarding the frequency, content, and choice of minister in matters of sacramental confession and direction of conscience. All superiors are to recognize and facilitate this freedom as long as it does not undermine the religious discipline of the institute. In cloistered or semi-cloistered institutes the exercise of this right must be balanced with the obligation of enclosure and the disruption to individual and community life which frequent absences might entail. For all religious institutes the freedom to choose a spiritual director may have financial implications, because full-time spiritual guides or directors are entitled to just compensation.

Superiors have the responsibility to ensure the availability of suitable confessors in keeping with the proper law of the institute, but particular circumstances (e.g., remote location of religious house, special needs, dearth of priests) may limit what is reasonably possible. The diocesan bishop [43] CCEO 475 and 539 require the appointment of confessors (and spiritual fathers for the monastery), and CCEO 473, §2, 2° speaks of free and frequent approach to them, but none of these canons makes as strong a statement about the freedom of the members in these and related matters.

[44] For instance, see DH 1–3, 10–11 and cc. 214–215, 219, 240, 748, and 985, inter alia.

and superiors of clerical institutes can be helpful in identifying suitable and available confessors. The appointment of regular or ordinary confessors assures availability and provides continuity to those who avail themselves of such confessors. Other practical measures to be considered might include planning community reconciliation services during certain liturgical seasons when several confessors could be available, budgeting realistically for these spiritual services, assuring transportation for members, and the like.

The third paragraph specifies for particular situations the more general admonitions of the prior two paragraphs. The superior is to see that ordinary confessors, approved by the local ordinary, are appointed for certain communities. These communities—monasteries of nuns,[45] houses of formation and larger communities of lay religious—are to be consulted regarding these confessors. More than one ordinary confessor may be appointed to address various community needs. Although the superior has the obligation to provide ordinary confessors, no member of the community need avail himself or herself of them.

The next paragraph applies only to presbyteral superiors in clerical religious institutes. Although such superiors usually possess the faculty to hear confessions of their subjects,[46] they are enjoined from doing so by this canon unless the subject spontaneously requests it. This canon parallels other canons which discourage rectors of seminaries and formation houses, novice directors, and others from hearing the confessions of those under their charge.[47]

The final paragraph of the canon deals with manifestation of conscience, an activity differing from both sacramental confession and spiritual direction although sometimes only by a fine line. Such a manifestation of conscience includes disclosure of all matters of the interior life, both graced and sinful. Some early traditions of religious life considered the superior to be the spiritual father or mother of the community and expected members to manifest their consciences to the superior. The advantages and the dangers of this practice are evident, but the 1917 code (CIC 530) and this canon make it clear that any manifestation of conscience is to be the member's free choice.

This final paragraph reiterates the context of trust and freedom that should characterize superior-member relationships; this relationship parallels that between religious and a visitator (c. 628, §3) and complements the willing listening expected of superiors in canon 618. However, all superiors and formation personnel, such as novice directors, are forbidden to induce a manifestation of conscience from those under their charge. Such inducement can be direct, e.g., through questioning, threats, promises, etc., or indirect, e.g., through praise of the practice, disapproval of those who fail to use it, and other forms of manipulation.[48]

Problems regarding manifestation of conscience have arisen recently in situations of alleged sexual misconduct. A superior may not require or pressure the member to admit wrongdoing; in fact, by so doing, he or she may even jeopardize the case before civil law should it go to trial. On the other hand, if a trusting relationship exists with the superior, the member might wish to unburden himself or herself by acknowledging the misconduct or the harm done and seeking help.

The last two paragraphs of this canon provide a double safeguard. They discourage undue pressure on an individual religious in the internal forum and, at the same time, free the superior from any perception by community members that information received in the internal forum has been used in the external forum. Accordingly a superior should not lightly disregard this protective wall, weighing carefully the potential for a conflict in roles if a member requests sacramental

[45] See cc. 614–615.
[46] Canon 968, §2.
[47] See cc. 985 and 239, §2–240.

[48] G. McKay, "Spiritual Direction in the Diocesan Seminary," Stud Can 26 (1992) 401–413.

confession, spiritual direction, or manifestation of conscience.

ARTICLE 2: CHAPTERS [cc. 631–633]

Chapters, whether general, provincial, or local, have a long and respected history within religious life.[49] They are based on the theological conviction that the Spirit gifts all members for the good of the community and that unity and reconciliation in Christ are possible. Chapters are the legal manifestations of the principles of representation, participation, and subsidiarity, principles deeply grounded in both Eastern and Western Christianity since the time of the early Church. These principles were reemphasized by Vatican Council II and influenced the revision of the Church's legal codes. Much of what is contained in the following three canons is general in nature, leaving to the proper law of each institute the determination of particulars appropriate to it.

General Chapter

Canon 631 — §1. The general chapter, which holds supreme authority in the institute according to the norm of the constitutions, is to be composed in such a way that, representing the entire institute, it becomes a true sign of its unity in charity. It is for the general chapter principally: to protect the patrimony of the institute mentioned in can. 578, promote suitable renewal according to that patrimony, elect the supreme moderator, treat affairs of greater importance, and issue norms which all are bound to obey.

§2. The constitutions are to define the composition and extent of the power of a chapter; proper law is to determine further the order to be observed in the celebration of the chapter, especially in what pertains to elections and the manner of handling affairs.

§3. According to the norms determined in proper law, not only provinces and local communities, but also any member can freely send wishes and suggestions to a general chapter.

This canon describes the purpose and functioning of a general chapter.[50] The general chapter is a collegial body at the highest level of the institute, representative of the entire institute, in which each participant has equal voice and vote. While in session it holds supreme authority in the institute, in accord with the constitution.

The extent of the general chapter's authority may vary somewhat from institute to institute; for instance, one institute's constitution may reserve to the general chapter what another gives to the general superior and council. However, this canon delineates five areas of responsibility pertaining to every general chapter, responsibilities which may neither be ignored nor delegated to some other authority.

Foremost among the responsibilities of a general chapter is the duty to protect the patrimony, or sacred legacy, of the institute (c. 578). This foundational duty to protect the institute's precious heritage is an all-embracing yet elusive mandate. Sometimes it calls for specific and, perhaps, bold or radical actions; however, this responsibility generally serves as a touchstone, lens, or common vision by which the chapter reviews reports, discusses issues, and weighs proposed actions. In all these situations the general chapter is enjoined to take those actions necessary to strengthen and hand on the institute's patrimony.

Other chapter responsibilities mentioned in this canon specify how this primary duty is to be carried out. First, it is to promote suitable renewal in accord with the institute's patrimony. Inherent in this call for renewal is the recognition of ongoing change within the institute, the Church, the culture, and the world. Concomitant with this is the recognition that renewal is not achieved once for all time. Basic criteria for ongoing renewal can be found in Perfectae caritatis 2 and subsequent documents.[51]

[49] The term chapter originated with the early monks who gathered daily as a community to listen to a reading from the Rule of St. Benedict. Gradually this gathering included discussion and decisions related to the application of the rule. By the thirteenth century general chapters were required of all religious institutes.

[50] CCEO 441, §1; 511; and 512 provide for synaxes (chapters) but leave most regulations to the proper law.

The second specific responsibility of the general chapter is to elect the supreme moderator of the institute. The person elected has the responsibility, with the assistance of the council, to carry forward chapter decisions and directions[52] in conjunction with the ordinary governance of the institute. The third specific responsibility of the general chapter is to treat major business matters, which will vary among institutes depending on their nature, size, and tradition. The proper law of the institute may indicate certain decisions to be chapter matter, but certainly included would be a change in the legal status of the institute, a major shift in apostolic thrust, and any proposal regarding merger, union, or dissolution. The fourth specific responsibility of the general chapter is to publish somewhat general norms binding all members of the institute while still allowing for interpretation and application by the competent authority.

Whatever its size, authority, and composition, the general chapter is to be representative of the whole institute and to be a sign of its unity. Capitulars should be drawn from a broad range of members with different ages, apostolates, and geographic regions represented. In order to ensure broad representation, a balance between ex officio members, i.e., those who are capitulars by reason of the office they hold, and delegates or elected members needs to be achieved. Many constitutions provide that ex officio members are not to exceed one-third of the total body; other institutes achieve the balance by naming and limiting those offices entailing an ex officio seat at chapter.

In keeping with the proper law of the institute, delegates may be elected either at large, i.e., by the entire membership of the institute, or by a subgroup of the institute, such as a province, a region, a local house, or an age group. Each capitular brings his or her own gifts, experience, education, and expertise, offering these for the good of the institute through service in the chapter. Regardless of whether a capitular is ex officio or elected, he or she does not represent a "constituency" or carry a particular agenda, theological perspective, or mandate for action. The common good of the institute and its precious heritage are to be served by each participant in the general chapter.

At times it may be necessary to convoke an extraordinary general chapter. This entails the election of delegates according to the norms of proper law. The constitutions should specify the competent authority to convoke such a chapter and any special regulations regarding it.

The second paragraph of canon 631 also highlights the importance of the institute's proper law. The constitution defines the make-up of the chapter and the extent of its authority. Usually the secondary document or other legislation elaborates further directives for the conduct of the business of the general chapter, e.g., the timing of elections vis-à-vis the other matters of business, the number of sessions, the role of committees, if such exist, the manner of proceeding, and expectations regarding participation by the capitulars and others. International institutes or multi-cultural institutes must be sensitive but clear about expectations of participation to ensure the peaceful and orderly conduct of business.

Because of the nature of the institute or apostolic demands, some institutes prefer to hold a chapter of elections some months prior to the chapter of affairs, giving those elected to office time to prepare for the transition. Other institutes prefer to hold the chapter of affairs first, identifying particular directions for the institute and observing potential leaders during chapter discussions, and conclude the chapter with elections. The nature and tradition of the institute will determine how each institute views these pivotal events and incorporates them into its proper law.

The actual agenda and the manner of conducting business are determined by the members of the chapter after it has convened. A steering committee or a facilitator may propose certain approaches or topics for discussion, but the chapter itself decides both the agenda and the manner of proceeding, in keeping with its proper law. A chapter, however, may not alter for its own sessions any matter contained in the constitution, e.g., the composition of the chapter body. If some change in these constitutionally determined matters seems advisable, the chapter by a two-thirds vote may seek approval for the change from the competent ecclesiastical authority. For institutes of pontifical right the competent authority is the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life; for institutes of diocesan right it is the diocesan bishop of the diocese in which the general house is located. The changes, if approved, would become effective for subsequent chapters.

[51] See ES II: 15–19; ET 5–7 and 11, inter alia.

[52] See commentary on c. 625.

The final paragraph of the canon further illustrates the principles of participation and representation by providing every member of the institute the opportunity to voice his or her wishes and suggestions to the general chapter. Methods and vehicles for making known these concerns may vary from institute to institute and even from one chapter to another within the same institute. The nature of the issues under consideration, exigencies of time and context, and the institute's customary mode of operating will all influence this consultative process. Regional preparatory meetings, open hearings, written survey instruments, and other forums may be utilized to test proposals or elicit suggestions, but every individual member and any group of members has this legally protected right to send wishes or suggestions in writing to the chapter as a whole or to any individual delegate. Concomitant with the right to make such representation is the right to be heard. However, the chapter itself determines the manner of hearing, the disposition of these wishes and suggestions, and the shape of its own agenda.

Chapters of the whole, in which every perpetually or definitively professed member is a capitular, are the customary practice in some monasteries and smaller institutes, a practice which is incorporated into their constitutions. For a serious reason and for a particular general chapter, other institutes may seek a dispensation from their constitutions to permit the universal suffrage of all members with active and passive voice. However, a self-selected general chapter, i.e., one whose members comprise all perpetually or definitively professed members who so choose, violates the general principle and the right of all members of the institute to have a real and effective part in choosing the chapter members.[53]

Many institutes seek to encourage greater participation of all members in the work of the chapter. In addition to the above-mentioned vehicles for participation preparatory to the convening of the chapter, the institute's proper law may designate ways in which others may participate with the capitulars in the chapter deliberations, e.g., by active listening and prayerful support, by research and committee work, by discussion on the chapter floor. These others might include the general membership of the institute, associates and co-ministers in its apostolic works, experts on topics under discussion, and invited guests. However, only the capitulars, in whom the responsibility of protecting the institute's precious heritage is invested, vote on chapter matters.

Other Chapters and Assemblies

Canon 632 — Proper law is to determine accurately what is to pertain to other chapters of the institute and to other similar assemblies, namely, what pertains to their nature, authority, composition, way of proceeding and time of celebration.

Besides the general chapter, provincial, regional, or local chapters and other assemblies or gatherings enable members to participate in the life and direction of the institute.[54] If an institute is constituted with a provincial level of government or its equivalent, the constitution provides for provincial chapters. The manner of conducting provincial chapters and details related to other regular community gatherings are usually found in the institute's secondary document or in supplementary legislation such as provincial statutes or chapter enactments. The changeable nature of some other assemblies and institute-wide gatherings suggests a more flexible approach for such matters as their frequency, composition, and procedures.

[53] ES II: 4 and 18.

[54] The Eastern code does not mention other synaxes or assemblies, leaving their provision to the typicon or statutes.

This brief and quite general canon allows each institute great latitude in determining the nature, authority, frequency, and composition of these other chapters. Because they often deal with more regional matters and are often celebrated closer to local communities, they can energize a region or province, generating an enthusiasm and commitment which general chapters, because they are often at a distance, do not. Each institute must seek ways of gathering the membership in keeping with its own nature, spirit, and tradition.

Other Means of Participation

Canon 633 — §1. Organs of participation or consultation are to fulfill faithfully the function entrusted to them according to the norm of universal and proper law and to express in their own way the concern and participation of all the members for the good of the entire institute or community.

§2. In establishing and using these means of participation and consultation, wise discretion is to be observed and their procedures are to conform to the character and purpose of the institute.

The last canon in this section dealing with representation and participation offers both encouragement and caution regarding other organs of participation and consultation.[55] Such vehicles have a long and respected history in many institutes, often originating in their early days and incorporated into their customs and documents. Such participatory organs may be ad hoc or standing bodies, elected or appointed, local, regional, or institute-wide. Examples of such include boards of formation, dispute resolution groups, preference ballots, local community meetings, extended councils, planning committees, commissions entrusted with promoting justice issues, transition teams, finance councils, task forces, speak-outs, and opinionnaires. Their common purpose is to enable members to participate in promoting the good of the institute. These organs of participation should be congruent with the character of the institute and operate in accord with the universal law and the institute's proper law. They operate under the authority of the competent superior, in whom resides the responsibility to decide and take action after having considered all input.[56]

ARTICLE 3: TEMPORAL GOODS AND THEIR ADMINISTRATION [cc. 634–640]

The seven canons in this article specify and apply to religious institutes the general law of the Church on temporal goods found in Book V of the code. The norms in Book V generally apply to religious institutes but there are some exceptions. These two sections of the law must be read carefully. Wherever they differ, the norms for religious supersede those in the general law and, as in other situations, the constitutions of a religious institute approved by competent ecclesiastical authority take precedence over the common law.

The Church owns temporal goods, referred to as "ecclesiastical goods," in order to further its mission.[57] The code does not define temporal goods, but in keeping with the canonical legal tradition they are understood to include both material resources such as real property, whether moveable or immovable, and intangible or incorporeal things such as legal rights and obligations, titles, offices, annuities, as well as the more common cash, stocks, and bonds. The oversight or administration of these temporal goods is one dimension of governance in a religious institute. In carrying out their responsibilities, superiors and others sharing in the governance of religious institutes (e.g., councils, chapters, financial administrators) need to be knowledgeable of the universal law of the Church regarding temporal goods, the proper law of their institute, and any applicable civil law. The proper law of the institute plays an important role in determining how each particular institute witnesses to evangelical poverty, uses temporal goods, and administers its assets.

[55] There is no comparable norm in the Eastern code.

[56] Canon 618.

[57] Canon 1257.

The following canons deal only with those temporal goods belonging to the religious institute or another public juridic person, such as a province; they do not apply to goods or property belonging to an individual religious, which is dealt with in canon 668.

Capacity Regarding Temporal Goods

Canon 634 — §1. As juridic persons by the law itself, institutes, provinces, and houses are capable of acquiring, possessing, administering, and alienating temporal goods unless this capacity is excluded or restricted in the constitutions.

§2. Nevertheless, they are to avoid any appearance of excess, immoderate wealth, and accumulation of goods.

This canon recognizes the capacity and asserts the right of religious institutes, provinces, or local houses as juridic persons to acquire, possess, administer, and alienate temporal goods.[58] Local houses which have been formally erected in accord with canons 609–610 possess juridic personality and thus may own property. The formal erection of a religious house differs from the lawful constitution of a local community, as described in canon 608. Many apostolic religious institutes of men and women in the United States have chosen over the years to establish local communities but not to erect religious houses with the requisite formalities. The mobility of members, the centrality of the apostolic commitment of these institutes, difficulties with communication, and the like have been factors in such decisions. Consequently, many local communities or residences of apostolic religious are not religious houses with separate juridic personality and thus may not acquire, possess, administer, and alienate temporal goods in their own right.

An institute's constitutions can restrict or completely exclude its capacity to own property under canon law. Such a restriction may apply to the entire institute or to a part of the institute, e.g., provinces or local houses. In circumstances where a restriction or limitation on the ownership of property exists, the superior at that level administers the temporal goods in accord with the proper law, but ownership may belong at another level. In such situations the canonical obligations and corresponding restrictions pertaining to the property should be incorporated into any pertinent civil law documents.

Superiors and others responsible under canon law for administering temporal goods must ensure that their ownership is safeguarded through civilly valid methods.[59] In the United States this usually entails incorporation as a not-for-profit corporation, thus giving the institute, province, or house legal personality under civil law. In establishing the civil entity, care should be taken that the structure and distribution of powers in the civil corporation enable those responsible under canon law (i.e., usually the superior aided by the council) to act under civil law.

In the United States, religious institutes, provinces, and those local houses with the capacity for canonical ownership often choose to incorporate apostolic works separately from the religious institute itself. This can be done to protect the religious institute and its assets from potential liability, in recognition that an apostolate has matured sufficiently to assume additional responsibility and independence, as a step toward initiating a collaborative endeavor with another entity, or simply as a matter of policy. The separate civil incorporation of the apostolate does not affect the status of the property as ecclesiastical goods unless they are directly or indirectly alienated.[60]

[58] CCEO 423 asserts a similar capacity, while acknowledging the existence of exclusions and limitations on this capacity for some monasteries, orders, and the like. CCEO 424 urges the use and administration of property in keeping with the poverty of the institute.

[59] Canon 1284, §2, 2°.

The second paragraph of the canon provides the context for the capacity and right spoken of in the first paragraph. The exhortation to avoid all appearance of luxury and wealth is taken directly from Perfectae caritatis 13, which, in turn, echoes Lumen gentium 13 and Gaudium et spes 68–72 on stewardship and the use of the goods of this world. This second paragraph is directly tied to the exhortation against inappropriate use of material goods and finds its positive counterpart in canon 640, which urges religious institutes to give collective witness to poverty and charity. While individual members of an institute take the vow of poverty, those who administer its goods must do so in accord with its general purposes. Furthermore, the corporate body of the religious institute, province, or house shares responsibility for creating the conditions which support the living out of the individual member's vow of poverty.

Regulation of Temporal Goods

Canon 635 — §1. Since the temporal goods of religious institutes are ecclesiastical, they are governed by the prescripts of Book V, The Temporal Goods of the Church, unless other provision is expressly made.

§2. Nevertheless, each institute is to establish suitable norms concerning the use and administration of goods, by which the poverty proper to it is to be fostered, protected, and expressed.

Temporal goods are ecclesiastical goods or not depending on the canonical standing of the owner.[61] If the owner of the goods is a public juridic person in the Church, such as a religious institute or province, its temporal goods are, by that fact, ecclesiastical goods. Thus, all goods owned by a religious institute or province, whether religious in nature such as a shrine or a chalice or secular in nature such as real estate or an oil well, are considered ecclesiastical goods and are governed by the norms of Book V.[62] Conversely, temporal goods owned by an individual religious are not ecclesiastical goods because the owner is not a public juridic person.

The principles of stewardship, subsidiarity, and accountability permeate Book V and should be evident also in administering the goods of a religious institute. One example of the principle of subsidiarity, found in the second paragraph of this canon, is its emphasis on the institute's taking responsibility for expressing its particular charism. This paragraph links concern about the appropriate handling of ecclesiastical goods with concern for the special character of a religious institute. Each institute is to apply the general law of the Church, found in the following canons and in Book V, in such a way that the poverty characteristic of that particular institute is fostered, protected, and expressed. Community practices, the manner of acquiring temporal goods (e.g., begging), modes of sharing within the institute and with those in need, the balance of dependence and interdependence, and the like are to be integrated into the particular law of each institute.

Finance Officer

Canon 636 — §1. In each institute and likewise in each province which is governed by a major superior, there is to be a finance officer, distinct from the major superior and constituted according to the norm of proper law, who is to manage the administration of goods under the direction of the respective superior. Insofar as possible, a finance officer distinct from the local superior is to be designated even in local communities.

[60] See cc. 638, §1 and 1291–1296.

[61] Canon 1257, §1.

[62] CCEO 425 similarly subjects the temporal goods of religious institutes to the common norms for temporal goods.

§2. At the time and in the manner established by proper law, finance officers and other administrators are to render an account of their administration to the competent authority.

Another expression of subsidiarity in governance is the requirement of this canon that each religious institute and province divide the responsibilities entailed in financial administration.[63] Implicitly acknowledging that local communities may not have the capacity for distinct offices of superior and finance officer, canon 636 nevertheless urges that these offices be separate even on the local level to the extent possible. Similar requirements are made of other juridic persons in the Church.[64] Distinguishing financial responsibility from the general responsibilities of major superiors highlights the importance of specialized expertise in this work and, at the same time, checks the power of the superior. This is a specialized set of responsibilities, and the person who carries them out is to be a distinct person from the major superior, although the superior ultimately bears responsibility for them. In addition, this function is an office which presumes a certain stability; it is not a task assigned temporarily to one person and then another. The proper law of the institute often provides for terms for the financial officer, in a manner similar to but not necessarily concurrent with the provision for other offices such as secretary. Finally, the general admonitions regarding those named to office in a religious institute are applicable. In other words, they are to be truly worthy and suitable, and those responsible for naming them should have nothing in mind but God and the good of the institute (c. 626).

The canon does not indicate how the financial administrator is to be selected, but only that it be done according to the norm of proper law. The major superior may appoint after consultation with the council, but free conferral, appointment with the consent of the council, or election by a chapter or by universal suffrage are possible modes of selection. The manner of selection should maximize the probability of identifying a competent finance officer.

The qualifications for this office are implicit rather than explicit. The underlying dynamic is that the finance officer shares with the major superior the responsibility for the institute's temporal goods, with the finance officer acting under the direction of the major superior.[65] The finance officer should understand the requirements of both canon law and civil law regarding temporal goods, be skilled in financial administration, and be known for his or her personal integrity.

The canon does not state that the finance officer must be a member of the institute, and this silence, together with other factors, has given rise to a question on this point. Some commentators, believing that the office is internal to the institute, hold that the finance officer should be a member of the institute; others hold that any such restriction must be explicit.[66] Each institute should follow its own proper law in this matter pending further study.

At times, due to a dearth of qualified persons within the institute itself and the complexity of services required, the institute may look beyond its own membership to supplement the services provided by the finance officer. This assistance may take the form of contracted services from, for example, an investment management firm, a payroll company, or consultants. The institute may also hire salaried personnel, such as a comp-

[63] CCEO 447 and 516 make provision for a finance officer in monasteries and other religious institutes, respectively.

[64] See cc. 423 and 492–494 regarding diocesan financial administration and c. 537 regarding parish financial administration.

[65] See c. 1279.

[66] See, for instance, D. O'Connor and R. Smith, "Qualifications of a Treasurer in an Institute of Consecrated Life," in CLSA Advisory Opinions 1984–1993, ed. Patrick Cogan (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995) 178–179 and 180–181 respectively and Rincón Pérez in Pamplona ComEng, 440, who addresses the question for the local level only. For an opinion open to a non-member serving as finance officer see R. McDermott, "The Finance Administrator of a Religious Institute," in RRAO 1997, 58–59.

troller, an internal auditor, or even a director of financial services. In addition, some institutes establish financial advisory councils, comprised of both members and non-members skilled in various related fields, who assist the superior and the finance officer with their expertise and experience. Financial advisory councils are required for dioceses (c. 492), parishes (c. 537), and other juridic persons (c. 1280) and are common in religious institutes, but in religious institutes the council may serve this function, with specialized advice sought as needed.[67] However the finances of the institute are organized, the major superior ultimately bears responsibility for its financial administration.

The second paragraph of the canon articulates the principles of subsidiarity and accountability by requiring that the finance officer and other administrators render an account of their actions. The time and manner of doing so will vary depending on the size and nature of the institute and the level of responsibility of the administrators, but the institute should provide for this important function in its proper law. If the supreme moderator is expected to present a financial report to the general chapter, this should be articulated in the constitution or secondary document. Other reporting expectations may be more appropriately placed in provincial statutes, chapter enactments, administrative manuals, position descriptions, and other directives. An annual independent audit, or one done at regular intervals, provides a starting point for financial reporting. The finance officer of an institute, province, or local house which is incorporated under civil law may also have reporting responsibilities to various civil authorities, the fulfillment of which is understood to be a canonical requirement through the "canonization" of civil law (c. 1284, §2, 2°–3°). Other expectations enumerated in this same canon reflect good management practice and bind finance officers in religious institutes.

[67] See Comm 27 (1995) 102.

Accountability of Certain Institutes

Canon 637 — The autonomous monasteries mentioned in can. 615 must render an account of their administration to the local ordinary once a year. Moreover, the local ordinary has the right to be informed about the financial reports of a religious house of diocesan right.

The legal relationship between the diocesan bishop and a religious institute varies depending on the type of institute. He is to be especially vigilant regarding autonomous monasteries with no other external superiors and no jurisdictional link to other monasteries.[68] An institute of diocesan right is committed to his special care.[69] Canon 637 speaks generically about the financial aspects of this "special vigilance" and "special care."[70]

Each year autonomous monasteries, both of men and of women, are to submit a written financial report to the diocesan bishop; its content and format should be mutually determined by the bishop and the superior.

Diocesan institutes, both of men and of women, have a slightly different financial tie to the diocesan bishop. He has the right to be informed about the financial affairs of each religious house of diocesan right within his diocese. However, this does not necessarily entail the right to be informed about the entire institute, but rather the right to be informed about each house formally erected as a religious house within the diocese. This would include the general house if it is located within the diocese. The manner and content of this exchange of information are left to the determination of those involved, but it should be done in such a manner as to accomplish the intent of the norm, i.e., the exercise of vigilance or special care while still honoring the institute's internal autonomy.

The law itself does not indicate how controverted matters are to be handled. As a general

[68] See c. 615.

[69] See c. 594.

[70] The Eastern code has no comparable norm.

principle the code recommends peaceful means of arriving at mutual agreement, such as seeking common counsel, mediation by wise persons, and further study.[71] However, if differences persist, the institute always may take administrative recourse. While the bishop may curtail the apostolic activities of the institute within the diocese, he may not suppress it.

Extraordinary Administration and Alienation

Canon 638 — §1. Within the scope of universal law, it belongs to proper law to determine acts which exceed the limit and manner of ordinary administration and to establish what is necessary to place an act of extraordinary administration validly.

§2. In addition to superiors, the officials who are designated for this in proper law also validly incur expenses and perform juridic acts of ordinary administration within the limits of their function.

§3. For the validity of alienation and of any other affair in which the patrimonial condition of a juridic person can worsen, the written permission of the competent superior with the consent of the council is required. Nevertheless, if it concerns an affair which exceeds the amount defined by the Holy See for each region, or things given to the Church by vow, or things precious for artistic or historical reasons, the permission of the Holy See itself is also required.

§4. For the autonomous monasteries mentioned in can. 615 and for institutes of diocesan right, it is also necessary to have the written consent of the local ordinary.

This canon and the following one regulate the kinds of financial and business matters which superiors and finance officers might deal with in the course of their work.[72] These canons specify for religious institutes some differences from the common law on temporal goods found in Book V, highlighting the importance of the institute's proper law in defining roles and establishing limits in matters related to temporal goods.

Canon 638 indicates that each institute, in accord with its own character, nature, and condition is to distinguish in its proper law what is ordinary administration from what is extraordinary administration. Ordinary administration entails the conservation and expenditure of resources and the oversight of financial matters needed for the day-to-day management of the goods of the institute. Examples of ordinary administration might include such actions as meeting a payroll, depositing money in various accounts, overseeing an investment portfolio, and maintaining and repairing a building, even a general house. Extraordinary administration entails those actions, short of alienation, which the finance officer or other administrator may not carry out by reason of office or delegated authority and which require some additional form of authorization. Examples of extraordinary administration would be the expenditure of money above a certain set limit, the transfer of goods from one province to another or from one house to another within the same institute, the refusal of a gift or the acceptance of a gift with significant conditions, the replacement of furniture and equipment, or the renegotiation of a loan.

In a manner which is in keeping with the universal law, each institute must determine what is ordinary and what is extraordinary administration and clarify the further authorizations necessary before placing acts of extraordinary administration. Because of the great differences between institutes, what is extraordinary administration in one institute could be ordinary administration in another (e.g., limitations on expenditures). Similarly, some institutes reserve authorization for acts of extraordinary administration to the superior alone, while other institutes require the permission of the superior with the consent of the council. Still other institutes reserve to the chapter authorization for certain acts of extraordinary administration, such as the purchase or sale of certain types of property or a major renovation of the general house. Any act of extraordinary administration placed without first fulfilling the requirements for validity of the proper law is considered invalid in canon law.

[71] See c. 1733.

[72] The Eastern code has no comparable norm directed specifically toward religious institutes.

The second paragraph of the canon identifies who may place acts of ordinary administration. Such acts include incurring debt up to a specified limit and performing juridic acts in the name of the institute, such as entering into contracts, passing title to property, or managing investments. Superiors and finance officers by virtue of their office and other "officials" named for this purpose in accord with the proper law may act within the limits of their authority. Others who could be authorized to place certain such acts might include an investment oversight committee, a comptroller or bursar, a pension board, the director of the physical plant, and others. Each person or entity so authorized should be given, in writing, definite parameters and clear processes for additional authorization, when such is necessary.

The third and fourth paragraphs treat alienation of property, an act distinct from either ordinary or extraordinary administration. Alienation, as described in the third paragraph, includes both the conveyance or transfer of ownership and any other transaction by which the patrimonial condition of the juridic person is adversely affected. This broad understanding of what is subject to the norms on alienation of property specifies for religious institutes the common law for all juridic persons found in canon 1295. Among actions generally agreed to constitute an alienation would be the sale of significant property; the spending of assets for one purpose from an account/fund reserved or immobilized for another purpose, such as an endowment fund; entering into a long-term lease; effectively handing over the control or ownership of an institution to another group/board; borrowing a substantial amount of money; and taking out a mortgage.[73]

Certain norms are to be observed in order validly to alienate ecclesiastical property belonging to a religious institute, province, or house or to carry out any transaction which would adversely affect it. The first requirement for validity is that permission of the competent superior with the consent of the council be obtained in writing. This requirement differs from the general norm of canon 1292, which requires the consent of a finance council. For religious institutes the consent of the council suffices unless the proper law of the institute indicates otherwise. In addition to the written permission required by this canon, other requirements of the canons in Book V must be fulfilled, e.g., a just cause and at least two written estimates or expert appraisals.[74] If the intended transaction exceeds the current ceiling defined for religious institutes in the United States by the Holy See,[75] or if the items to be alienated are precious art, have historical value, or were given to the institute as a result of a vow, the Holy See's permission is also required for the validity of the act. For religious institutes the request for permission to alienate property above the limit established is transmitted to the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life together with the supporting documentation.[76]

Besides the information mentioned above and supporting financial documentation, a statement in writing is needed from the diocesan bishop. For diocesan religious institutes and for autonomous monasteries, this supporting letter should approve [73] F. Morrisey, "Ordinary and Extraordinary Administration: Canon 1277," J 48 (1988) 709–726; and "The Alienation of Temporal Goods in Contemporary Practice," Stud Can 29 (1995) 293–316.

[74] See c. 1293. The canon does not specify how many expert opinions are required, but the common opinion is that there must be at least two.

[75] Currently the amount approved by the Holy See for the dioceses of the United States and the amount approved by CICLSAL for religious institutes and societies of apostolic life in the United States are the same—three million dollars.

[76] A few religious institutes are subject to a different dicastery of the Holy See: institutes which are primarily missionary in nature and institutes belonging to an Eastern sui iuris church. These institutes request permissions for alienation of property from the CEP and the CEC respectively.

the anticipated alienation. Although the canon is silent about a similar requirement for pontifical institutes seeking permission to alienate property, the current practice of the Holy See is to request the opinion (votum) of the diocesan bishop before granting permission. The opinion sought is that of the diocesan bishop of the place of the property, given his responsibility for the pastoral care of the diocese.

If an autonomous monastery or a diocesan institute wishes to alienate property as described above and if the value of the goods to be alienated is below the maximum set by the Holy See, the autonomous monastery or diocesan institute must obtain the written consent of the local ordinary in order to alienate the property. For a diocesan institute seeking to alienate property located in a diocese other than that of the principal house (general house), the involvement of two local ordinaries is required. The consent of the local ordinary of the general house and the opinion (votum) of the local ordinary of the place where the property is located must be transmitted to the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life with the request to alienate and the other supporting documentation.[77]

Responsibility for Debts and Obligations

Canon 639 — §1. If a juridic person has contracted debts and obligations even with the permission of the superiors, it is bound to answer for them.

§2. If a member has entered into a contract concerning his or her own goods with the permission of the superior, the member must answer for it, but if the business of the institute was conducted by mandate of the superior, the institute must answer.

§3. If a religious has entered into a contract without any permission of superiors, he or she must answer, but not the juridic person.

§4. It is a fixed rule, however, that an action can always be brought against one who has profited from the contract entered into.

§5. Religious superiors are to take care that they do not permit debts to be contracted unless it is certain that the interest on the debt can be paid off from ordinary income and that the capital sum can be paid off through legitimate amortization within a period that is not too long.

This canon provides clear principles for assigning responsibility and possible liability which might result from the various business transactions undertaken by a religious institute, its officers, and its members.[78] The juridic person itself—the religious institute, province, or local house—is responsible for its debts and other obligations; responsibility does not lie with the superior whose permission was given to enter into those obligations. In other words, under canon law these are corporate, not personal obligations.

The second principle distinguishes actions taken on behalf of the institute from personal actions. If a member, even with the permission of the superior, incurs an obligation or loss as a result of a contract regarding some matter related to his or her personal property, the member, not the institute, remains responsible to meet the obligation.[79] In fulfilling these personal obligations a member may be required to use his or her personal property, if such exists. However, if a member incurs an obligation while conducting the business of the institute in accord with the directives of the superior, the institute, not the individual member, is responsible to meet this obligation.

This canonical principle is deceptively simple as stated but may have serious civil ramifications. For instance, if a member of the institute is assigned or missioned to a particular apostolate by the superior, it is sometimes difficult to distinguish between actions and liability for which the institute is responsible and those for which the individual member is responsible. Civil actions seeking restitution and/or damages have varied considerably in assigning responsibility. The proper law of the institute should distinguish clearly between personal and institutional responsibility.

[77] See c. 595, §1.

[78] CCEO 468, §§2–3 articulate some of the principles of this canon.

[79] The personal property of an individual member is governed by c. 668.

The third principle for determining responsibility is the simplest and the easiest to apply. Any contract or obligation entered into by an individual religious without the permission of the competent superior remains the responsibility of the member and not of the institute. Examples might include personal credit card or gambling debts, contracts or promissory notes related to one's personal property, or obligations for a child. The institute, province, or local house has no legal responsibility to assist in these matters, but the competent superior may choose to do so out of charity, to avoid public scandal or civil action, or to preserve the institute's name.

The legal principle contained in the fourth paragraph derives from the Roman law tradition and is applicable under both canon and civil law. Regardless of who is ultimately responsible for an obligation, legal action or redress can be brought against an agent, whether administrator, finance officer, or individual member, who has profited inappropriately from a contract. The competent superior or other official with standing in the institute is empowered to bring such an action. In situations which cannot be resolved internally and for which civil action is contemplated, prior written permission of the proper ordinary is required.[80]

The final principle of canon 639 is applicable to any administrator considering the assumption of a debt, but is directed as a general exhortation to superiors whose permission is required before the juridic person may encumber itself with a debt. Before granting the necessary permission, superiors should be apprised of the financial implications of the debt, ascertaining that the interest can be paid from ordinary income and the principal repaid within a reasonable time. Because religious institutes and their financial status vary greatly, so too will their ordinary income and what is considered a reasonable repayment time.

[80] Canon 1288.

Evangelical Witness

Canon 640 — Taking into account local conditions, institutes are to strive to give, as it were, a collective witness of charity and poverty and are to contribute according to their ability something from their own goods to provide for the needs of the Church and the support of the poor.

This canon acknowledges differences in culture, social location, and economic standing between institutes while at the same time calling all institutes to give corporate witness to charity and poverty (PC 13).[81] One concrete way in which institutes can give this witness is by contributing to the needs of the Church and the care of the poor. In so doing, institutes also witness to and build communion among the churches and within the Church.

This canon's exhortation to give a collective witness of charity and poverty can provide impetus for communal reflection on the institute's tradition regarding evangelical poverty and be an occasion for developing a communal consciousness regarding simplicity and moderation.[82] A spirit of generosity is to be encouraged among all members, but responsibility for sharing the goods of the institute with others belongs primarily to those charged with the care of these goods, i.e., superiors, finance officers, and other administrators. Any distribution of goods is to be carried out within the context of the norms on temporal goods and in conjunction with the obligations in justice which religious institutes have to their own members, to employees, and to others who depend on them.[83]

[81] The Eastern code has no comparable norm.

[82] All religious are called to evangelical poverty, moderation, and simplicity in accord with the charism of the institute (c. 600).

[83] Canon 1286, 2°.

CHAPTER III
THE ADMISSION OF CANDIDATES AND THE FORMATION OF MEMBERS
[cc. 641–661]

The renewal in religious life called for by Vatican II has focused attention on the importance of formation in the life of a religious institute. Several documents, beginning with the council decree Perfectae caritatis, including the interim legislation contained in the instruction Renovationis causam (1969), and culminating with the instruction Potissimum instituti (1990) which is devoted entirely to formation, have broadened, updated, and integrated the understanding of formation. Formation, understood as growth in the following of Christ, is a life-long process with physical, moral, intellectual, and spiritual dimensions. It begins even before a candidate applies for admission; in fact, the deepening faith and growing maturity of the candidate enables him or her to consider a vocation to the religious life.

Formation is no longer viewed as a series of detailed regulations to be observed minutely, but rather as a set of underlying principles to be adapted to the charism and nature of each institute and to the culture and conditions in which it is situated. Significant shifts evident in the revised norms on formation include insights from the behavioral sciences, recognition of the need for active collaboration of the individuals in formation, an extension of the period of initial formation, greater freedom for each religious institute to design its own formation program, and, for apostolic institutes, the inclusion of apostolic experiences as integral to the formation process.

New members are both the recipients and the agents of formation; the new members and the receiving community participate in a mutually enriching and growth-producing process. The future fidelity and vitality of a religious institute depends, under the action of the Spirit, on the quality and commitment of its newer members. Hence those entrusted with screening, admitting, and forming new members hold a sacred trust. Certain minimal requirements for admission, novitiate, profession, and initial formation are specified in the following canons, but considerable flexibility is left to individual institutes to apply, adapt, and augment these norms.

ARTICLE 1: ADMISSION TO THE NOVITIATE
[cc. 641–645]

Admission to Novitiate

Canon 641 — The right to admit candidates to the novitiate belongs to major superiors according to the norm of proper law.

Life in the religious institute begins with the novitiate. Admission to the novitiate is a significant event for the institute, for the candidate, and for the Church, and decisions regarding admission appropriately pertain to the major superior.[84] In institutes with an intermediate level of governance (e.g., provinces) the proper law determines which major superior validly admits to the novitiate. Similarly, the proper law of each institute indicates whether a vote of the council, deliberative or consultative, is necessary prior to the major superior's admission of a candidate. The major superior entrusted with admitting candidates should endeavor to have personal contact with the candidate, if possible, so that the superior's judgment confirms the recommendations of those who have been working with the candidate.

This canon, which empowers the major superior to decide regarding admission to the novitiate, complements and specifies canon 597 which speaks of the general or foundational qualifications for admission to an institute of consecrated life. Canon 597, §2 states that no one may be admitted without suitable preparation. In contrast to the 1917 code (CIC 539–541), which required a period of postulancy for all religious except those preparing for orders, this code is silent regarding what suitable preparation entails, thus permitting each institute to determine and incorporate into its proper law the manner in which candidates are to be assessed and prepared for admission to religious life. Recent Holy See documents have urged that candidates have some type of probationary period prior to admission.[85] Such a pre-novitiate preparatory period enables the institute to ascertain whether candidates have had basic catechesis in the faith and possess sufficient knowledge and maturity, the proper disposition, and the capacity to grow in assuming the obligations of religious life.[86]

[84] Within the Eastern churches, monasticism is the prototype and model of the other forms of religious life. Hence the Eastern code treats the phenomenon of religious life under three subdivisions: (1) general canons, (2) monasteries, and (3) orders and congregations. CCEO 453, §1 and 519 identify who admits to a monastery and an order or congregation, respectively.

Suitability of Candidates

Canon 642 — With vigilant care, superiors are only to admit those who, besides the required age, have the health, suitable character, and sufficient qualities of maturity to embrace the proper life of the institute. This health, character, and maturity are to be verified even by using experts, if necessary, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 220.

This canon, derived in part from Renovationis causam 14, reminds the admitting superior of his or her serious responsibility to ensure a candidate's suitability before admission to the novitiate.[87] In addition to the candidate's standing in the Church[88] and requisite age,[89] other issues to be considered are the candidate's health, character, and maturity. Each of these three criteria offers a continuum of possibilities, the assessment of which is to be made in relation to the nature of the particular institute.

The applicant's physical and mental health is best attested to by professionals credentialed in the respective disciplines.[90] Signed release forms allow the results of such tests to be shared with the responsible superior in the institute. Many institutes require applicants to present various medical evaluations including dental, ocular, and general physical, often using a reporting format supplied by the institute. Medical advances which now enable the detection of HIV infection, chronic or debilitating diseases, and certain genetic predispositions present difficult moral issues to those charged with drawing up admissions policies and recommending applicants. Issues of confidentiality, ongoing responsibility to the applicant to whom such information may be new, and concern for the good of the institute and its ability to assume long-term financial risk pose serious dilemmas to institutes which require this specialized testing.

Psychological assessments, commonly combining in-depth interviews and standardized tests, are widely used and generally found beneficial. However, institutes must choose carefully experts who understand and respect the religious life; these are the best suited to evaluate potential members. Protecting the confidentiality of test results and destroying such results when they have outlived their validity pose serious concerns when evaluating potential candidates. Results of medical and psychological testing should be used in a manner which fosters understanding and growth, whether or not the applicant is admitted.

Suitability of character and sufficient maturity can usually be established through less formal but equally effective means, including long-term contact with the institute or one of its representatives, visits to the applicant's home and ordinary milieu, and the candidate's frequent or extended participation in the life of the institute prior to admis-

[85] RC 11 and PI 43–44.

[86] RC 11–12, PI 42, and VC 65.

[87] CCEO 448; 453, §2; and 517 require that a candidate's suitability, intention, and freedom be ascertained before admission to a monastery or an order or congregation.

[88] Canons 597 and 645.

[89] Canon 643.

[90] Both Rincón Pérez and Williamson express some reservation about requiring psychological assessments on a regular basis. See Pamplona ComEng, 444 and CLSGBI Com, 355.

sion. The maturity required at this stage has both human and Christian elements, should be age- and culture-appropriate, and should evidence the capacity for growth in relation to the demands of life in that particular institute, e.g., the demands of community life.[91]

The responsibility of judging suitability for admission lies with the superior, who often relies on the recommendations of those religious delegated to screen and/or accompany applicants, the assessments of professionals, and other pertinent information. In seeking the information needed to arrive at a determination, superiors are admonished to consider canon 220, avoiding damage to the good reputation of both the applicant and the institute and respecting the candidate's right to privacy. At the very least, this requires superiors to make discreet inquiries and proscribes them and others delegated to assess candidates from requiring a manifestation of conscience.[92] What is sought in this gathering of information is a reasonable assessment of the candidate's capacity to live the life to which he or she is requesting admission and his or her commitment to that endeavor. Such an assessment is neither certain nor final; a candidate who is not admitted may reapply later, and one who is admitted will continue to be evaluated during the subsequent years of formation.

Impediments to Valid Admission

Canon 643 — §1. The following are admitted to the novitiate invalidly:

- 1° one who has not yet completed seventeen years of age;
- 2° a spouse, while the marriage continues to exist;
- 3° one who is currently bound by a sacred bond to some institute of consecrated life or is incorporated in some society of apostolic life, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 684;
- 4° one who enters the institute induced by force, grave fear, or malice, or the one whom a superior, induced in the same way, has received;
- 5° one who has concealed his or her incorporation in some institute of consecrated life or in some society of apostolic life.

§2. Proper law can establish other impediments even for validity of admission or can attach conditions.

This canon enumerates the five impediments of universal law which render admission to the novitiate invalid; the institute's proper law may add other invalidating impediments or conditions.[93] The five impediments of universal law are applicable equally to male and female applicants and to pontifical and diocesan right institutes. The existence of any one of these impediments, whether known or occult, invalidates the novitiate.

To be validly admitted to the novitiate, a candidate must be seventeen years of age (1°). However, prior to the 1983 code, the universal law permitted a candidate to be validly admitted to the novitiate at the age of fifteen. In the culture and context of the United States, both fifteen and seventeen seem young for the maturity presumed by such a decision; however, this minimum age for admission applies to all Latin church religious institutes in diverse cultures around the world. Individual institutes, however, may set a higher age for admission, in keeping with their own formation program and cultural milieu.[94]

An applicant may not be admitted to the novitiate who is bound by an existing marriage bond

[91] PI 42–43.

[92] Canon 630 protects the freedom of members of the institute from any pressure to make a manifestation of conscience to superiors. A comparable freedom is extended to those not yet members.

[93] CCEO 450 enumerates the requirements for valid admission to the novitiate of a monastery, and CCEO 517 lists similar requirements for orders and congregations.

[94] CCEO 450 and 517 establish eighteen as the minimum age for admission to the novitiate of an Eastern church monastery and seventeen as the minimum age for admission to the novitiate of an Eastern church order or congregation.

(2°). If the bond no longer exists, due to the death of the spouse or a declaration of nullity, the person is free to enter the novitiate. If the marriage has broken down but has not been declared null, or if a couple mutually agrees to renounce marital rights and relationships in order to seek admission to religious institutes, a dispensation from the Holy See must be sought.[95] However, before admitting an applicant from the annulled marriage or before seeking a dispensation from the Holy See, superiors should ascertain that the applicant has fulfilled all natural obligations resulting from the marriage, such as care of children, support of the former spouse, and fulfillment of debts. Furthermore, if the failed marriage was annulled on psychological grounds, the candidate may be asked for a written release in order to obtain further information from the competent tribunal regarding the annulment.

A person currently bound by vow or other sacred bond in an institute of consecrated life or society of apostolic life may not be admitted to another religious institute (3°). Freedom from such an impediment is achieved either by the expiration of the bond if it is temporary, or, if the bond is definitive, by an indult of departure from the current institute, which entails a dispensation from the obligations of the existing sacred bond.[96] A person bound by vows or other sacred bonds might also seek to transfer from one institute to another (c. 684).

The fourth universal law impediment to valid admission to the novitiate is the presence of force, grave fear, or fraud, either on the part of the candidate or on the part of the admitting superior (4°). Force means physical coercion, an uncommon circumstance in present-day North America; grave fear is a disturbance of the mind or the intimidation resulting from a perceived impending danger; and fraud means intentional deception in a serious matter.

This fourth impediment specifies for the juridic act of admitting to the novitiate what canon 125 requires for the validity of any juridic act. Since every juridic act is an act of the will, it must be a free act, which means that both the candidate and the superior must be substantially free from constraint. Force, grave fear, or fraud which diminishes or vitiates the freedom or knowledge of either the candidate or the admitting superior or both invalidates the admission.[97] This impediment requires that the candidate disclose honestly the facts about his or her life situation so that the admitting superior has sufficient knowledge on which to act.

The final code impediment to a valid admission concerns the concealment of one's incorporation in another institute of consecrated life or society of apostolic life (5°). By incorporation is meant profession of vows or commitment through other sacred bonds, even temporary.[98] The 1917 code (CIC 542, §1, 5°) established the fact of incorporation as an impediment. While this canon recognizes the seriousness of a prior commitment, it ties the invalidity to the dishonesty evidenced in failing to disclose such important information.

Paragraph two of canon 643 permits a religious institute to establish in its proper law other invalidating impediments to admission or other conditions for admission. Such impediments, as in the prior code, may be illegitimate birth, ongoing financial responsibilities, or the support of family members or other dependents. Institutes may also determine a higher age or an age beyond which a candidate will not be admitted, a requisite level of education or work experience, or other culturally related criteria. The proper law should clearly indicate whether such additional requirements are intended for validity or liceity. A dis-

[95] Circumstances giving rise to a decree of separation can be found in cc. 1151–1153 and 1692. See also CLD 9, 371–372; CLD 10, 112–113; and CLD 11, 86–90 for some individual cases. For a fuller discussion of the admission of a married candidate see R. McDermott, "Admission to the Novitiate: Canon 643. 1. 2°," Bulletin on Issues of Religious Law 7 (Spring, 1991) 7–8.

[96] Canon 692.

[97] Consent to marriage is similarly invalidated by the presence in either party of force, grave fear, or fraud. See cc. 1098 and 1103.

[98] Canon 654.

pensation may be sought from any of these additional requirements unless the proper law indicates otherwise.[99]

The canon does not address the implications either for the admitting superior or for the candidate should the candidate be admitted in the face of invalidating impediments. The 1983 code does not penalize a superior who acts contrary to the five invalidating impediments of universal law, as the prior code did (CIC 2352 and 2411). However, an invalid admission remains invalid and all subsequent acts dependent on a valid novitiate (i.e., profession, certain appointments, and elections) would also be invalid. To address such a situation, a retroactive validation, called a sanatio in radice, i.e., a making whole from the beginning, may be sought from the Holy See.[100]

Particular Cases

Canon 644 — Superiors are not to admit to the novitiate secular clerics without consulting their proper ordinary nor those who, burdened by debts, cannot repay them.

This canon gives supplementary regulations regarding admission to the novitiate for particular cases.[101] Superiors are to consult with the proper ordinary of a secular deacon or presbyter before admitting him to the novitiate.[102] The proper ordinary is the diocesan bishop of the cleric's diocese of incardination or, in cases in which the see is vacant or impeded, the requirement is satisfied by consultation with the vicar general, administrator, or other person legitimately acting in the place of the proper ordinary. The fact that the cleric has informed his proper ordinary of his intention to seek admission does not satisfy the requirement of this canon. The superior himself is to consult, either orally or in writing; written documentation of the consultation should be retained as part of the candidate's personal file. Such consultation provides an opportunity to become informed about the cleric's background and suitability for religious life.

A superior is not to admit persons with debts which they are unable to repay. If an applicant were habitually insolvent, a natural concern should arise about the applicant's responsibility, character and/or maturity, as well as possible scandal and/or liability involving the institute. However, if a set of unusual and untoward circumstances results in the candidate's filing for personal bankruptcy, the institute should delay consideration of admission, even for some years, until the candidate's financial affairs are in order.[103]

Admission of a person in either of the above situations is illicit, i.e., contrary to the law, but it does not invalidate the admission.

Documentation and Other Information

Canon 645 — §1. Before candidates are admitted to the novitiate, they must show proof of baptism, confirmation, and free status.

§2. If it concerns the admission of clerics or those who had been admitted in another institute of consecrated life, in a society of apostolic life, or in a seminary, there is additionally required the testimony of, respectively, the local ordinary, the

[99] See c. 85.

[100] The request for a sanatio is more common with regard to marriage. See cc. 1161–1165. With regard to sanating an invalid profession, Rincón Pérez opines that the absence of the prior code's explicit provision argues for the unavailability of such recourse. See Pamplona ComEng, 450. No opinion is given regarding the sanation of an invalid novitiate.

[101] CCEO 452, 454, and 517 indicate additional requirements for licit admission to a monastery, an order, or a congregation. CCEO 452, §2 names specific family obligations (e.g., children, parents, grandparents in need) which could prevent admission. Unlike the Latin code, CCEO 454 mentions the furnishing of a dowry where required by the proper law of the monastery.

[102] Since the sacrament of orders is not conferred on members of religious institutes or societies of apostolic life until after perpetual or definitive profession (c. 1019), these clerics are prevented from entrance into another institute by the invalidating impediment of c. 643, §1, 3°.

[103] Under United States civil law, filing for bankruptcy protection does not eliminate all obligations and liabilities.

major superior of the institute or society, or the rector of the seminary.

§3. Proper law can require other proof about the requisite suitability of candidates and freedom from impediments.

§4. Superiors can also seek other information, even under secrecy, if it seems necessary to them.

As part of the process of ascertaining suitability for admission to the novitiate, certain documentary evidence is gathered. This canon identifies the basic documentation to be assembled, allowing the institute to require other evidence either as a general practice or for a particular situation.[104] The burden of gathering this documentation is usually placed on the applicant, unless it concerns an unusual or confidential matter.

Before admission, candidates are required to show proof of baptism, confirmation, and free status.[105] Proof of the first two is usually established by a recent (within the past six months) and authenticated (with seal) certificate issued by the parish of baptism containing information drawn from the parish sacramental register. Official notations on the baptismal certificate attest to the fact, date, and place of confirmation, marriage, orders, and/or religious profession. If the annotations on the baptismal certificate are incomplete (e.g., the sacrament of confirmation was conferred elsewhere and not recorded at the place of baptism, the candidate was married outside the church, and the like) additional authenticated certificates will have to be sought from other parishes, dioceses, religious institutes, and civil jurisdictions.

Proof of free status is established by either the absence of any official notation on the baptismal certificate regarding marriage, orders, or religious profession or the presence of notations regarding the annulment of the marriage, an indult of laicization, or an indult of departure from a religious institute. In the case of a prior marriage, copies of the marriage license and civil divorce decree are also necessary to assure that civil affairs are in order. If some or all of the records cannot be obtained due to fire, war, or other upheaval affecting church and/or civil records, the testimony of one witness or even other proofs and testimony suffice.[106]

Besides the basic sacramental documentation and evidence of free status required of all applicants, a cleric or another person who was previously admitted to (1) another institute of consecrated life, (2) a society of apostolic life, or (3) a seminary must also present testimony from the respective superiors of those institutions. A cleric obtains such from the local ordinary, and others from either the major superior of the institute or society or the rector of the seminary. This official statement testifies to the fact of the applicant's prior admission to the institute, society, or seminary; it is helpful if this statement also gives a brief history of the person's life during that time and the circumstances of his or her departure.

In addition to the documentation required by the universal law, other documents, such as additional proofs of suitability and freedom of all applicants or only in certain circumstances, may be required by an institute's own law. This documentation might include official college transcripts, professional certificates or licenses, employment records, proof of military service or immigration status, letters of recommendation from the applicant's pastor or spiritual director, [104] CCEO 453, §3 and 519 address in a general manner the documentation and testimonials to be gathered prior to admission to a monastery or to an order or congregation respectively, leaving specific application to the proper law.

[105] Besides attesting to a foundational level of formation in the faith, certificates of baptism and confirmation may alert admissions personnel that an applicant is actually a member of a sui iuris Eastern church. The licit admission of such a candidate requires an indult of accommodation either from the head of the sui iuris Eastern church (i.e., the patriarch, major archbishop, or metropolitan) or, in the United States, from the apostolic pro-nuncio who may grant such an indult. For a brief discussion of this matter see J. Abbass, "Canonical Dispositions for the Care of Eastern Catholics outside Their Territory," P 86 (1997) 336–338.

[106] See cc. 876, 894, and 1547–1573 and c. 1707 for cases of presumed death of the spouse.

etc. Since applications from older, more experienced candidates are increasingly common in the United States, additional supporting information about the candidate's prior life and work is increasingly important.

The final paragraph of the canon gives superiors broad discretion in seeking whatever other information they may need to make an informed decision regarding the admission of a candidate. This does not entitle the superior to secret information, but rather allows the superior to seek other information under secrecy, i.e., without making known the fact or the circumstances of the inquiry. This inquiry may, of course, entail sensitive matters, and the superior must carefully observe the candidate's right to a good reputation and to privacy (c. 220).

ARTICLE 2: THE NOVITIATE AND FORMATION OF NOVICES [cc. 646–653]

Purpose of Novitiate

Canon 646 — The novitiate, through which life in an institute is begun, is arranged so that the novices better understand their divine vocation, and indeed one which is proper to the institute, experience the manner of living of the institute, and form their mind and heart in its spirit, and so that their intention and suitability are tested.

Life in a religious institute begins with admission to the novitiate.[107] The novitiate, a preparation for life in the institute, is an intense period of formation characterized by initiation into its life, mission, spirituality, and history; personal configuration to the paschal mystery; and discernment regarding the novice's vocation to religious life in this particular institute.[108] The novitiate and, in a less intense manner, the subsequent periods of formation allow the candidates to discover, assimilate and deepen their identity as religious.[109] During the novitiate the responsibility for growing into the institute's particular way of following Christ through an integral initiation rests both with the novices themselves and with those charged with their direction.

The initiation which characterizes the novitiate goes far beyond simple instruction. The location of the novitiate, its programs, instructions, experiences, and activities are all directed toward deepening this initiation and testing the authenticity of the call to a life commitment in this particular institute.[110] Each institute should have its own program of formation reflecting its own nature, charism, and spirituality.[111] This program should be grounded in the institute's way of life and should incorporate the fundamental principles of Christian and religious formation, but it should be flexible enough to be adapted over time to changing circumstances.

The Novitiate House

Canon 647 — §1. The erection, transfer, and suppression of a novitiate house are to be done through written decree of the supreme moderator of the institute with the consent of the council.

§2. To be valid, a novitiate must be made in a house properly designated for this purpose. In particular cases and as an exception, by grant of the supreme moderator with the consent of the council, a candidate can make the novitiate in another house of the institute under the direction of some approved religious who acts in the place of the director of novices.

§3. A major superior can permit a group of novices to reside for a certain period of time in another house of the institute designated by the superior.

[107] CCEO 455 and 520 indicate how the novitiate begins in a monastery or in an order or congregation, but the Eastern code has no norm comparable to c. 646.

[108] PI 47.

[109] PI 6.

[110] PI 47.

[111] See c. 659, §§2–3 and PI 4.

Besides being a program, the novitiate is also a place. Its location and circumstances, both critical issues throughout the history of religious life, testify to the importance of the novitiate experience for the life of the individual and of the institute. The three paragraphs of this canon govern the fundamental decisions regarding the location of the novitiate and the exceptions which may be made regarding it.[112]

The supreme moderator of the institute, with the consent of the council, has the authority to establish, transfer, or suppress a novitiate house (§1).[113] Even in large international institutes with numerous provinces, only the supreme moderator may take such an action, which is executed by means of a written decree.[114] If the novitiate is to be established as a new foundation, i.e., in a location where there is no other formally established house of the institute, the diocesan bishop must also give his written consent.[115] One novitiate or several novitiates may be established for the entire institute. For good reason, there may be more than one novitiate within a given province. The novitiate program should be conducted in a culture and language familiar to the novices to avoid cultural disorientation or language barriers which could obstruct the intensive spiritual journey which begins in the novitiate. This also enables appropriate vocational discernment by formators familiar with the culture. In establishing a novitiate, care should be taken that the house and environs be appropriate to the institute's collective witness to poverty[116] while still being accessible to courses and other means of formation. On the other hand, the novitiate community should not be located within an apostolic community totally inserted within a poor milieu because, at this stage, the demands of formation must take precedence over the apostolic advantages of insertion among the poor.[117]

The novitiate is generally made in a house designated by formal decree as the novitiate (§2). Several exceptions to this rule are possible which, with conditions carefully observed, provide both for appropriate accommodation to particular circumstances and for the conditions conducive to this period of intense formation. The first truly exceptional case involves a novice whom the supreme moderator, with the consent of the council, determines may make his or her novitiate in another house of the institute and under the direction of a religious who assumes the role of director of novices. Reasons prompting this decision might include age, language, culture, physical disability, or other circumstances, together with the conviction that the particular novice could not benefit fully from the program in the established novitiate. The religious selected to serve as director of this novice is not required to be perpetually or definitively professed as is the director of novices,[118] but the supreme moderator would hardly choose a temporarily professed member or a member in the process of transfer to direct a novice.[119]

The second exception to the general rule of conducting the novitiate in the designated novitiate house permits the novices as a group to be assigned to another house of the institute for a definite period of time (§3). A temporary relocation [112] CCEO 456, 521, and 522 provide norms for determining where the novitiate will take place for candidates for a monastery or for an order or congregation respectively. The superior of a monastery must consult with the council before locating the novitiate in another monastery; its consent is not required as it is for superiors of orders and congregations and for superiors in Latin institutes.

[113] The present legislation first appeared in 1969 in the special norms of RC 16–19, which gave to the highest superior the authority to determine the place of the novitiate, with the consent of the council. Prior to these norms, permission from either the Holy See or the diocesan bishop was required.

[114] See cc. 35–58.

[115] See cc. 609–612 regarding the erection of houses of the institute.

[116] Canons 634, §2 and 640.

[117] PI 28 and 50.

[118] Canon 651, §1.

[119] Williamson implies that the director assigned to an individual novice making novitiate in another house represents the director of novices but is not himself/herself the director. See CLSGBI Com, 358.

might be occasioned by the accessibility to a particular workshop or ministerial experience, a vacation at another house of the institute, some potential danger (e.g., environmental, political, criminal, etc.) at the novitiate house, or the opportunity to study the charism with other novices from the same religious tradition. The competent major superior makes this determination of venue and also designates the house; because this relocation is understood to be of short duration and not a change in location of the novitiate, the canon does not require the permission of the supreme moderator although the proper law may do so.

The third exception to the general rule pertains to apostolic religious institutes which may permit novices to have apostolic experiences outside of the novitiate house (c. 648).[120]

This canon presumes that a group makes up the novitiate community, a condition sometimes difficult to provide given the current dearth of candidates in some religious institutes. In order to provide a formative community, enrich the formation experience, and make the best use of human and material resources, many religious institutes participate in collaborative formation efforts. These efforts, some in effect for many years, take place both through permanent centers and through periodic services. In several regions of the United States where there are clusters of formation houses, novices often participate in weekly intercongregational programs on theological, biblical, ascetical, and developmental topics pertinent to initial formation.

In addition, in a few instances, institutes stemming from the same foundation and/or sharing similar charisms have established common novitiates in which novices from several institutes are formed. These collaborative efforts, which provide the one or two novices belonging to a single institute the benefit of the community, vitality, and stimulus of a larger group of novices being formed in a similar charism, tradition, and spirituality, are formally established and carefully supervised by the respective major superiors. Together the major superiors have sought dispensation from the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life from canon 651, which requires that the director of novices be a member of the novice's own institute, before establishing such a novitiate.[121]

Length of Novitiate

Canon 648 — §1. To be valid, a novitiate must include twelve months spent in the community itself of the novitiate, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 647, §3.

§2. To complete the formation of novices, in addition to the period mentioned in §1, the constitutions can establish one or more periods of apostolic exercises to be spent outside the community of the novitiate.

§3. The novitiate is not to last longer than two years.

Canon 648 indicates the minimum and the maximum time of the novitiate.[122] The experience of novitiate is not tied to a particular location, but rather to the group which forms the novitiate community, wherever it may be located. This shift from place to community is consistent with the prior canon which allows the novitiate community, at the discretion of the major superior, to be located for a time at a house of the institute other than the novitiate house. Also, the designation of twelve months, instead of the complete and unbroken year as previously required, may shorten by a few days the minimum required (with the possibility of 360 days instead of 365 in some instances). It allows for some flexibility in accommodating changed circumstances in religious institutes and in facilitating the integration of the unique calling to apostolic religious life.

[120] See commentary on c. 648, §2.

[121] Inter-institutional novitiates which have existed in the United States include the Dominican Common Novitiate near St. Louis, Missouri, the Sisters of Charity Collaborative Novitiate in New Jersey, and, prior to their foundation in 1991 as a single institute as the Sisters of Mercy of the Americas, a Sister of Mercy novitiate which had several locations.

[122] CCEO 457 and 523 stipulate the length of the novitiate for monasteries and for orders and congregations respectively and take cognizance of absences. Two significant differences from the common law for Latin institutes are noted: 1) there is a requirement for a full and continuous three-year novitiate for monasteries in which there is no period of temporary profession; and 2) specific mention of apostolic experience as part of the novitiate is made only for orders and congregations, not monasteries.

The second paragraph of the canon allows for periods of apostolic activity as part of the novitiate, a provision first introduced in Renovationis causam 23–25. Apostolic periods enable the novice to learn about and participate in the works of the institute; to experience community life as lived by its active, professed members; to come to know other members besides those in the novitiate community; to continue the process of integration of prayer and ministry; and to assess better his or her suitability to the life and ministry of the institute. If an institute wishes apostolic experience to be an integral part of the formation of its members, the constitutions should incorporate at least a general reference to this. The timing, location, content, and duration of these experiences are determined by the director of novices, within the parameters of proper law. The novice director also determines whether all or some of the novices are to be assigned to apostolic experiences, unless proper law determines otherwise. These apostolic experiences are to be selected because of their contribution to the formation of the novice and not primarily because of the needs of the apostolate.

Some candidates for the novitiate who are older and/or well established in their careers request a leave of absence from their positions to enter the novitiate. This arrangement assures the candidate of employment and some financial security should a decision be made to terminate the novitiate. A novice with a leave from the former place of employment may return there for his or her apostolic experience if the following conditions are fulfilled: 1) the work is related to the apostolic end of the institute, 2) the required twelve months of the novitiate have been completed, and 3) this experience truly contributes toward the formation of the novice for life in the institute, and the work is truly an apostolic activity.[123]

The maximum length of the novitiate is two years (§3), a time frame consistent throughout the change and experimentation of the last three decades. Acknowledging a two-year novitiate as normative, the code empowers the major superior, if the institute's proper law allows, to prolong the novitiate for up to an additional six months. This additional time may be granted if there is some uncertainty, either on the part of the novice or of the institute, concerning suitability for profession.[124] The norm of a two-year novitiate provides a reasonable time frame for discernment and decision-making, enabling the candidate to move forward with his or her life if the decision is against remaining with the institute or, alternatively, providing a solid foundation for the ongoing formation which will follow during the time of temporary profession and throughout the religious life.

Absence from the Novitiate

Canon 649 — §1. Without prejudice to the prescripts of can. 647, §3 and can. 648, §2, an absence from the novitiate house which lasts more than three months, either continuous or interrupted, renders the novitiate invalid. An absence which lasts more than fifteen days must be made up.

§2. With the permission of the competent major superior, first profession can be anticipated, but not by more than fifteen days.

Time spent in the novitiate is both gift and necessity. For those seeking to share its life, the religious institute provides the instruction, experiences, structure, support, and encouragement that will enable them to enter fully into the institute's life. This canon seeks to protect this period of intense formation, ensuring sufficient freedom, accountability, and continuity to accomplish its ends.[125] Any absence from the novitiate house exceeding three months (i.e., 90 days), whether continuous or intermittent, invalidates the entire novitiate, thus requiring an entirely new novitiate. Time spent within the novitiate community at another house of the institute designated by the major superior (c. 647, §3) and time spent on apostolic experiences (c. 648, §2) are not included when counting the invalidating three months. Examples of what might be included in those three months would be incidents of serious illness requiring hospitalization or recuperation elsewhere, family circumstances such as a parent's illness or death which would require the novice to go home, periods of military service, and periods of vacation or retreat which are not a part of the novitiate formation program. Any absence of fifteen days or more is to be made up, i.e., the number of days over fifteen is to be added to the length of the novitiate. However, common law does not require making up an absence of fifteen days or fewer.

[123] PI 48.

[124] See c. 653, §2.

There is another way in which the time of the novitiate may be shortened without any concern for making up the time (§2). The competent major superior may permit first profession to be anticipated by up to fifteen days. The major superior whose permission is required is the major superior competent to admit the novice to profession.[126]

Although this canon seems to emphasize numbers and the counting of days, its underlying concern is to protect the time set aside for novitiate from undue shortening or misuse. Perhaps even more so now than in the past, present-day circumstances require stability and a certain degree of distancing from former activities and relationships to enable the novices to enter fully and peacefully into the intense journey they have undertaken. In all these considerations the element of time plays an important role.

[125] CCEO 457, §2 and 523, §1 regulate absence during the novitiate. The Eastern code makes no provision for anticipating first profession.

[126] The superior competent to admit to the novitiate may not be the superior competent to admit to profession. The institute's proper law should clearly indicate both. See cc. 641 and 656, 3°.

Director of Novices

Canon 650 — §1. The scope of the novitiate demands that novices be formed under the guidance of a director according to the program of formation defined in proper law.

§2. Governance of the novices is reserved to one director under the authority of the major superiors.

This canon indicates the twofold obligation of the novice director: (1) to carry out the program of formation, and (2) to govern the novices.[127] It is a single responsibility with two distinct aspects. Each person enters the novitiate at a different level of human and Christian development, but brings a commitment to enter fully into the formation process and an expectation that the institute will provide instruction and direction and require certain things. The novice director serves as companion and guide in this mutual process in accord with the formation program determined in the proper law of the institute. Flexibility within the formation program and sensitivity and skill on the part of the director will enable the director to adapt the program to the needs of each novice, thus facilitating the spiritual journey.

The care and guidance of the novices are reserved solely to the director. Past practice, now modified, of physically separating the novices from professed members and of prohibiting communication between them, served to establish, inter alia, that the novices were under the exclusive direction of the novice director. With the greater interaction between professed religious and novices characteristic of current formation programs and with two or more persons often working together on formation teams, the well-being of the novices requires the clarity of a single, clearly identified person as director.

[127] CCEO 458 and 524, §3 indicate the duties and responsibilities of the novice director in monasteries and in orders and congregations, respectively.

The novice remains under the authority of the novice director as long as he or she remains a novice, even if temporarily residing elsewhere, e.g., during an apostolic experience, a vacation, or a home visit. Another member of the institute may be the superior of the house of assignment or the administrator of the apostolic work, but the novice director determines the parameters of the apostolic experience, the duration of the time away from the novitiate, and other elements of the novice's life.

The director of novices alone directs and governs the novices, but he or she in turn is subject to the authority of the major superior(s) of the institute, both as an office holder and personally, as a member of the institute. As director of novices, he or she is accountable for the formation program to the major superior who appointed him or her to the position. However, if the institute has a single novitiate in which novices from various provinces participate, the major superiors of the several provinces share with the supreme moderator responsibility for oversight of the novitiate.

The major superiors ultimately are responsible to see that the institute's program of formation is being carried out and that the novices are being appropriately directed. Major superiors need adequate information to be confident of the formation program and supportive of the director without interfering. For instance, a provincial superior from whose province novices are making their novitiate in a single congregational novitiate should be apprised regularly of their progress, and they remain free to contact the provincial superior. However, the provincial superior must be careful neither to undermine the authority of the director nor to interfere with the director's shaping of the formation process.

Formation Personnel

Canon 651 — §1. The director of novices is to be a member of the institute who has professed perpetual vows and has been legitimately designated.

§2. If necessary, the director can be given assistants who are subject to the director in regard to the supervision of the novices and the program of formation.

§3. Members who are carefully prepared and who, not impeded by other duties, can carry out this function fruitfully and in a stable manner are to be placed in charge of the formation of novices.

The director must be a perpetually or definitively professed member of the institute and be designated in accord with the law.[128] The first qualification seems self-evident, even minimalist; persons entrusted with forming new members in the life and spirit of the institute should themselves be steeped in its spirit and experienced in the many dimensions of its life. If an institute requires other qualifications for novice director, these should be found in its proper law. Additional qualifications might include a minimum age, a certain number of years in perpetual or definitive profession, or specific academic, apostolic, or spiritual experience.[129] Personal attributes should include an inner serenity, availability, maturity, patience, understanding, and a true affection for those entrusted to his or her care.[130]

The manner in which the director is designated is determined by the institute's proper law. Because this office is critical to the institute's life, the proper law often requires that the competent major superior appoint the director only after receiving either the advice or the consent of the council. The proper law of the institute may also indicate a term of office and/or a maximum time during which a person may serve in this office.

[128] CCEO 458, §1 and 524, §1 stipulate the qualifications of novice director for monasteries and for orders and congregations, respectively.

[129] Several qualifications from the 1917 code (CIC 559) no longer obtain, including the requirement that the novice director in a clerical institute be a presbyter. However, for Eastern church religious institutes, CCEO 458, §1 and 524, §1 require that the novice director be professed ten years. Furthermore, in a clerical order or congregation, he must be a presbyter.

[130] PI 31.

Depending on the number of novices, the circumstances of the novitiate, and the director's particular gifts, the director may be given assistants to help in implementing the program of formation. No qualifications are specified for these assistants, leaving the competent superior wide discretion in choosing them. They may work with the director on a full-time basis, or they may assist by giving certain instructions, by living in the formation community, by acting as consultants, or by any combination of responsibilities. However, an assistant to the director of novices holds an office and should be designated on a stable basis. The presence of assistants increases the gifts and skills available for the instruction and direction of the novices, expands the religious life models with whom they relate, and provides the possibility of a team approach to formation. Although the novice director remains responsible both for the governance of the novices and for the formation program, assistants can greatly enrich the quality of the formation experience. Besides those members of the institute who are named as assistants to the novice director, other persons—lay, clergy, or members of other religious institutes—may assist in forming the novices through educational presentations, reflection experiences, apostolic supervision, spiritual direction, or the like.

Because the novice director should be well prepared for this important work, some institutes have begun the practice of identifying the next director a year or two before the position will be vacant. This enables the novice director-elect to prepare himself or herself by study in theology, spirituality, or the history of the institute, by supervision in direction or counseling, or by whatever may be needed for the responsibilities ahead. Preparation for the ministry of formation is an arduous, time-consuming, and sometimes expensive endeavor. For this reason, larger and better established institutes are encouraged to assist newer foundations in this ministry by sharing members who are well prepared.[131]

[131] VC 66.

Upon taking office, the novice director should be freed of any other obligations which could impede the fulfillment of this primary responsibility. The novitiate is the place of the novice director's ministry, and any other responsibilities assumed would have to be flexible enough to allow the director to be consistently available to the novices. This does not preclude all other ministry, but cautions against obligations which could prove to be too time-consuming, emotionally draining, or geographically distant. In fact, limited apostolic ministry compatible with this primary responsibility may offer a beneficial counterpoint to the intense work of a director.

The Formation Process

Canon 652 — §1. It is for the director and assistants to discern and test the vocation of the novices and to form them gradually to lead correctly the life of perfection proper to the institute.

§2. Novices are to be led to cultivate human and Christian virtues; through prayer and self-denial they are to be introduced to a fuller way of perfection; they are to be taught to contemplate the mystery of salvation and to read and meditate on the sacred scriptures; they are to be prepared to cultivate the worship of God in the sacred liturgy; they are to learn a manner of leading a life consecrated to God and humanity in Christ through the evangelical counsels; they are to be instructed regarding the character and spirit, the purpose and discipline, the history and life of the institute; and they are to be imbued with love for the Church and its sacred pastors.

§3. Conscious of their own responsibility, the novices are to collaborate actively with their director in such a way that they faithfully respond to the grace of a divine vocation.

§4. Members of the institute are to take care that they cooperate for their part in the work of formation of the novices through example of life and prayer.

§5. The time of the novitiate mentioned in can. 648, §1 is to be devoted solely to the task of formation and consequently novices are not to be occupied with studies and functions which do not directly serve this formation.

Canon 652 describes in some detail the content and dynamic specific to formation during the novitiate.[132] Its fundamental purpose is to discern the vocation of the novices and to prepare them for life in the institute. The novice director has, in effect, been entrusted with the future of the institute. The director together with any assistants gradually forms the novices in its rich tradition and the perennial wisdom of the following of Christ while, at the same time, incorporating the unique gifts and future promise of each new member. While engaged in this task, the director must also arrive at a judgment about the existence of a religious vocation to this particular institute. Formation personnel must progressively evaluate whether each novice has the capacities required by the Church and the institute at this time and make appropriate recommendations to the responsible major superior.

The integral formation of the novice has physical, moral, intellectual, affective, and especially spiritual dimensions.[133] The second paragraph of this canon summarizes the areas to be included in the formation program of the novitiate. These include prayer and asceticism, study of scripture, practice and study of liturgy, understanding of consecrated life, the history and spirit of the institute, and an ecclesial awareness. The teaching function of the novice director will be fully engaged adapting this content to the different levels of human and Christian development of the novices. Any studies undertaken during the novitiate, whether for academic credit or within the novitiate house, should have for their primary purpose formation in religious life.

Formation is a collaborative enterprise engaging both the formation personnel and the novices.[134] Individual novices are primarily responsible for their own formation and are encouraged to participate actively in the formation process through spirited study and application, ongoing self-evaluation, and honest communication with the director. Ultimately, the novice must decide whether to request admission to first profession and bring the fruit of this formation to whatever way of life he or she lives out.

Although the novice director alone governs the novices and is responsible for the formation program, the other members of the institute bear a corporate responsibility for growing together and contributing to the development of new members. They do this by the witness of their lives, by their prayer, and by the general climate of community life to which they contribute and which in turn forms new members in the particular character and spirit of the institute.

The basic twelve months of the novitiate, i.e., the minimum period required by canon 648, §1, is to be devoted entirely to the formation of the novices for life in the institute. This will include study, prayer, manual or intellectual labor, and community experience, but all these activities should be directed toward the work of formation. Preparation for a profession, courses for matriculation, and purely secular study do not contribute directly to the formation which should mark this period and therefore should not be undertaken at this time. Even pastoral activity during this time should be assigned with the formation of the novice in mind rather than the needs of the apostolate or of the institute.

Departure and Termination

Canon 653 — §1. A novice can freely leave an institute; moreover, the competent authority of the institute can dismiss a novice.

§2. At the end of the novitiate, if judged suitable, a novice is to be admitted to temporary pro-

[132] CCEO 459 describes the content of the novitiate of a monastery and urges that novices be free of responsibilities which are incompatible with the novitiate. CCEO 525, §1 treats orders and congregations similarly. However, there is neither mention of the role of other members in forming novices nor explicit mention of the novice's responsibility to cooperate in this process.

[133] PI 33–35.

[134] RC 32 and PI 32.

fession; otherwise the novice is to be dismissed. If there is doubt about the suitability of a novice, the major superior can extend the time of probation according to the norm of proper law, but not beyond six months.

This canon discusses the several ways of terminating the novitiate.[135] In each situation the novice or the superior acts freely because the novice has no legal bond with the institute.

At any time during the novitiate up until first profession the novice may freely leave the institute, and the competent authority within the institute may dismiss the novice. The decision to terminate the novitiate usually entails mutual discernment on the part of both the novice and the director, reflecting the nature of the growing relationship between the novice and the institute. However, there is no obligation that such discernment take place or that the decision be mutual. Both parties are bound by the natural obligations of justice and charity which require kindness, truth-telling, and confidentiality at the very least. The superior competent to dismiss the novice and any internal procedures to be observed are to be found in the proper law. The superior competent to dismiss a novice is usually the superior competent to admit to the novitiate; some institutes require the advice or consent of the council before the superior acts. A record of the novice's admission to the novitiate and some indication of the circumstances surrounding its termination should be retained for future reference, should the candidate reapply to the same or to another institute or to a seminary.

When the time for the novitiate prescribed by the institute's proper law has been completed, the novice is either to be admitted to temporary profession or dismissed. If a novice's suitability for profession is still in question, the major superior may extend the novitiate for up to an additional six months. The question of suitability may arise from the candidate, the novice director, or the major superior; however, the recommendations of the formation personnel who have worked directly with the novice should weigh heavily in arriving at such a decision. The major superior competent according to the institute's proper law makes the decision to extend the novitiate, observing any requirements of proper law.

[135] CCEO 461, providing for the termination of the novitiate of a monastery and alternatives at its completion, is almost identical to c. 653. CCEO 525, §1 applies these same regulations to an order or congregation.

ARTICLE 3: RELIGIOUS PROFESSION [cc. 654–658]

In the Church's tradition, religious profession is considered to be a special and fruitful deepening of one's baptismal consecration.[136] By religious profession a person, responding to God's call, freely hands over his or her life to the following of Christ according to the way of life of a particular institute. Profession brings together the action of God and the response of the person, and the religious institute provides the context and support for living the call faithfully.[137]

Religious profession takes place during a liturgical celebration described in the Rite of Religious Profession; this rite, approved for use in 1970[138] and contained in the Roman Ritual, supplants all former ceremonials or rituals. The rite provides flexibility, however, to incorporate particular traditions and customs of each institute. In this rite the competent religious superior (whether lay or cleric), acting in the name of the Church and the institute, receives the vows of those making profession. The rite of profession ordinarily takes place in the context of the eucharistic liturgy, thus uniting the self-offering of those making profession with the eucharistic sacrifice.

[136] LG 44 and VC 30–33.

[137] See c. 607 and PI 10.

[138] The revised Rite of Religious Profession is dated February 2, 1970. See AAS 62 (1970) 553. The rite was translated by ICEL and was emended twice, in 1975 and 1984. The most recent edition in English was published by the USCC in Washington, D.C. in 1989.

Religious Profession

Canon 654 — By religious profession, members assume the observance of the three evangelical counsels by public vow, are consecrated to God through the ministry of the Church, and are incorporated into the institute with the rights and duties defined by law.

Religious profession has three distinct but inseparable effects: (1) members assume by public vow the observance of the three evangelical counsels of chastity, poverty, and obedience; (2) members are consecrated to God through the action of the Church; and (3) members become incorporated into a particular religious institute with all concomitant rights and duties.[139] In addition, a cleric being admitted to a religious institute is simultaneously incardinated into it and excardinated from his own proper diocese at the time of perpetual or definitive profession.[140]

Vows are considered to be public when they are accepted in the name of the Church by a legitimate superior; otherwise they are considered to be private.[141] In religious profession the vows are accepted by the religious superior competent according to the institute's proper law who acts in its name and in the name of the Church.

The common law does not identify or regulate which institutes will have their members profess solemn vows and which profess simple vows.[142] Instead, each institute identifies in its own proper law the obligations and rights resulting from profession. In some institutes the obligations and rights are equivalent to those formerly legislated for solemn vows, e.g., renouncing the capacity to own property. In the proper law of other institutes the obligations and rights of profession are equivalent to those formerly identified with simple vows, e.g., retaining the capacity to own property but renouncing its independent use.

The evangelical counsels of chastity, poverty, and obedience may be explicitly enunciated in the profession, or, in accord with the institute's tradition, they may be included by reference to the institute's constitution or its way of life. Some religious institutes also include in the act of profession an additional vow particular to their spirit and charism, e.g., a vow of stability or service of the poor. Each religious institute develops its own formula for profession which is included in its constitution; if the proper law permits, institutes may allow members to personalize the vow formula by affixing some additional expression of intention or devotion at the beginning or at the end of the common vow formula.

The obligations and rights assumed with profession may vary for those making temporary profession and those making perpetual profession. For example, in many institutes voting rights may be restricted for those under temporary profession. The obligations and rights acquired with profession include, but are not limited to, those obligations and rights enunciated in canons 662–672 which are further specified and elaborated in the proper law of the institute.

Temporary Profession

Canon 655 — Temporary profession is to be made for a period defined in proper law; it is not to be less than three years nor longer than six.

Temporary profession is a relatively new phenomenon in the history of religious life. It was first introduced as a common practice for Latin rite religious in 1857 during a period when new apostolic institutes of both men and women were proliferating, and the provision appears to have [139] CCEO 462; 469; 526, §1; 531; 533; and 534 regulate the effects of profession, whether temporary or perpetual, in a monastery, order, or congregation. Perpetual profession in a monastery or an order involves renunciation of goods and the capacity for subsequent ownership. Besides those effects specified for religious belonging to Latin church institutes, upon perpetual profession in an Eastern church monastery a member loses by the law itself any office he or she may have held.

[140] Canon 268, §2.

[141] Canon 1192, §1.

[142] Both solemn and simple vows are acknowledged but not defined in c. 1192, §2.

been directed toward giving institutes more latitude in screening out members.[143] With the 1917 code a three-year period of temporary profession became normative, but this period could be extended if, upon the completion of the three years, the member was not yet of age to make perpetual profession.[144] In 1969 Renovationis causam retained the requirement of temporary commitment prior to perpetual profession, extended the period of temporary profession up to nine years, and added the option of another type of commitment or bond at the completion of the novitiate, i.e., the making of a promise to the institute.[145] This alternative form of commitment was eliminated with the promulgation of the 1983 code.[146] Presently each institute in its proper law is to establish the particulars of temporary profession, i.e., length of profession, evaluation procedures, requirements for renewal, and the like, while remaining within the parameters of a three-year minimum and a six-year maximum.[147] However, canon 657, §2 gives to the competent superior the ability to extend the period of temporary profession for up to nine years in particular cases.

[143] S.C. super Statu Regularium, ency Neminem latet, March 19, 1857, in Collectanea in Usum Secretariae S. Congregationis Episcoporum et Regularium, ed. G. Bizzarri (Rome: Propaganda Fide, 1885) 853–855. See L. Iriarte, "Giving Support to One's Vocational Journey," Consecrated Life 21:1 (1997) 79.

[144] CIC 574.

[145] RC 7 and 34.

[146] On February 2, 1984 CRIS issued the decree Praescriptis canonum, which reiterated the provisions of c. 653, §2 and made provision for those religious currently bound by promises, some of which had been indeterminate in length, rather than temporary profession. AAS 76 (1984) 500; CLD 11, 91–92.

[147] CCEO 463, 465, and 526 provide for temporary profession in monasteries, orders, and congregations. However, in accord with their proper law many monasteries have only perpetual profession preceded by a three-year novitiate. In orders and congregations temporary profession is made for a minimum of three and a maximum of six years.

Validity of Temporary Profession

Canon 656 — For the validity of temporary profession it is required that:

1° the person who is to make it has completed at least eighteen years of age;

2° the novitiate has been validly completed;

3° admission has been given freely by the competent superior with the vote of the council according to the norm of law;

4° the profession is expressed and made without force, grave fear, or malice;

5° the profession is received by a legitimate superior personally or through another.

This canon identifies five requirements necessary for the validity of temporary profession.[148] The absence of any one of these requirements, whether known or occult, invalidates the profession. The first requirement, a minimum age of eighteen, is consonant with the minimum age of seventeen required for admission to the novitiate.[149] The proper law of the institute may require a higher age. The second requirement, the completion of a valid novitiate, presupposes that all the conditions for admission to the novitiate have been fulfilled. Furthermore it requires that the duration and location of the novitiate have complied with canons 647–649 and that any other conditions for validity required by the proper law of the institute have been satisfied.[150]

Temporary profession is a juridic act which alters a person's ecclesial status and brings into existence legal obligations on the part of both the person and the institute. For the candidate validly to make religious profession, he or she must be admitted by the superior competent to do so after [148] CCEO 463 and 527 provide norms for the validity of temporary profession.

[149] Canon 643, §1, 1°.

[150] A novice in danger of death who so requests may make profession although he or she has not completed the novitiate. Should the novice recover, he or she resumes the prior status as novice. AAS 15 (1923) 156–158 and Comm 15 (1983) 72–73.

obtaining either the advice or the consent of the council according to the institute's proper law.

To be valid, this juridic act of the superior must be free from coercion of any kind. The superior competent to admit to profession may differ from the one competent to admit to the novitiate; each should be clearly designated in the proper law of the institute. Any other provisions of universal or proper law, e.g., consultation with the monastic chapter, must also be followed. The formal act of admitting to profession follows upon the written or explicit request on the part of the candidate.

Further, for the validity of temporary profession it is necessary that the profession be made freely, clearly, and unambiguously. Usually this is accomplished by pronouncing the profession aloud in the presence of witnesses, but other modes of profession are possible, e.g., written profession for someone unable to speak. Because profession is an act of the will requiring the consent of the candidate, any force, grave fear, or deceit on the part of the candidate invalidates the act.[151]

Finally, the profession must be received by the superior competent according to the proper law either personally or through one delegated to receive the profession. Contrary to prior practice in some religious institutes, especially diocesan religious institutes, it is not the bishop or the priest presiding at the liturgy who receives the profession, but the superior competent according to the proper law of the institute.

Renewal of Profession and Perpetual Profession

Canon 657 — §1. When the period for which profession was made has elapsed, a religious who freely petitions and is judged suitable is to be admitted to renewal of profession or to perpetual profession; otherwise, the religious is to depart.

§2. If it seems opportune, however, the competent superior can extend the period of temporary profession according to proper law, but in such a way that the total period in which the member is bound by temporary vows does not exceed nine years.

§3. Perpetual profession can be anticipated for a just cause, but not by more than three months.

Canon 657 regulates the renewal, extension, and termination of temporary profession and provides for the anticipation of perpetual or definitive profession.[152] This canon should be read in conjunction with the proper law of the institute which specifies these matters for the particular institute.

At the completion of the period of temporary profession the common law provides three options: (1) renewal of temporary profession, (2) commitment by perpetual or definitive profession, or (3) departure from the institute. Each action has juridic consequences. The possibility or requirement of renewal of temporary profession,[153] its duration, and procedures for admission to renewal of vows are governed by the institute's proper law. Since the period of temporary profession is intended to be a time of continuing formation, an assessment of suitability is important at each juncture. Expectations and goals are reviewed with the candidate, ministerial growth is [151] See commentary on c. 643, §1, 4°. Under the 1917 code the bishop or his delegate usually visited institutes of women religious and privately interviewed each candidate for profession to ensure that she was requesting profession freely and with an adequate understanding of the obligations entailed.

[152] CCEO 526, §2 governs admission to renewal of temporary profession in an order or congregation, c. 546, §1 protects the freedom to leave the order or congregation at the expiration of temporary profession, and c. 547, §1 regulates the exclusion of a member in temporary vows from subsequent profession. CCEO 463 and 465 apply these same regulations to monasteries in which temporary profession is customary in accord with their proper law. No provision is made for anticipation of perpetual profession.

[153] In some institutes members make annual vows during the period of temporary profession, thus requiring at least three successive professions before the religious is eligible to make perpetual profession.

assessed for members of active apostolic institutes, and the local community in which the temporarily professed member has lived frequently participates in the evaluative process in some manner. Following the candidate's request for renewal of profession, the competent superior, acting in accord with the proper law, may admit the member to renewal.

The second option at the completion of the period of temporary profession is perpetual or definitive profession. If the requisite minimum of three years in temporary profession has elapsed and if the proper law of the institute permits, the candidate may request perpetual or definitive profession. Ongoing direction and evaluation are expected components of the formation process during the entire period of temporary profession, but most institutes provide for a special evaluation and discernment prior to the recommendation of the formation personnel and the decision of the competent superior. Once the decision to admit has been conveyed to the member, a time of immediate preparation usually precedes the actual profession, in accord with the institute's proper law and program of formation.

The decision to exclude a member from subsequent profession, whether temporary or perpetual, requires a just cause and consultation with the council.[154] The proper law may specify requirements or guidelines in addition to those required by the common law. The decision not to admit to subsequent profession is not a dismissal per se which is considered to be punitive in nature,[155] but it has many legal effects similar to dismissal. Although the final decision belongs to the competent superior in accord with the proper law, a decision not to admit a candidate to subsequent profession, either temporary or perpetual (definitive), should not, in justice, come as a surprise to the candidate. Written documentation in the candidate's file, copies of which have been made available to the candidate, should presage and support the decision.

A member's decision not to request either renewal of temporary profession or perpetual or definitive profession or the superior's decision not to admit the member results necessarily in the third alternative, i.e., departure from the institute. This development at the expiration of temporary profession terminates the legal bond between the institute and the member, now no longer a religious.

The second paragraph of the canon gives to the competent superior the freedom to extend, in particular cases, the time designated in the proper law for temporary profession.[156] Unless the proper law states otherwise, the superior determines whether an extension is to be granted, as well as its duration. The extension may be for a few months, a year, or longer provided that the total time in temporary profession does not exceed nine years. Reasons for extension might include uncertainty on the part of either the member or the institute regarding a permanent commitment, the desire for more apostolic experience, the member's young age, the necessity of completing certain components of the formation program, etc.

The final paragraph of the canon affords the religious institute some flexibility in determining the actual date of profession. The perpetual or definitive profession may be anticipated by up to three months if there is just cause. This canon provides an exception to canon 655, allowing the minimum period of three years in temporary profession to be shortened by up to three months. Examples of a just cause which might occasion the anticipation of a perpetual or definitive profession might include the demands of an apostolate or of an institute of higher learning at which the member is a student, the advantage of celebrating profession on a particular community feast or during a particular liturgical season, the constraints of immigration law, or the like.

[154] Canon 689 deals with the causes and procedures related to exclusion of members under temporary profession from subsequent profession.

[155] For the dismissal of a member, even one in temporary profession, c. 689 requires a cause which is sufficiently serious, external, imputable, and juridically proven.

[156] In contrast to RC 37, which permitted nine years in temporary profession for all members if the religious institute so chose, the current law allows nine years only by way of exception.

This canon speaks only of anticipating perpetual or definitive profession; it does not address the question of anticipating the renewal of temporary profession. However, since some flexibility is accorded to the competent superior in a more serious matter (i.e., anticipating perpetual or definitive profession), presumably renewal of temporary profession, a lesser matter, could also be anticipated up to the same amount of time (three months) and for a similar just cause.[157]

Two other expectations related to perpetual or definitive profession are found in other sections of the code. Canon 668, §1 requires that religious execute a will valid in civil law at least before perpetual or definitive profession.[158] Such a will provides for any property which the religious possesses at the time or might later inherit. Many religious institutes require that this will be executed prior to first profession or as soon thereafter as the religious is of age to do so.

A second concern is the obligation of the religious institute to notify the parish of baptism of the perpetual or definitive profession of any of its members (c. 535, §2).[159] The institute should also notify the parish of baptism of any subsequent indult of departure, as the parish records should accurately reflect the person's canonical status.

[157] RI 35. The 1917 code explicitly allowed the anticipation of temporary profession by up to one month, but did not permit anticipation of perpetual or definitive profession (CIC 577, §2).

[158] CCEO 530 similarly requires that members of orders and congregations execute a will valid in civil law at least prior to perpetual profession. Before perpetual monastic profession members must renounce ownership of all goods while any subsequent goods acquired by the member accrue to the monastery (CCEO 467–468).

[159] CCEO 470 and 535, §2 require notifying as soon as possible the pastor of the parish in which the baptism is recorded.

Validity of Perpetual Profession

Canon 658 — In addition to the conditions mentioned in can. 656, nn. 3, 4, and 5 and others imposed by proper law, the following are required for the validity of perpetual profession:

1° the completion of at least twenty-one years of age;

2° previous temporary profession of at least three years, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 657, §3.

To the requirements for a valid temporary profession already enumerated in canon 656, 3°–5°, this canon adds two additional requirements for a valid perpetual or definitive profession.[160] For this kind of permanent commitment the member must be at least twenty-one years old and must have completed at least three years in temporary profession, allowing for the anticipation of perpetual or definitive profession (c. 657, §3). If any of these five requirements is lacking, the profession is invalid.

With the minimum age of eighteen required for admission to temporary profession and the minimum requirement of three years in temporary profession, the only circumstance in which the minimum age of twenty-one for perpetual or definitive profession might be an issue would occur if the perpetual or definitive profession were anticipated (c. 657, §3). Such a convergence of circumstances would be unusual and, if deemed appropriate, a dispensation from the minimum age of twenty-one could be sought from the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life for pontifical institutes or from the diocesan bishop for diocesan institutes.

To these basic requirements for validity of perpetual or definitive profession found in canons 656 and 658, the proper law of a religious institute may add other requirements for validity.

[160] CCEO 464 gives norms for the validity of perpetual monastic profession and CCEO 532 regulates perpetual profession in orders and congregations.

Article 4: The Formation of Religious [cc. 659–661]

The three canons in this article deal with the post-novitiate formation of religious. The purpose of all formation is to enable persons to discover and then to assimilate and deepen their identity as religious.[161] While initial formation is directed toward assisting the person to discern his or her vocation and to acquire sufficient understanding and autonomy for living the religious commitment, ongoing formation assists the religious to become increasingly open to the Spirit through attentiveness to the "signs of the times," to deepen fidelity to the charism, and to integrate and develop these movements through dynamic growth in the concrete circumstances of life.[162]

This article on formation for all religious is an innovation with this code; previously only the formation of those religious destined for ordination was addressed. Formation is now understood as a right and an obligation for all religious and a life-long and co-responsible process.

Continuing Formation

Canon 659 — §1. In individual institutes the formation of all the members is to be continued after first profession so that they lead the proper life of the institute more fully and carry out its mission more suitably.

§2. Therefore, proper law must define the program of this formation and its duration, attentive to the needs of the Church and the conditions of people and times, insofar as the purpose and character of the institute require it.

§3. Universal law and the program of studies proper to the institute govern the formation of members who are preparing to receive holy orders.

The first paragraph of this canon identifies the dual focus of formation in a religious institute: living fully the life of the particular institute and participating suitably in its mission. First profession inaugurates a new phase of formation in which the fruits of the novitiate are reaped and human and spiritual growth continues.[163] This period benefits from both the dynamism and the stability of the recent commitment.[164] Members in temporary profession continue in formation following a definite program outlined in the proper law of the institute. Its format, scope, and duration will vary from institute to institute inspired by the institute's charism and in keeping with its purpose and character.[165] Formation at this stage will include establishing a basic theological and philosophical foundation if that has not already been done, preparation for and integration of apostolic ministry, and spiritual guidance directed toward the discernment of God's action in the person and in the world. The institute also has the responsibility of providing favorable conditions for growth in consecrated life, a formative community life, and competent directors.[166]

The third paragraph of the canon addresses the formation of those religious preparing for ordination. Besides being formed as religious they are also formed in accord with the universal law and the institute's own law regarding preparation for ordained ministry.[167] The conciliar teachings regarding the preparation of priests are concretized in canons 242–264, and the NCCB has developed

[161] PI 6.

[162] PI 67 and VC 69–70.

[163] CCEO 471 and 536 address continuing formation in monasteries and in orders and congregations, respectively. Neither canon specifically addresses the period following first profession. Those members preparing for ordained ministry are governed by the canons on the formation of clerics, especially CCEO 330 and 340.

[164] PI 59 and VC 68.

[165] For instance, PI 75 states that formation in contemplative religious institutes will be less intensive and more informal than that in apostolic religious institutes because of the stability of the members and the absence of outside activities in contemplative religious institutes.

[166] PI 60.

[167] CCE, Ratio fundamentalis institutionis sacerdotalis ad normam Novi Codicis Iuris Canonici Recognita (Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1985), AAS 62 (1970) 321–365.

in its Program of Priestly Formation norms adapted to the pastoral situation in the United States.[168] Although the entire formation of priests and deacons is imbued with a pastoral dimension, the pastoral formation of those in religious institutes should be adapted to the end of their institute, thereby fostering in them the gift which their respective institute is to the Church.[169]

Components of Continuing Formation

Canon 660 — §1. Formation is to be systematic, adapted to the capacity of the members, spiritual and apostolic, doctrinal and at the same time practical. Suitable degrees, both ecclesiastical and civil, are also to be obtained when appropriate.

§2. During the time of this formation, offices and tasks which may impede it are not to be entrusted to the members.

This canon offers guidance for the formation of those in temporary profession and those preparing for ministry, both ordained and nonordained.[170] It places the burden of organization, content, duration, and cultural and pedagogical adaptation of formation on the institute.[171] In accord with canon 659, §2, each institute is to have its own program of formation which is to be systematic, accessible to those being formed, and holistic. It should include spiritual, apostolic, doctrinal, and practical elements and should ordinarily lead to accreditation in the form of professional degrees and certification in the proposed areas of ministry.

This extended period of formation can be both rich and rigorous; those immersed in it need time for reflection and integration to benefit fully. Those in formation should be left free from other responsibilities which are not compatible with the expectations of the formation program. Even members who entered the institute with their professional preparation completed are still in formation during this time and they need to participate fully in the formation program, i.e., theological and scriptural study, apostolic experience, pastoral reflection and integration, and spiritual development. Apostolic commitments, ecclesial and social experiences, and academic study all need to be harmonized with the rest of the program for this stage of formation.[172]

Responsibility for Continuing Formation

Canon 661 — Through their entire life, religious are to continue diligently their spiritual, doctrinal, and practical formation. Superiors, moreover, are to provide them with the resources and time for this.

This brief norm captures one of the signal conciliar contributions to the renewal of religious life, calling for life-long formation for all religious.[173] Continuing formation, whether in apostolic or contemplative institutes, is an intrinsic requirement of religious life; no religious can claim to be completely conformed to Christ, and therefore none is exempt from the obligation of striving for human and spiritual maturity.[174] Each institute is to have as an integrated part of its formation program a plan which addresses the whole of life, is grounded in the institute's charism[175] and respon-

[168] Bishops' Committee on Priestly Formation, Program of Priestly Formation, November 1992, 4th ed. (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1993). Both the canons and the PPF address the spiritual, pastoral, theological, philosophical, doctrinal, scriptural, and ecumenical formation of those preparing for ordained ministry.

[169] VC 105.

[170] CCEO, 471, §1 briefly specifies the purposes of continuing formation for monasteries.

[171] PI 60 identifies this burden as a grave responsibility of the institute.

[172] PC 18 cautioned against assigning a religious to an apostolic ministry immediately after the novitiate. See also PI 62–65.

[173] PC 18 and ES II: 15–19. The Eastern code has no comparable norm.

[174] VC 69.

[175] VC 68; MR 11 speaks of the charism as a gift of the Spirit to the founder/foundress, which is to be transmitted to the followers to be lived, deepened, and developed.

sive to the signs of the Spirit, and leads toward conversion of heart.

Formation is a dynamic process with intellectual, spiritual, apostolic, and physical dimensions. Religious superiors must provide encouragement, leadership,[176] resources, and time for this process to continue, but the individual religious have the primary responsibility to take advantage of formation opportunities and dispose themselves to the action of the Spirit.

CHAPTER IV
THE OBLIGATIONS AND RIGHTS OF INSTITUTES AND THEIR MEMBERS
[cc. 662–672]

This chapter contains some, but not all, of the obligations and rights of religious institutes and their members. Besides those obligations and rights articulated here, other obligations and rights pertinent to religious institutes and their members can be found in the canons on the obligations and rights of all the Christian faithful (cc. 208–223); those of the ordained (cc. 273–289); the fundamental rights and obligations assumed with profession of the evangelical counsels (cc. 598–601); the basic autonomy of life pertaining to each institute (c. 586); the expectation that each member participate in the life of the institute (cc. 631–633), and certain procedural protections for both the institute and the members. In addition, other obligations and rights arising from particular responsibilities as religious can be found in the canons on juridic persons, temporal goods, the teaching office of the church, and the like.

The institute's proper law is important in the norms of this chapter as it has been elsewhere. Many canons in this chapter enunciate a general principle and leave its application or specification to the particular institute. The contemporary diversity among religious institutes reflects the shift from the uniformity characteristic of preconciliar legislation to the more charism-specific expressions evident in the life and ministry of religious institutes today.

The phrases "rights and obligations" and "obligations and rights" are used interchangeably in various parts of the code.[177] In several of the following canons, as elsewhere in the code, the positing of an obligation gives rise implicitly to a right to the means of fulfilling it, e.g., time, information, opportunity, etc. All rights and obligations in the Church are grounded in the fundamental equality of the people of God and are understood in the context of the Church as a communio. Rights and obligations of religious institutes and of individual religious likewise are derived from the fundamental equality of all members before God and within the institute. The exercise of rights and obligations is moderated by the communal nature of a religious institute and its place within the larger ecclesial communion.[178] Rights and obligations, therefore, are claims in community and claims of community.

Following of Christ

Canon 662 — Religious are to have as the supreme rule of life the following of Christ proposed in the gospel and expressed in the constitutions of their own institute.

This canon expresses succinctly the Church's fundamental understanding of religious life as the following of Christ in a particular way.[179] The wording is taken from Perfectae caritatis 2, [176] PI 71 states that superiors should designate a member of the institute to be responsible for continuing formation.

[177] See, for instance, cc. 212, §3; 223; 226, §2; 231; 278; 793; and 794.

[178] See c. 223.

[179] The Eastern code does not contain a separate section delineating the rights and obligations of members and of religious institutes. Instead, the articulation of obligations and rights is interspersed throughout title XII, chapter 1: Monks and Other Religious (CCEO 410–572). CCEO 410 refers to the religious state as a closer following of Christ, and CCEO 433, §1 identifies the monastery as the place where members strive toward evangelical perfection by observing the rules and tradiwhich states that the following of Christ as set forth in the gospel is the purpose of religious life and its supreme law, i.e., both its means and its goal. Each institute expresses in its constitutions the particular way in which it expresses and witnesses to that following of Christ, in accord with the gift it has been given.[180] The following of Christ, however, includes not only the obvious external obligations assumed with the evangelical counsels and the specific expectations of a particular rule, but moves beyond them to interior conversion of heart and mind, a gradual and life-long process.

Spiritual Exercises

Canon 663 — §1. The first and foremost duty of all religious is to be the contemplation of divine things and assiduous union with God in prayer.

§2. Members are to make every effort to participate in the eucharistic sacrifice daily, to receive the most sacred Body of Christ, and to adore the Lord himself present in the sacrament.

§3. They are to devote themselves to the reading of sacred scripture and mental prayer, to celebrate worthily the liturgy of the hours according to the prescripts of proper law, without prejudice to the obligation for clerics mentioned in can. 276, §2, n. 3, and to perform other exercises of piety.

§4. With special veneration, they are to honor the Virgin Mother of God, the example and protector of all consecrated life, also through the marian rosary.

§5. They are to observe faithfully an annual period of sacred retreat.

The way of life articulated in the previous canon needs to be nourished by an intentional and affective relationship with God. This canon reflects the importance of prayer in the religious life and presents a series of recommendations (with one exception) encouraging religious to avail themselves of authentic sources of Christian spirituality which, with time and grace, lead toward greater union with God.[181] The canon is framed as a series of duties, but it could as easily be framed as a series of rights, for the end result of all the recommended exercises is dependent upon the interior disposition of the individual religious.[182] The individual religious is primarily responsible for fulfilling the exhortations enunciated in this canon since religious, like other adults in the Church, are presumed capable, knowledgeable, and responsible for their own actions. Comparable exhortations regarding the spiritual exercises of clerics and seminarians are found elsewhere in the code.[183]

Vatican Council II taught that the Eucharist is both the summit and source of the Christian life;[184] religious, who belong to the life and holiness of the Church, are encouraged to make every effort to participate as fully as possible in this central salvific event. This second paragraph of the canon also reflects the Church's current teaching regarding receiving communion as often as one participates in the liturgy, and it suggests a balanced approach to the reservation and adoration of the sacrament. While enunciating an ideal toward which the religious is to strive, the canon implicitly acknowledges that certain circumstances may preclude its fulfillment, e.g., the demands of the apostolate, geographic distance, ill health, personal dispositions, lack of ministers, etc.

The third and fourth paragraphs of the canon urge that religious regularly use the various means available for expressing devotion and growing in union with God. The reading of sacred scripture, a practice not generally encouraged in the past, is here recommended for religious. Mental prayer or tions of the monastic life. No comparable statement is given regarding other religious.

[180] See c. 577.

[181] CCEO 473 and 538 identify the religious exercises expected of monks and other religious respectively. Both norms oblige the superior to see that these obligations are fulfilled.

[182] PC 2 (e).

[183] See cc. 276 and 246.

[184] SC 10.

meditation, celebration of the liturgy of the hours, veneration of Mary as Mother of God, recitation of the rosary, and other exercises of piety are also recommended; certain of these may be specified in the proper law of the institute while others may be a matter of personal preference.[185] Other pious exercises might include devotional renewal of vows, community feast days or fast days, ascetical practices during the penitential season, customary prayers for benefactors or on the occasion of a jubilee or upon the death of a member, the stations of the cross, and the like. For ordained religious, the celebration of the liturgy of the hours is an obligation arising from ordination.[186]

The final paragraph of the canon recommends an annual retreat, whose duration and manner may be specified in the institute's proper law with some flexibility usually left to the individual religious. The retreat is usually a time of quiet reflection, enabling the religious to set aside the usual order of life in order to enter into more intense prayer, to review his or her life direction, to receive spiritual guidance, and to be especially open to the action of the Spirit.

Interior Conversion

Canon 664 — Religious are to strive after conversion of the soul toward God, to examine their conscience, even daily, and to approach the sacrament of penance frequently.

The Christian life is a journey toward God, and the religious life, a particular form of the Christian life, witnesses to the single-minded focus of that journey. Religious are to strive toward God and the things of God,[187] always alert to those things which hold them back from God. To assist in this continuing journey to God, two practices are recommended: (1) regular, even daily, examination of conscience, and (2) frequent approach to the sacrament of penance.[188] At the beginning of each Eucharist the penitential rite provides a regular opportunity to call to mind sins and failings, but the daily examination of conscience recommended here provides a more extended structure for this assessment before God. Furthermore, some religious institutes customarily gather as community at regular intervals or at certain seasons of the year for a communal examination of conscience and ritual of reconciliation.

The second means of conversion recommended by the canon is frequent approach to the sacrament of penance. This canon does not impose a strict obligation because every Christian, including religious, has great freedom in this regard.[189] No one is obliged to approach the sacrament of penance unless he or she is conscious of serious sin.[190] However, frequent recourse to the sacrament can be a source of grace to the religious, providing an opportunity to acknowledge sinfulness and weakness and offering the assistance of a spiritual guide.

Absence

Canon 665 — §1. Observing common life, religious are to live in their own religious house and are not to be absent from it except with the permission of their superior. If it concerns a lengthy absence from the house, however, the major superior, with the consent of the council and for a just cause, can permit a member to live outside a house of the institute, but not for more than a year, except for the purpose of caring for ill

[185] PC 6 and ES II: 21 urged religious institutes to cultivate a spirit of prayer, giving priority to meditation over multiple recited prayers.

[186] Canons 276, §2, 3° and 1174, §1.

[187] Canon 573, §1 speaks of religious as striving toward the perfection of charity, suggesting thereby the essence of God.

[188] CCEO 474 and 538, §3 address the frequency of confession for monks and for other religious respectively.

[189] See commentary on c. 630, §§2–3 for discussion of the choice of confessor. This norm notably modifies CIC 521, which obliged women religious to confess to the assigned confessor at certain times of the year or at least to approach him for his blessing.

[190] Canon 989.

health, of studies, or of exercising an apostolate in the name of the institute.

§2. A member who is absent from a religious house illegitimately with the intention of withdrawing from the power of the superiors is to be sought out solicitously by them and is to be helped to return to and persevere in his or her vocation.

This canon focuses on absence from the religious house; it is not primarily concerned with community life or common life. After articulating the expectation that religious ordinarily live in a house legitimately constituted by the superior (cc. 607–608), this canon specifies basic norms for absence from it.[191] The basic obligation itself and the norms of this canon are subject to some variation in accord with the proper law of the institute. Similarly, the manner in which the superior handles an unauthorized absence may also vary depending on circumstances. These norms apply equally to temporarily and perpetually or definitively professed members.

First, absence from a religious house necessitates permission from a superior. Second, if the absence is to be lengthy, the major superior's permission is required; hence, permission for shorter absences may be granted by a local superior unless the proper law indicates otherwise.[192] The institute's proper law may clarify what constitutes a lengthy absence, but more frequently it is left to the prudent judgment of the local superior, who must take into account the ordinary practice of the institute and the particular circumstances.

Third, when an absence is of such duration that the major superior is involved, permission for no more than one year may be granted for a just cause with the consent of the council. Fourth, if the absence exceeds one year, the major superior, with the consent of the council, may grant the permission only for the following reasons: (1) caring for the member's ill health, physical or mental, (2) pursuit of studies, or (3) exercising an apostolate in the name of the institute. Study has long been recognized as a reason for absence from the institute, but caring for ill health and exercising the apostolate in the name of the institute are more recent. If absence from the religious house is sought for some other reason, e.g., vocational discernment, exclaustration may be more appropriate.[193]

Frequently religious request permission for an extended absence to care for an aging parent. These requests arise largely as a result of such demographic changes as smaller families, greater mobility with many siblings living at great distances from the family home, and greater longevity of parents. Such an absence often results in a long-term commitment which is difficult to discontinue once begun and should be weighed carefully for its impact both on the religious and on the institute.[194] When there truly is a need, the institute should do what it can to support the religious in fulfilling this familial obligation. It may be possible to arrange for an apostolic assignment in keeping with the nature of the institute which will allow the religious to share in caring for the aging parent.[195]

The fifth and final norm of this canon provides for a member who is absent without permission and with the intention of withdrawing from the authority of the superior. The pastoral tone of the [191] CCEO 478 gives norms for absence from a monastery and CCEO 495 and 550 provide for unlawfully absent members of monasteries and of orders and congregations respectively.

[192] For example, for monasteries of contemplative nuns which observe papal cloister, the reasons for which permission to be absent may be granted are limited, and such nuns also require at least the habitual permission of the local ordinary. VS, norm 7.

[193] See commentary on cc. 686–687.

[194] FL 65(b) urges that other arrangements be attempted to avoid excessively long absences, but accords the final decision to the superior.

[195] J. Torres, "Absence from the Religious House," Con Lif 19 (1995) 80–81 is of the opinion that, depending on the institute and its proper law, such an absence may be granted provided that the care of the parents is an apostolate undertaken in the name of the institute. However, Williamson states that care of aging parents does not qualify for granting an absence exceeding one year. See CLSGBI Com, 369. See also Rincón Pérez, in Pamplona ComEng, 455.

canon leaves much discretion to the prudential judgment of the superior, who is to seek out the absent member, offer assistance in returning, and encourage perseverance in the religious life. The canon stipulates no automatic consequences for the absent member, distinguishing the fact of absence from the complexity of human motivation.

Every effort is to be made to restore the member's relationship with the institute. However, if the member persists in the illegitimate absence, the superior may and probably should eventually take action against the member. An appropriate penalty may be imposed if the member has persisted in ignoring the warning of the superior,[196] or dismissal from the institute may result after an appropriate process if the member has been absent for six months or longer.[197]

Use of the Media

Canon 666 — In the use of means of social communication, necessary discretion is to be observed and those things are to be avoided which are harmful to one's vocation and dangerous to the chastity of a consecrated person.

This canon reflects an increasing awareness of the extraordinary influence of the communication media, for good and for ill.[198] The considerable benefits and potential dangers inherent in mass communications were addressed at Vatican Council II and in subsequent documents.[199] Religious, together with others, are encouraged to become skilled and discerning users of the various media of communication to further their own growth and to ensure that the various media be effective vehicles of evangelization.[200] Among the means of communication would be the traditional print media of newspapers, books, and magazines, the imaging media of television, film, and video, and the burgeoning new electronic media of the Internet, teleconferencing, e-mail, and the like. Recent documents directed to religious caution them about the content, pervasiveness, and potential for manipulation by overly controlled media.[201]

Strictly speaking, this canon articulates neither a right nor an obligation; rather, it exhorts religious and religious institutes to exercise discretion regarding the means of communication. Misuse, abuse, or overuse of the media of communication can be detrimental to the individual religious and to community life. Individual religious may effectively isolate themselves from the community by absorption in TV, videos, films, or the Internet. Radios, stereos, and TV programs may intrude on the privacy of others, disrupt the spirit of recollection, and interfere with communal sharing. Media saturated with violence and sex may inure religious, and others, to suffering or inappropriate behavior, and indiscriminate exposure to certain themes and images may jeopardize chastity. On the other hand, mass communications make accessible information and experiences that can enrich individual religious and the community. Many institutes use these media to further continuing formation, enable consultation, facilitate the apostolate of the institute, promote vocations, share pertinent congregational information in a timely manner, and pursue many other initiatives. International institutes find the electronic media indispensable for regular communication, even, at times, conducting meetings by teleconference.

Contemplative institutes use the various means of social communication with great profit, but, in

[196] Canon 1371, 2°.

[197] Canon 696, §1.

[198] The Eastern code has no comparable norm for monks or other religious.

[199] Inter mirifica, December 4, 1964, AAS 56 (1964) 145–153; Pontifical Commission for Social Communications, Communio et progressio, January 29, 1971, AAS 63 (1971) 593–656; FL 34; VC 99; General Secretariat of the Synod of Bishops and the Pre-Synod Council, Working Paper for the Synod of America, Origins 27/13 (September 11, 1997) 208–209.

[200] See CP 110–111; FL 34; and VC 99, in which John Paul II says that religious "have a duty to learn the language of the media in order to speak effectively of Christ to our contemporaries."

[201] FL 4(d) and 34; VC 99.

keeping with their choice of a greater separation from the world, they must preserve carefully an atmosphere of recollection according to their proper law.[202]

Enclosure

Canon 667 — §1. In all houses, cloister adapted to the character and mission of the institute is to be observed according to the determinations of proper law, with some part of a religious house always reserved to the members alone.

§2. A stricter discipline of cloister must be observed in monasteries ordered to contemplative life.

§3. Monasteries of nuns which are ordered entirely to contemplative life must observe papal cloister, that is, cloister according to the norms given by the Apostolic See. Other monasteries of nuns are to observe a cloister adapted to their proper character and defined in the constitutions.

§4. For a just cause, a diocesan bishop has the faculty of entering the cloister of monasteries of nuns which are in his diocese and, for a grave cause and with the consent of the superior, of permitting others to be admitted to the cloister and the nuns to leave it for a truly necessary period of time.

This canon regulates the fact of cloister in every religious house and makes some general distinctions in the type of cloister among contemplative monasteries.[203] Religious institutes are to provide in their proper law for appropriate cloister given their character and spirit, and are to provide whatever safeguards are necessary to protect that cloister. The canon implicitly obliges individual religious to observe the cloister specific to that institute both for their own benefit and to assure all members of privacy, an atmosphere conducive to prayer and recollection, and an opportunity for community life.

Cloister[204] refers both to the law which regulates the separation of religious from those outside the religious house and also to the actual space (rooms, buildings, gardens, walkways, etc.) set aside for the exclusive use of the religious. The first paragraph of the canon incorporates both meanings, the second and third paragraphs refer primarily to the law of cloister, and the last paragraph refers primarily to the reserved space itself.

Cloister has a long and checkered ecclesial history which reaches back into the early Christian era. At times cloister was embraced voluntarily and at other times it was imposed by ecclesiastical authorities.[205] For most of its history the cloister required of women religious was more stringent than that required of men religious. This same pattern continues with the current legislation.[206]

For members of active apostolic religious institutes, the word cloister is largely synonymous with that part of the religious house reserved to the members alone. Each apostolic institute may determine what part of the house is to be so reserved, balancing the ministry of hospitality with the needs of the community. With the increase of smaller communities and of communities inserted among the very poor, the ability to reserve some part of the house to the members alone may be difficult; to achieve the purposes of this norm some institutes have determined that some parts of the house are reserved to the members alone during certain times of the day.

The last three paragraphs of the canon deal with the stricter discipline of cloister observed in contemplative monasteries. Several distinctions are made among these monasteries with different degrees of cloister expected accordingly. Monasteries of monks entirely ordered to the contempla-

[202] FL 34.

[203] CCEO 477 and 541 give norms for enclosure for monasteries and other religious respectively.

[204] Both cloister and exclaustration are derived from the same Latin root, clausura, meaning walls or enclosure.

[205] In 1298, through the apostolic constitution Periculoso, Boniface VIII imposed strict cloister on all women religious, even on institutes founded for active apostolates.

[206] For example, see cc. 609, §2 and 616, §4 which require Holy See involvement before a monastery of nuns may be erected or suppressed; similar requirements do not pertain to monasteries of monks.

tive life are bound to a stricter discipline of cloister, but they are not required to observe papal cloister.[207] Papal cloister, i.e., cloister regulated by the Apostolic See, is required of monasteries of nuns which are entirely ordered to the contemplative life, e.g., many Discalced Carmelite, Dominican, Passionist, and Trappistine nuns. The current norms for papal cloister are contained in the instruction Venite seorsum, published in 1969.[208] These norms, inter alia, require a material separation, bind all in the monastery (postulants, novices, and professed nuns alike), delineate who may enter the enclosure, and discourage egress from the monastery, effectively giving the local ordinary supervision of the enclosure.[209]

Other monasteries of nuns, i.e., those not entirely ordered to contemplation but which instead combine it with some apostolic work like teaching or retreat work, are not bound by papal cloister but observe a cloister adapted to their character. This cloister, considered to be constitutive of their way of life, is to be defined in the constitution. Among such monasteries would be some Poor Clare monasteries, most monasteries of the Order of the Visitation, and certain monasteries in the Good Shepherd tradition.

The final paragraph of the canon, which deals exclusively with monasteries of nuns, places on the diocesan bishop the primary responsibility for interpreting the law of cloister, whether papal or constitutional, for all monasteries of nuns located within his diocese. For a just cause he may enter the cloister; this would include a formal visitation (c. 628, §2), a pastoral visit, a business matter, a chapter of elections, and the like. For a grave cause the diocesan bishop with the consent of the superior of the monastery may permit others to enter the cloister and the nuns to leave. The canon contains an added caution that the nuns be permitted out of the cloister only for the length of time which is truly necessary. A grave cause might include a physical danger, a serious illness, necessary construction or renovation of the monastery, some internal difficulty requiring outside intervention, and the like. The bishop may permit entrance to the cloister to such persons as workers, medical personnel, security personnel, specialized instructors, confessors, and spiritual directors. His permission may be habitual; hence specific permission may not be necessary for each instance. This paragraph of the canon reiterates in general terms Venite seorsum 7 and 8, which list the circumstances and the categories of persons for which permission for entrance and egress may be given.

Regulation of Personal Property

Canon 668 — §1. Before first profession, members are to cede the administration of their goods to whomever they prefer and, unless the constitutions state otherwise, are to make disposition freely for their use and revenue. Moreover, at least before perpetual profession, they are to make a will which is to be valid also in civil law.

§2. To change these dispositions for a just cause and to place any act regarding temporal goods, they need the permission of the superior competent according to the norm of proper law.

§3. Whatever a religious acquires through personal effort or by reason of the institute, the religious acquires for the institute. Whatever accrues to a religious in any way by reason of pension, subsidy, or insurance is acquired for the institute unless proper law states otherwise.

§4. A person who must renounce fully his or her goods due to the nature of the institute is to make that renunciation before perpetual profession in a form valid, as far as possible, even in civil law; it is to take effect from the day of profession. A perpetually professed religious who wishes to renounce his or her goods either partially or totally according to the norm of proper law and with the permission of the supreme moderator is to do the same.

[207] For a discussion of some of the questions arising from the distinctions among contemplative monasteries see V. Dammertz, "The Juridical Structure of Contemplative Life," Con Lif 6/1 (1982) 33–39.

[208] SCRIS, Venite seorsum, August 15, 1969, AAS 61 (1969) 674–690.

[209] In addition to requiring the habitual consent of the local ordinary, egress from a monastery of nuns observing papal cloister also requires the consent (at least habitual) of the regular superior, if there is one. The regular superior would be the major superior of the male religious order with which the monastery of nuns is associated; e.g., the superior general of the Order of Discalced Carmelites (men) would have oversight for those monasteries of Discalced Carmelite nuns under his care.

§5. A professed religious who has renounced his or her goods fully due to the nature of the institute loses the capacity of acquiring and possessing and therefore invalidly places acts contrary to the vow of poverty. Moreover, whatever accrues to the professed after renunciation belongs to the institute according to the norm of proper law.

Canon 600 describes the effects of the evangelical counsel of poverty assumed at the time of profession. Canon 668 regulates the practical expression of the obligations assumed with that evangelical counsel, distinguishing between the personal property of the individual religious and income generated by the individual but belonging to the institute. This canon encourages simplicity, communal sharing, and detachment from all that is not God. Each institute, in keeping with its nature, character, and spirit, will express these values and specify these practicalities in its own distinct manner.

The first paragraph of the canon provides for religious who, by reason of the constitution of the institute, may own personal property.[210] Three different acts are envisioned: (1) cession of administration of property; (2) disposition of use of property and revenue received from it; and (3) execution of a will.[211] The first two actions provide for the property of the religious while he or she is living, and the will provides for the disposition of the property after death. These three actions are necessary because the religious retains the capacity for ownership of property but, in keeping with the obligations assumed with profession, is no longer canonically free to act independently regarding this personal property.

This norm requires that a religious who owns any property cede the administration and make provision for its use and revenue (sometimes called usufruct) before first profession. If the religious does not own any property at the time of first profession but subsequently becomes the owner of property, e.g., through inheritance, the religious must at the time of acquisition provide for the property by ceding administration and making provision for its use and revenue. Although the canon does not require that these two actions be done through civilly valid instruments, it is usually advisable that they be done so, particularly if the value of the property is significant; the requirements of the particular civil jurisdiction should be followed carefully. Once these instruments are in place, the religious should have no further involvement with the property or its revenue.

The religious may designate a family member, a law firm, a bank, the religious institute, or any other party to administer the property. The willingness of such a party to assume the responsibility and any pertinent fees should be ascertained before the designation. Should the religious institute be named, the treasurer of the institute or province and his or her successors in office, as the administrator of the goods of the institute, would assume this responsibility under the authority of the major superior. However, some religious institutes have constitutional restrictions against designating the institute as the beneficiary of the use and revenue of the property.[212] Absent such a restriction, the religious may cede administration and make provision for the use and revenue of the property as he or she chooses.

[210] Property is the generic term used to include real estate (e.g., land, buildings); incorporeal goods (e.g., rights, obligations, titles from which benefits accrue); works of art or other goods which have religious or historical value; shares, investments, funds, or arrangements of any kind which entitle the holder to some benefit.

[211] CCEO 467; 525, §2; and 530 regulate similar acts on the part of monks and other religious.

[212] Such regulations arose out of concern that novices/members be entirely free in disposing of their property and that there be no question regarding the motivation for admission to profession.

A will is to be executed at least before perpetual profession, whether or not the member owns any personal property. The proper law of many institutes requires that the will be executed prior to temporary profession if the religious is of legal age to do so. The will is to be executed in a manner and form which are valid under the civil law of the place of execution. Most institutes have a model will available which members may use or adapt to their particular needs. However, members are entirely free to use other forms and wordings if they are civilly valid. With the increased age of admission, institutes often find that a member has already executed a will prior to admission to the institute; there is no need to execute another will prior to profession unless the religious wishes to do so.

Once the determinations required in the first paragraph of the canon have been made, a religious may not alter them without permission. The second paragraph provides for changing the documents already in place and placing other acts regarding temporal goods.[213] The authority to permit a change in these documents or the placing of another type of business or financial act now resides with the superior competent according to the institute's proper law,[214] and any just cause may be sufficient reason to grant the permission. A just cause may be broadly interpreted to include any reasonable request, e.g., a substantial alteration in the value of the property, the death of the administrator or of an appointee, a family need, or even a need of the institute to which the religious wishes to contribute. It is important to note that this norm requires the permission of the competent superior before the religious places any act regarding temporal goods; this would include goods belonging to the religious or to another person. Therefore, if a religious wishes to assume power of attorney for an ailing parent, act as executor of a will, or enter into a contract for employment, royalties, or the like, the competent superior's permission is required.[215]

Following the two paragraphs dealing with the disposition of personal property, the third paragraph delineates what is not the personal property of the member. After profession anything which a member acquires as a result of his or her work—e.g., stipends, salaries, bonuses, fees, royalties, and the like—belongs to the institute. Anything a member receives by way of pension, subsidy, or insurance likewise belongs to the institute, unless the proper law states otherwise. One exception would be pensions or other benefits accruing to an individual religious from employment prior to admission to the institute; many institutes determine such benefits to be personal property, whether they are received in a lump sum or paid out regularly over a number of years.[216] All other income, including pensions, insurance settlements, lottery winnings, death benefits, social security or Medicare payments, and salaries, even though issued in the name of the individual religious, belongs to the institute. To avoid any misunderstandings at a later time, a religious institute might wish to establish through a civilly valid document the financial relationship between the member and the institute.

Inheritances received from family members remain personal property, but other legacies, bequests, or gifts are usually the property of the institute, unless the proper law of the institute deter-

[213] CCEO 529, §4 provides for a change in the disposition of goods for those religious who, after perpetual profession, retain the capacity of ownership.

[214] Canon 583 of the 1917 code required that all those under simple vows, both men and women, have permission of the Holy See to change a will; those under solemn vows had already renounced any personal property as well as the capacity to own property. For a change in a document regarding cession of administration or the disposition of use and usufruct, nuns (i.e., members of monasteries), in addition to other conditions, had to receive the permission of the local ordinary and the regular superior, if the monastery was subject to regulars (CIC 580).

[215] See also cc. 639, §§2–3 and 672.

[216] For a discussion of pensions and subsidies received as a result of military service prior to religious profession see SCR, decr, March 16, 1922, AAS 14 (1922) 196. See also F. Morrisey, "The Vow of Poverty and Personal Patrimony," CLS-GBIN 72 (December 1987) 28–30.

mines otherwise. Inheritances become part of a person's personal property and must be handled as in paragraphs one and two above. In situations where there is doubt regarding the facts of the situation or the intention of the benefactor, the gifts are considered to belong to the institute.[217] The proper law of the institute should provide for the handling of personal gifts, e.g., a Christmas gift from a family member, while at the same time preserving simplicity of life, the bond of unity, and the common life of the institute; distinctions, opportunities, or access to material goods, e.g., cars, based on family wealth have no place in a religious institute.

The fourth and fifth paragraphs of this canon govern the renunciation of property by religious. Some institutes, by their nature, require members to renounce ownership of property, both that which is presently owned and any which might be acquired in the future. This obligation is specified in the constitutions of the institute. Religious belonging to such an institute become, by perpetual profession, canonically incapable of acquiring or owning property of any kind; and, as a result, any contrary act is considered invalid. Members of such institutes make this renunciation just before perpetual profession, to be effective at the time of the profession, and in a civilly valid form as far as possible.[218] Any property which comes to an individual religious after a profession with these effects, if accepted, accrues to the institute. A gift or a legacy may always be refused, but if the recipient who has renounced the capacity of ownership accepts the gift or legacy, the title to the property would revert to the institute, province, or house in accord with the proper law.

Other institutes which do not by their nature require a member to renounce personal property and the capacity of ownership may permit perpetually or definitively professed members to renounce property either in whole or in part. Typically, in such institutes, the proper law requires that in order to renounce property the member must have a certain number of years (e.g., ten or fifteen) in perpetual or definitive profession and obtain the permission of the supreme moderator. Any other provisions of proper law must also be carefully observed. If a religious in this type of institute renounces all or part of his or her presently owned property, he or she still retains the capacity to own property and may, in fact, acquire some additional property in the future. This additional property would be provided for at the time of acquisition either through a cession of administration, another renunciation, or a combination of both. The individual religious freely chooses the beneficiary of the renounced property. The beneficiary may be the institute, a family member or friend in need, a charitable endeavor, or some combination thereof. Some religious institutes limit what an individual religious may renounce in favor of the institute to protect both the individual and the institute.

Still other religious institutes do not permit renunciation, seeking rather to ensure that the member is provided for should he or she leave the institute in the future. In situations where renunciation is permitted, the supreme moderator should weigh carefully the facts of each case before acceding to a member's request to renounce his or her property.

Dress

Canon 669 — §1. Religious are to wear the habit of the institute, made according to the norm of proper law, as a sign of their consecration and as a witness to poverty.

§2. Clerical religious of an institute which does not have a proper habit are to wear clerical dress according to the norm of can. 284.

This canon articulates a general obligation of religious, namely, wearing the habit or dress of the institute, without specifying particulars.[219]

[217] See c. 1267, §1.

[218] Civil law in the United States does not recognize the renunciation of the capacity for ownership; therefore an additional civilly valid act of renunciation is required upon any subsequent acquisition.

[219] CCEO 476 and 540 regulate the habit or dress of monks and of other religious respectively.

What the habit or garb of the institute is and when it is to be worn are matters left to the proper law of the institute.[220] The obligation of wearing the habit of the institute is explained as a sign of consecration and a witness to poverty.[221]

The discretion left to each institute in this matter reflects the principle of subsidiarity operative throughout the norms for religious, providing for the widely diverse traditions, circumstances, and apostolates of religious institutes throughout the world. For most institutes deriving from a monastic tradition, the habit identifies the tradition and signifies certain dimensions of the monastic life, e.g., separation from the world, simplicity of life, manual labor. For some apostolic institutes of more recent origin, a distinctive habit is an anomaly and an accretion because apostolic institutes of both men and women often adopted as their attire the dress of the ordinary people of their age and locale.[222] Some institutes of women religious have traditionally worn a veil while others have never worn a veil.[223]

The continuing discussion surrounding the attire of religious, focused primarily on the dress of women religious, suggests that something else is at issue, something perhaps not integral to canonical principles and values. The dress of religious priests and brothers is rarely discussed by the media, the general public, or internal church documents.[224] On the other hand, the dress of religious women seems to function for some today in much the same way as enclosure functioned in an earlier era; in addition to being a sign of consecration, it is also seen as a source of protection against physical harm and a touchstone of authentic religious life. Each religious institute, in keeping with its nature, charism, and legitimate customs, has the responsibility to identify in its proper law how the members of the institute are to dress, and each member has the obligation to dress in accord with this.

The second paragraph of the canon deals with those clerical religious whose institutes do not have their own proper habit or dress. Such clerics are to wear clerical dress in accord with canon 284.[225] This norm directs clerics to wear suitable ecclesiastical garb in accord with the episcopal conference norms and legitimate local custom; however, it is silent regarding times, circumstances, or the particulars of dress. Religious clerics are bound by the norms of the place where they reside; episcopal conference norms and local customs may vary from region to region, requir-

[220] Williamson interprets this canon as requiring all religious to wear a distinctive habit. See CLSGBI Com, 374.

[221] PC 17 emphasizes the aspect of consecration, and ET 22 discusses the habit in the context of poverty.

[222] In the seventeenth century Vincent de Paul forbade the Daughters of Charity to wear a habit to avoid their being identified as religious and cloistered. Members of the several branches of the Congregation of Saint Joseph of Medaille which trace their origin to P. Medaille originally dressed as ordinary women of the French countryside. Elizabeth Seton and her American Sisters of Charity wore the simple black "widow's weeds" common in the United States during the early nineteenth century.

[223] The Religious Teachers Filippini (MFP), founded in Italy in 1694, the Missionary Servants of the Blessed Trinity (MSBT), founded in the United States in 1912, and the Sisters of Social Service (SSS), founded in Hungary in 1923, are examples of institutes whose members have never worn a veil.

[224] E. McDonough comments: "For members of non-monastic institutes of men, the habit—if they had one—was traditionally a significant form of clothing occasionally donned for community or liturgical exercises or for professional or pastoral services. In contrast, for all institutes of women—with rare exceptions—the habit was traditionally their primary identification symbol and was also often the only clothes they had to wear. Additionally, the habit issue highlights a significant difference in response to legal norms on the part of men and of women. That is, the 1917 code required that habits be worn by all members of all institutes at all times, both inside and outside the religious house. Women consistently did what the law said, while men rather consistently did not." From "Beyond the Liberal Model," in Studies in Canon Law Presented to P. J. M. Huizing, ed. J. H. Provost and K. Walf (Louvain: Louvain University, 1991) 105–106.

[225] In c. 669 the word habitus is translated as "habit" while it is translated as "garb" in c. 284 on the clothing of clerics.

ing adjustments on the part of these religious clerics when they minister in a different territory.

Obligation of the Institute to Support the Members

Canon 670 — An institute must supply the members with all those things which are necessary to achieve the purpose of their vocation, according to the norm of the constitutions.

The obligations of religious toward the institute are articulated in this chapter and elsewhere throughout the code.[226] This canon cryptically enunciates the overarching correlative obligation of the religious institute toward the members, highlighting the interdependence of rights and duties within the Church's legal system.[227]

The religious institute is charged with the welfare—spiritual, intellectual, physical, and material—of its members, to the degree that anyone can be responsible for another. The common law does not determine either what is "necessary" or what "achieving the purpose of their vocation" means, but gives some direction by indicating fundamental components of life in a religious institute. Two general categories of necessities for achieving the purpose of one's vocation suggest themselves: (1) those structures and processes required to participate in the life of the institute; and (2) material goods and support.[228] Included in the structures and processes would be such items as approved constitutions, formation—both initial and ongoing—some form of consultative and/or deliberative structures or procedures, community life, and an opportunity to participate in the mission of the institute. In the second category, material goods and support would be such things as food, clothing, housing, medical care, academic preparation for apostolic work (for active institutes), and other goods, equipment, and opportunities in keeping with the nature and spirit of the institute.

The appropriate provision and effective use of these necessities requires planning, allocation of resources, both human and material, and a comprehensive understanding of the charism and spirit of the institute. The constitutions of the institute indicate the required structures and processes. Other structures and procedures deemed necessary or useful may supplement those which are required according to the institute's proper law. That law and legitimate customs of the institute will give some guidance about what is appropriate with regard to material necessities. Superiors and councils are responsible to provide material goods (e.g., clothing, vehicles, computers, counseling, vacation, and the like) in keeping with the nature and spirit of the institute, while still allowing for mature choices by the members. The material needs of members of missionary, contemplative, and apostolic institutes may vary considerably.

Superiors in institutes with limited financial resources may need to make some difficult decisions regarding their allocation. For instance, the extraordinary expense entailed in providing one or two needy members with the best available medical or long-term psychological care may compromise the institute's ability to meet other needs such as preparing members for the apostolate or caring adequately for a large number of elderly members. In those institutes which are financially secure, the demands of evangelical poverty[229] and the collective witness to charity and poverty in the use of goods of the institute[230] may call for decisions to do without even what could be afforded.[231]

[226] For some of these obligations, see the introduction to this chapter.

[227] The Eastern code has no comparable norm.

[228] Other commentators organize these necessary elements differently. See D. Andres, El derecho de los religiosos (Madrid/Rome: Publicationes Claretianas y Commentarium pro Religiosis, 1983) 475; S. Euart, "Religious Institutes and the Juridical Relationship of the Members to the Institute," J 51 (1991) 103–118; and E. McDonough, "The Protection of Rights in Religious Institutes," J 46 (1986) 164–204.

[229] Canon 600.

[230] Canon 640.

[231] A reflection paper published in 1995 by a Joint CMSM/LCWR Task Force on Health Care for Religious, A Vi-

In making and implementing decisions, superiors must remember the uniqueness of each member and that what is necessary will vary from member to member and from time to time. Professional preparation or updating, health-care needs, opportunity for family visits, time for leisure or sabbatical will differ greatly depending upon the person and upon circumstances. Usually the religious, being an adult, is capable of assessing and requesting what he or she needs. At other times, due to severe depression, addiction, total absorption in the apostolate, or the like, a member may need the special care and intervention of the superior so that he or she receives the assistance needed.

External Duties and Offices

Canon 671 — A religious is not to accept functions and offices outside the institute without the permission of a legitimate superior.

This canon specifies certain practical implications arising from the obligation of obedience which religious assume at profession.[232] In addition to governing their members within the ambit of the religious institute, superiors have a responsibility for members who minister elsewhere. Religious are obliged to obtain the permission of their legitimate superiors before accepting functions and offices outside the institute.[233] The purpose of this regulation is to ensure the availability of the members for the life and mission of the institute and to foster congruence between the activities of members and the charism of the institute.

The canon is broadly written and encompasses a wide array of functions and offices. It affects religious employed full-time by a diocesan or supradiocesan organization (e.g., Catholic Charities, a state Catholic conference, the NCCB, or a Vatican dicastery)[234] and those employed by one or several other religious institutes (e.g., director at a retreat center owned and operated by another religious institute, faculty member employed by a consortium of theologates, religious hired to oversee the corporate responsibility activities of another institute). Similarly, the canon covers religious employed by an institution, an agency, or an initiative with no formal church affiliation (e.g., a public university, a non-denominational hospice, a humanitarian organization such as Bread for the World and the like). Whatever form it may take, the work of a religious entails being sent in mission and in communion with the ecclesial purposes of the institute, thus requiring action on the part of the superior competent according to its proper law.[235]

This canon also applies to part-time and/or volunteer work in which a religious may be involved, e.g., serving as a trustee of an institution, significant involvement (not simply membership) in a professional society or other organization, regular ministry at a prison, hospital, or other institution, major writing commitments, regular engagement as a consultant, or any other obligation which entails considerable time and responsibility. Of particular concern would be situations involving the signing of contracts[236] or responsibility for the financial or legal affairs of another.

sion of Life, Health, Sickness, and Death for Religious, invites religious to face the ambiguities inherent in life, sickness, and death and to assess what is appropriate care for sick and/or aging religious.

[232] Canon 601 requires submission to legitimate superiors in accord with the proper law of the institute, and c. 598, §2 calls members to organize their lives in accord with this same proper law.

[233] CCEO 431, §1 requires that monks have the written permission of the major superior before accepting either dignities or offices outside the monastery. In addition, CCEO 469 stipulates that upon perpetual monastic profession a religious loses any office which he or she previously held.

[234] Canons 678; 681, §2; and 682 call for consultation, written agreements, and coordination when a religious is working under the aegis of a diocese. As general guides for good management and just procedure, these norms could reasonably apply to situations involving religious employed by other church institutions and agencies.

[235] ET 25.

[236] Canon 639, §§2–3 regulates the signing of contracts by individual members.

This canon is not intended to curtail the initiative of the religious or to limit apostolic outreach. It is intended to assure that the time and energies of the religious are expended on endeavors in keeping with the charism and nature of the institute and that the individual religious is not overextended. The manner of obtaining the required permission would be determined by the proper law and customary practices of the institute.

Before assuming any full-time function or office outside the institute, the religious should obtain permission from the appropriate superior in accord with the institute's proper law. The religious should also have the agreement and support of the superior (major or local depending on the proper law) for part-time and/or volunteer responsibilities which are supplementary to one's primary ministry but which may be time-consuming (e.g., presidency of a professional society, commitment to do a weekly radio spot), controversial (e.g., chaplain to a local chapter of Dignity, serving on the state parole board), or unusual for a member of that particular institute (e.g., social outreach activity in a cloistered monastery). For other functions and offices the local superior usually has the necessary authority. In circumstances in which permission is customarily given, it may be tacit or implicit. However, religious should be candid about their activities, keeping superiors informed of their involvements and being open to their advice and direction. Most religious enjoy a variety of interests, and religious institutes generally support those activities and avocations which are in keeping with the nature of the institute and its mission.

Other Obligations

Canon 672 — Religious are bound by the prescripts of cann. 277, 285, 286, 287, and 289, and religious clerics additionally by the prescripts of can. 279, §2; in lay institutes of pontifical right, the proper major superior can grant the permission mentioned in can. 285, §4.

Besides the general obligations assumed with religious profession, their specification in proper law, and the obligations enumerated in this chapter, this final canon obliges religious to observe certain additional clerical prohibitions and rules of conduct found in the canons on the obligations of clerics.[237] With one exception these regulations apply to all religious, both lay and clerical, but the manner in which they apply to religious may differ from the manner in which they apply to diocesan clerics.

The canons referenced in canon 672 apply to religious because, like the ordained, religious are by profession public ministers in the Church, and certain activities have been judged generally inappropriate or unbecoming for public ecclesial ministers. The canons referenced here express caution with regard to some activities and proscribe others, allowing for exceptions with the permission of the appropriate authority.

The regulations referenced in this canon which apply to religious are summarized here.[238] Canon 277 obliges them to prudence in associating with persons who might endanger consecrated chastity or scandalize the faithful, and it further obliges religious to comply with the pertinent directives of the diocesan bishop. Canon 285 prohibits certain occupations or activities because they are considered unbecoming or alien to public ecclesial ministers, and it prohibits the unauthorized exercise of certain secular offices and activities which entail the exercise of civil power or involve financial administration/transactions. Canon 286 prohibits the conducting of business or trade without the permission of the legitimate ecclesiastical authority. Canon 287 prohibits religious from taking an active role in political parties or labor unions unless certain conditions are met. Canon 289 discourages them from volunteering for military service and encourages them to avail themselves of applicable civil law exemptions from civil duties [237] CCEO 427 binds monks and other religious to all clerical obligations found in the common law unless the law or the nature of the matter indicates otherwise.

[238] For fuller discussion of the content of these canons, see the commentary on the canons regarding the obligations and rights of clerics (cc. 273–289).

and offices. Canon 279, §2 obliges clerical religious to the same continuing education requirements that affect secular clerics. The competent superiors of the institute are to oversee compliance with these regulations, reproving and correcting religious who violate them.[239] In accord with the seriousness of the offense the superior may warn the religious, issue a precept, or even initiate a dismissal process if the religious is recalcitrant.[240]

The final clause in canon 672 indicates that the major superior may permit members of lay institutes of pontifical right to engage in certain activities and secular offices which entail financial responsibility (c. 285, §4).[241] The major superior may also grant such a permission to members of clerical institutes of pontifical right because the canon requires permission of the cleric's ordinary who, in clerical pontifical institutes, is the major superior.

Canon 672 is silent about who may grant the permissions and/or dispensations for the other activities, occupations, and functions proscribed in this rather comprehensive canon. The canons themselves variously state "according to the prescripts of particular law" (cc. 279, §2 and 285, §1); "with the permission of legitimate ecclesiastical authority" (c. 286); "in the judgment of competent ecclesiastical authority" (c. 287, §2); and "of their [proper] ordinary" (c. 289, §§1–2). The major superior of a clerical pontifical institute is the proper ordinary for its members, and, consequently, he may grant the permission required by canon 289. For members of other institutes (i.e., clerical diocesan institutes and lay pontifical institutes of both men and women) the permission required by canon 289 and the judgment called for by canon 287, §2 are twofold. A religious may not engage in these activities without the permission of his or her own superior in virtue of canon 671, and when these activities affect a particular church the further permission of the diocesan bishop, as coordinator of the apostolate of the diocese, appears to be required.[242] He may dispense religious from any of the prohibitions contained in these canons which impact the apostolate of his diocese.[243]

[239] Only after all other options are exhausted may the diocesan bishop involve himself in the disciplining of a religious. See cc. 679 and 683, §2.

[240] Canon 1392 refers specifically to religious who practice trade or business in violation of the canons, and urges punishment in accord with the seriousness of the offense; canon 696 addresses in a general manner the reasons for which a religious may be dismissed.

[241] Serving as power of attorney for an elderly parent, as legal guardian or conservator for a minor, or as executor of an estate would be examples of activities requiring permission of the major superior.

[242] The overlapping jurisdictions of the major superior and the diocesan bishop in this regard can be problematic; e.g., the charism of the religious institute may not be understood by the bishop; or the responsibilities of the activity or office may cross the boundaries of several dioceses.

[243] See c. 87, §1. However, recent practice suggests that the Holy See generally opposes granting dispensations from c. 285, §3, which prohibits assuming public offices entailing the exercise of civil power. However, developments in recent years, e.g., in South Africa and Vietnam, suggest that some dispensations have been granted.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bibliographical material for canons 617–672 can be found after the commentary on canon 746.

CHAPTER V
THE APOSTOLATE OF INSTITUTES[1]
[cc. 673–683]

Consecration cannot be considered apart from mission. Religious institutes are aggregates of consecrated persons ordered toward the mission of the Church in accord with the nature, spirit, and end of each institute. This is true whether religious institutes are dedicated to contemplation or apostolic action. It is likewise true whether the members serve in a corporate apostolate of the institute or perform an individual service in the name of the institute. Through prayer, penance, and charity, religious conform themselves ever more fully to Christ as they address human needs in various cultures and particular churches. In cooperation and collaboration with bishops and other Christian faithful, religious manifest ecclesial communion and build up the life and holiness of the Church.[2]

Primary Apostolate of Religious[3]

Canon 673 — The apostolate of all religious consists first of all in the witness of their consecrated life, which they are bound to foster by prayer and penance.

Religious witness to Christ by living a life of total dedication through the profession of the counsels. Prayer and penance sustain and nurture their consecration which testifies to the yearning of the Bride for union with her Spouse. The Church esteems this witness and recognizes it as the primary apostolate of religious in the mission of the Church. Following the example and teachings of Christ, religious testify that the world cannot be transformed without the spirit of the beatitudes.[4]

Institutes Dedicated to Contemplation

Canon 674 — Institutes which are entirely ordered to contemplation always hold a distinguished place in the mystical Body of Christ: for they offer an extraordinary sacrifice of praise to God, illumine the people of God with the richest fruits of holiness, move it by their example, and extend it with hidden apostolic fruitfulness. For this reason, members of these institutes cannot be summoned to furnish assistance in the various pastoral ministries however much the need of the active apostolate urges it.

This norm protects the patrimony of institutes dedicated entirely to contemplation by their very nature. Members of these institutes imitate Christ in his prayer on the mountain and offer their entire lives to God in service to others through divine worship, asceticism, contemplation, and charity. They hold a preeminent place in the Church, and the Christian faithful recognize their houses as sources of blessings and graces.

These religious contribute immeasurably to the apostolic fruitfulness of the Church. Since the contemplative life is of the very essence of these institutes, their members cannot be called to participate in apostolic works however great the need. Many offer hospitality and pastoral care through retreats, spiritual directors, and confessors in accord with the nature and end of the institute. The synod on consecrated life praised the witness of contemplative institutes and encouraged their contribution to interreligious dialogue

[1] There is no chapter on the apostolate of religious institutes in the Eastern code.

[2] LG 42, 44–46; PC 5–10, 14, 20; ES I: 23–40; MR 14, 28, 33–37, 46, 52; VC 48–53, 72, 96–99. See also G. Ghirlanda, "Relations between Religious Institutes and Diocesan Bishops," Con Lif 14/1 (1989) 37–71.

[3] The Eastern code has no canons comparable to canons 673–677.

[4] LG 31b, 44; PC 1, 2, 6, 24; ET 53; VC 33–35, 72.

in younger churches where other religions predominate.[5]

Institutes Dedicated to Apostolic Activity

Canon 675 — §1. Apostolic action belongs to the very nature of institutes dedicated to works of the apostolate. Accordingly, the whole life of the members is to be imbued with an apostolic spirit; indeed the whole apostolic action is to be informed by a religious spirit.

A wonderful variety of apostolic religious institutes exists in the Church. Their apostolates flow from the very nature and spirit of these institutes. Members of apostolic institutes experience and live the dynamic unity between contemplation and apostolic activity.[6]

§2. Apostolic action is to proceed always from an intimate union with God and is to confirm and foster this union.

Contemplation and communion with God sustain and nourish apostolic service. A solid spiritual life enables religious to see all things in God and God in all things. Christ exemplifies for these religious a profound communion with the Father joined to an intense life of service. They bring God to the people in their apostolates and the people to God in prayer.[7]

§3. Apostolic action, to be exercised in the name and by the mandate of the Church, is to be carried out in the communion of the Church.

As public juridical persons, religious institutes perform their apostolic activities in the name of the Church. At times a diocesan bishop invites a religious institute to his diocese or consents to its request to erect a house and carry on works proper to it.[8] At other times the diocesan bishop may entrust certain works to a particular institute.[9] Both the religious serving in the apostolates proper or entrusted to the institute and an individual religious assigned by the competent superior to an apostolate perform their work in obedience to their superiors and the diocesan bishops.[10] Mindful of the distinct charism of religious institutes, the diocesan bishop encourages and coordinates their apostolates within the diocese.[11] He meets with major superiors in cordial and open dialogue to assure the organic communion of the diocese, to implement its pastoral directives, and to promote the nature and end of each institute.[12]

Apostolate of Lay Institutes

Canon 676 — Lay institutes, whether of men or of women, participate in the pastoral function of the Church through spiritual and corporal works of mercy and offer the most diverse services to people. Therefore, they are to persevere faithfully in the grace of their vocation.

The canon shows the regard of the Church for lay institutes of men and women and encourages fidelity to this special vocation. By its nature, life consecrated by the profession of the evangelical counsels is neither lay nor clerical.[13] The consecration of lay men and women constitutes a state of life complete in itself and of inestimable value to the Church and the individual apart from sacred ministry.[14] Lay religious require the formation and professional training needed for the witness and service they offer the ecclesial community. These

[5] PC 7, 9; AG 40; ES I: 36; VC 8, 101. See also SCRIS, "The Contemplative Dimension of Religious Life," March 1980, CLD 9, 410–431.
[6] PC 8, 20; VC 9.
[7] PC 8; VC 9, 74, 93.
[8] Canon 611, §2.
[9] Canon 681.
[10] Canon 678, §§1–2.
[11] Canon 394.
[12] VC 49.
[13] Canon 588, §1.
[14] PC 10.

religious are distinct from the laity by reason of their consecration which expresses a total self-donation to Christ and all people through a specific gift approved by the Church.[15]

Fidelity/Accommodation of Proper Works

Canon 677 — §1. Superiors and members are to retain faithfully the mission and works proper to the institute. Nevertheless, attentive to the necessities of times and places, they are to accommodate them prudently, even employing new and opportune means.

This norm exhorts superiors and other members to remain faithful to those works proper to the institute, that is, those flowing from the spirit of the founder and traditionally carried on by the members of the institute. Works such as education, health care, and social services need to be accommodated to contemporary time, and advancements in the various sciences. The synod on consecrated life encouraged religious in the apostolate of education and pointed to new apostolic endeavors.[16]

Associations Joined to Religious Institutes

§2. Moreover, if they have associations of the Christian faithful joined to them, institutes are to assist them with special care so that they are imbued with the genuine spirit of their family.

From earliest times lay persons have sought to learn and live the spirituality of certain religious institutes while following their own vocation in the world. At one time, only religious orders with apostolic indults could join lay persons to their institutes. Now many new forms of associations as well as oblates[17] and third orders secular[18] live the spirituality and participate in the works of particular religious institutes.[19] The law is concerned that institutes form these associates in the true spirit of the religious family without sacrificing the identity of the institute.

Associates extend the spirituality of religious institutes into the marketplace of the world. A great love of the Church and fidelity to the spirituality of the institute should characterize their endeavors.[20] Some associates hold positions of responsibility in the apostolic works of the institute. In such instances, they are accountable to the competent religious superiors in accord with the directives for associates and volunteers.[21] Like religious, they are subject to the diocesan bishop in these works and should cooperate and collaborate with others in promoting ecclesial communion.[22]

Obedience to Diocesan Bishop[23]

Canon 678 — §1. Religious are subject to the power of bishops whom they are bound to follow with devoted submission and reverence in those matters which regard the care of souls, the public exercise of divine worship, and other works of the apostolate.

As pastors of the particular churches, diocesan bishops promote, coordinate, and exercise due

[15] Canon 207, §2; VC 60.

[16] VC 96–99. New apostolates include evangelizing culture, participating in social communications, serving Christian unity, and advancing ecumenical and interreligious dialogues.

[17] Oblates are men and women joined to a monastery or an abbey while living out the spirituality of the institute in their lay vocation. The Benedictines and Premonstratensians have oblates.

[18] Third orders are associations of lay persons initiated by St. Francis. They are joined to mendicant orders (Franciscans, Carmelites, Dominicans, Augustinians). They have a rather complex structure of governance and enjoy a certain autonomy for their own lay vocation.

[19] ES I: 35; cc. 303; 311; 320, §2.

[20] ES I: 35; c. 311; VC 56.

[21] VC 56.

[22] Canons 311, 328–329.

[23] Cf. CCEO 415, §1. In this norm, religious are also subject to the authority of the local hierarch in matters which pertain to "what becomes the clerical state."

vigilance over all pastoral activity in their dioceses.[24] In works proper to the institute and in works entrusted to them, religious are subject to the authority of bishops in all that pertains to the care of souls,[25] the public exercise of divine worship,[26] and all other apostolic works.[27] Bishops should welcome and support the services of religious, while religious should work in full communion with the bishops. Through cordial dialogue, major superiors and bishops direct the pastoral initiatives of religious in accord with the needs of the people. Mutual trust, collaboration, and cooperation between bishops and religious will benefit the entire Church.[28]

Obedience to Superiors[29]

§2. In exercising an external apostolate, religious are also subject to their proper superiors and must remain faithful to the discipline of the institute. The bishops themselves are not to fail to urge this obligation if the case warrants it.

This paragraph shows the dual authority to which religious are subject in performing apostolic works. Superiors hold primary responsibility for the life and mission of their institutes. They serve as guides for their brothers or sisters in their spiritual and apostolic life.[30] Bishops, while not interfering in the internal life and governance, have the responsibility to promote and foster the life and works of the religious institutes present in the particular churches.[31]

Mutual Relations of Bishops/Major Superiors[32]

§3. In organizing the works of the apostolate of religious, diocesan bishops and religious superiors must proceed through mutual consultation.

All apostolic activity is directed to providing care for persons and responding to human need. Diocesan bishops who direct the pastoral life of the diocese and religious superiors who mission members of their respective institutes should meet periodically to discern how best to carry out the pastoral plan of the particular church. Bishops should recognize, esteem, and welcome the gifts of religious institutes, while superiors should offer their spiritual and pastoral resources in building up the life and holiness of the diocese. This mutual trust and cooperation witness to ecclesial communion and bring quality service to all in need.[33]

Religious Prohibited from Residing in Diocese[34]

Canon 679 — When a most grave cause demands it, a diocesan bishop can prohibit a member of a religious institute from residing in the diocese if his or her major superior, after having been informed, has neglected to make provision; moreover, the matter is to be referred immediately to the Holy See.

This norm seems to introduce an exception to the autonomy of life and governance the law grants to institutes of consecrated life and which diocesan bishops are obliged to preserve and safeguard.[35] Three conditions must be present before [24] CD 35.4; ES I: 25–26; MR 53; cc. 375, 392, 394.

[25] Canon 150.
[26] Canon 834. This includes the public celebration of divine worship within the religious community.
[27] Canon 394.
[28] VC 49.
[29] Cf. CCEO 543. The canon addresses specifically a religious who is a pastor.
[30] Canon 596; VC 43.
[31] Canon 586, §2; VC 48–49.
[32] Cf. CCEO 416.
[33] VC 48–50.
[34] CCEO 415, §4 provides that religious who have committed a delict outside their house and have not been punished by their proper superior, having been warned by the local hierarch, can be punished by that hierarch even if they have lawfully left and have returned to the house.
[35] Canon 586, §2.

the diocesan bishop can prohibit a religious from living in the diocese: (1) there must be a most grave reason, (2) the proper major superior, having been informed, neglects to act, and (3) the matter is to be referred immediately to the Holy See.

It would seem that the very grave reason would be some action related to matters in which religious are subject to the authority of the bishops[36] or a violation of ecclesial or civil law causing public scandal. The case would be highly unlikely, since major superiors recognize their responsibility to address such complaints against a member.[37] The diocesan bishop should take great care to secure correct information lest the reputation of the religious and the good name of the institute be harmed.[38] The religious and/or the major superior would have the right to recourse to the Congregation for Bishops against an action of the diocesan bishop perceived to be unjust. The norm presents a serious problem in the case of a religious belonging to a sui iuris monastery or a small institute of diocesan right in which the only house or houses of the institute are situated in the one diocese or particular church.

Mutual Relations: Institutes and Secular Clergy

Canon 680 — Among the various institutes and also between them and the secular clergy, there is to be fostered an ordered cooperation and a coordination under the direction of the diocesan bishop of all the works and apostolic activities, without prejudice to the character and purpose of individual institutes and the laws of the foundation.

In carrying out the diocesan pastoral plan under the direction of the diocesan bishop, mutual trust, cooperation, and collaboration should exist among institutes and between them and the secular clergy.[39] All share the one Spirit and follow the one Christ in carrying out the mission of the Church. Faithful to the nature and purpose of their own institutes,[40] religious should recognize the authority of the diocesan bishop and esteem the vocations and pastoral service of clerics, other religious, and all persons in the diocese.[41] On his part, the diocesan bishop should understand and promote among the faithful of the diocese, particularly the secular clerics, the right and obligation of religious to observe the spirit and character of their institute ratified by ecclesiastical authority.[42]

The diocesan bishop can further promote this cooperation between consecrated persons and the secular clergy by providing courses in diocesan seminaries on the history and spirituality of consecrated life. Major superiors can include courses in the curriculum of their formation programs on ecclesiology and the spirituality of the secular clergy.[43]

Works Entrusted to Religious[44]

Canon 681 — §1. Works which a diocesan bishop entrusts to religious are subject to the authority and direction of the same bishop, without prejudice to the right of religious superiors according to the norm of can. 678, §§2 and 3.

At times the diocesan bishop recognizes that members of a certain religious institute could best accomplish certain works because of the nature and end of the institute and the professional training of the members. Parishes, parochial and diocesan schools, hospitals, health care facilities, and social services are a few examples of such works entrusted to religious. The bishop should know and appreciate the gifts of the religious in-

36 Canons 678, §1; 1320.
37 Canon 678, §2.
38 Canon 220.
39 CD 35.5.

40 Canon 586, §1.
41 Structures such as the diocesan synod (c. 463, §1, 1°, 5°, 9°) and the diocesan pastoral council (c. 512, §1) can facilitate the apostolic involvement of religious; see also VC 52.
42 Canons 578; 586, §2.
43 ES I: 28; VC 50.
44 Cf. CCEO 415, §3.

stitutes in the diocese, while religious should respond generously to his request in sharing their gifts with the ecclesial community.

Works entrusted to religious by the diocesan bishop, even though they are proper to or derived from the very nature of the institute, remain under his authority.[45] This does not preclude the vigilance of the competent superiors responsible for the life and discipline of their members to see to their faithful execution of the works. Besides failing to serve the needs of the diocese, the religious institute could be liable for poor or inappropriate administration of church properties if its members were negligent.[46]

Written Agreement for Entrusted Works[47]

§2. In these cases, the diocesan bishop and the competent superior of the institute are to draw up a written agreement which, among other things, is to define expressly and accurately those things which pertain to the work to be accomplished, the members to be devoted to it, and economic matters.

When the diocesan bishop entrusts a work to religious, there are many issues to be addressed so as to ensure the harmonious carrying out of the work. Among such considerations are the following: personnel, responsibilities, compensation, health benefits, insurance, transportation, housing, provision for retreats, vacations, sick leave, etc. If such agreements are not drawn up, inequities and misunderstandings can occur for either or both the diocese and the religious institute. Such agreements assure justice and clarity for both the bishop entrusting the work and the competent superior who missions the religious.[48]

Agreements made for a specified period of time with provision for renewal of contract, revision after renegotiation, and the termination by either party within a designated period of time preclude problematic situations. In such agreements the bishop represents the diocese, while the superior represents the institute.[49] Religious serving as individuals in a diocesan or parochial apostolate should also have these agreements. This issue should be on the agenda in meetings between the diocesan bishop and religious superiors.

Ecclesiastical Office – Conferral[50]

Canon 682 — §1. If it concerns conferring an ecclesiastical office in a diocese upon some religious, the diocesan bishop appoints the religious, with the competent superior making the presentation, or at least assenting to the appointment.

The diocesan bishop provides for the discharge of ecclesiastical offices in the diocese,[51] while the competent superior missions the members of a religious institute. If the bishop requests a certain religious or the major superior presents a member to serve in a particular office,[52] the work should be compatible with the character and purpose of the religious institute.[53] The diocesan bishop appoints the religious to the office with the assent or consent of the competent superior.[54] It is well to have a [45] ES I: 29(2); MR 57.

[46] ES I: 29(2); cc. 678, §2; 1289.

[47] The Eastern code has no canon comparable to this norm.

[48] For a comprehensive study of this issue, see S. Kain, Written Agreements between Bishops and Religious for Entrusted Diocesan Works, CanLawStud 550 (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University, 1996).

[49] ES I: 30.2; MR 57b; c. 520; V. De Paolis, "Schema of an Agreement for the Assignment of a Parish to Religious," Con Lif 12/1–2 (1987–88) 1: 129–146, 2: 218–242.

[50] Cf. CCEO 284, §2; 431, §1.

[51] Canon 157.

[52] See cc. 158–163. Major superiors have the right to present a religious to the diocesan bishop for an ecclesiastical office in the diocese in accord with the provisions of the law.

[53] Canon 680.

[54] For such offices, see cc. 473, §2; 475; 476; 482; 494; 521, §1; 546; 556; 564; 1420; 1421, §2; 1424; 1435; 1437; 1477. Some offices, such as vicar general, episcopal vicar, judicial vicar, pastor, parochial vicar, rector of a church, and chaplain, require that the religious be a priest.

written agreement between the diocese and the religious institute to afford stability for the diocese and the religious in carrying out the office.[55]

Ecclesiastical Office – Removal[56]

§2. A religious can be removed from the office entrusted to him or her at the discretion either of the entrusting authority after having informed the religious superior or of the superior after having informed the one entrusting; neither requires the consent of the other.

The norm addresses removal from office,[57] not deprivation of office[58] which involves a penal process. Either the bishop who appointed the religious or the superior who presented or consented to the member's accepting the office can remove him or her from an ecclesiastical office. The provisions of the written agreement should be honored. The norm provides that prior notification should be given to the other competent authority, so as to provide for the office or the assignment of the religious. It would seem that a just cause would prompt such an action.[59] It could be that the gifts of the individual religious are needed in a particular work of the institute outside the diocese. It is important to remember that the primary responsibility of the religious is to the institute, not to a particular diocese.

Arbitrary administrative changes by competent superiors or diocesan bishops without appropriate consultation with the parties involved offer poor witness of ecclesial communion, cause instability in service to the diocese, and contribute to lack of trust and poor relations between the bishop and religious. The pastoral care and spiritual needs of people must always be the ultimate concern of those responsible for missioning or appointing others to sacred ministry or apostolic service. Notification of removal should be given to the religious in writing by the bishop or religious superior.[60] It would seem, too, that if injustice is perceived, the grieved party can take administrative recourse to the appropriate congregation.[61]

[55] MR 58.

[56] The Eastern code has no norm comparable to this section of the canon.

[57] Canons 192–195.

[58] Canon 196.

[59] ES I: 32; MR 58; c. 193, §3.

Visitation of Diocesan Bishop[62]

Canon 683 — §1. At the time of pastoral visitation and also in the case of necessity, the diocesan bishop, either personally or through another, can visit churches and oratories which the Christian faithful habitually attend, schools, and other works of religion or charity, whether spiritual or temporal, entrusted to religious, but not schools which are open exclusively to the institute's own students.

Religious are subject to the diocesan bishop in all that pertains to the care of souls, public worship, and other apostolic works.[63] The diocesan bishop or his delegate visits the places where these works are carried out by religious during the ordinary pastoral visitation[64] or in case of necessity. Places to which the Christian faithful have access such as churches or schools could be works proper to the religious or works entrusted to the institute by the diocesan bishop.

While the canon employs the term "entrusted" regarding works of charity or religion, the phrase

[60] Canon 193, §4.

[61] The diocesan bishop would have recourse to CICLSAL, while the major superior and/or the religious would have recourse to the CFB. The procedure for recourse, including that for a religious removed from the office of pastor, would be in accord with cc. 1732–1739.

[62] Cf. CCEO §415, §2; 420, §3. Canon 420, §3 provides that the local hierarch must visit all religious houses if the major superior who has the right of visitation has not made a visitation after five years and, after being warned by the local hierarch, still has neglected to visit them.

[63] Canon 678, §1.

[64] Canons 392; 394; 396–397; 806, §1. See R. Hill, "The Apostolate of Institutes," in J. Hite et al., eds., A Handbook on Canons 573–746 (Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1985) 219–220, note 34.

would seem to be used in the generic sense, since works proper to religious institutes are entrusted to them by the Church at the time of their approval as public juridical persons.[65] Also, the norm excludes from the episcopal visitation only those schools operated exclusively for the institute's own members. Such schools would be aspirancies, novitiates, minor or major seminaries, juniorates, and scholasticates which only candidates and members of the institute attend.

Correction of Abuses[66]

§2. If by chance he has discovered abuses and the religious superior has been warned in vain, he himself can make provision on his own authority.

Superiors have the primary responsibility for monitoring the activities of their members in living the life and performing the works of the institute. If the bishop discovers abuses while on his visitation of the apostolic works undertaken by religious, he should notify the competent superior. If the superior does not resolve the problem, the bishop can address and correct the abuse. Such abuses may be in reference to the ministry of the word, the celebration of the sacraments and sacramentals, the teaching of doctrine, the administration of temporal goods,[67] and conformity with the provisions of civil law. In case of serious violations, he can even impose penalties.[68] This right of the diocesan bishop follows from his pastoral responsibility for the care of souls in the diocese and his obligation to ensure compliance with the law.[69]

[65] ES I: 38–39.

[66] Cf. CCEO 415, §2; 417. Canon 417 provides that if abuses have crept into houses of institutes of patriarchal or of pontifical right or into their churches, and the superior, warned by the local hierarch, has failed to take care of these abuses, the hierarch is obliged to defer the matter without delay to the attention of the authority to whom the institute is immediately subject.

[67] Canon 392, §2.

[68] Canon 1320.

[69] Canons 381, §1; 392.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bibliographical material for canons 673–683 can be found after the commentary on canon 746.

CHAPTER VI
SEPARATION OF MEMBERS FROM THE INSTITUTE
[cc. 684–704]

The canons dealing with separation are extensive and detailed in an effort to recognize and protect the rights of both individuals and institutes. Some of the norms which are fully developed here for religious institutes are subsequently referred to in the canons on secular institutes and societies of apostolic life.

The forms of separation from an institute are diverse: transfer from one institute to another; exclaustration, whether requested or imposed, as a form of temporary separation; and definitive departure through a requested indult or a process of dismissal.

Not all of these options are open to members not yet perpetually professed or definitively incorporated. In some cases the process differs, not only according to the status of the member, but also according to whether the institute is of pontifical or diocesan right.

As will be indicated in the following sections, the canons regarding separation of members from an institute are among those in the Eastern code's title XII which differ significantly from the Latin code.

ARTICLE 1: TRANSFER TO ANOTHER INSTITUTE [cc. 684–685]

A religious seeking permission to transfer is contemplating a change of juridic incorporation while maintaining his or her religious consecration. Shortly after the Second Vatican Council, transfers were sometimes motivated by a desire for a more or less rapid pace of renewal. As changes in rules of life took place and certain aspects of discipline were relaxed, it also became more feasible for religious to pursue the contemplative life or a missionary vocation, which their physical stamina had not permitted before.

Years of experience have shown, however, that not all attractions to a more contemplative religious life are, indeed, true vocations to the cloister. Likewise, experience has shown the real hardship of leaving behind the shared charism and history of an institute in order to join another where one has no roots. One of the more important elements in successful transfers has been a common spirituality and/or orientation in mission between the two institutes.

Process of Transfer

Canon 684 — §1. A member in perpetual vows cannot transfer from one religious institute to another except by a grant of the supreme moderator of each institute and with the consent of their respective councils.

§2. After completing a probation which is to last at least three years, the member can be admitted to perpetual profession in the new institute. If the member refuses to make this profession or is not admitted to make it by competent superiors, however, the member is to return to the original institute unless an indult of secularization has been obtained.

§3. For a religious to transfer from an autonomous monastery to another of the same institute or federation or confederation, the consent of the major superior of each monastery and of the chapter of the receiving monastery is required and is sufficient, without prejudice to other requirements established by proper law; a new profession is not required.

§4. Proper law is to determine the time and manner of the probation which must precede the profession of a member in the new institute.

§5. For a transfer to be made to a secular institute or a society of apostolic life or from them to a religious institute, permission of the Holy See is required, whose mandates must be observed.

Only a religious in perpetual vows may apply for a transfer to another institute; and in centralized institutes, only the superiors general can grant the permission with the consent of their councils. Although the canon does not clearly indicate this, it is the major superior of an autonomous monastery (c. 615) who can permit a transfer into or out of the monastery, observing other norms of proper and universal law.

A religious wishing to transfer should put his or her desire and the motivation for it in writing, requesting the consent from each institute. Such an individual may already have gone through a period of absence (c. 665) or a time of exclaustration, in order to begin to discern the potential move. He or she may have actually spent time with the intended institute.

The receiving institute has a right to request a reasonable amount of information about the prospective member, such as might be provided by a curriculum vitae. This would include apostolic experience and indicate if there have been periods of exclaustration or incapacitating illness. While normal rules of confidentiality must be observed, it would be irresponsible for a superior general simply to give consent for transfer of a religious who has a history of chronic physical or psychological illness or of substance abuse or who is facing accusations before a civil tribunal.

If a religious's own superior apparently refuses permission without sincere motivation, one may have recourse to higher ecclesiastical authority, according to the status of one's institute. However, this can usually be avoided by personal and confidential contact between the superiors general involved. While transfer is not a right, strictly speaking, a rightly motivated religious in perpetual vows should not be forced to request an indult of departure to change institutes.

In their arrangements, the superiors should clarify certain points such as whether, and for how long, the individual will be carried on the original institute's health insurance and the dates on which the probationary period will begin and end. Provision should also be made for suitable notification of the original institute of a decision for or against permanent incorporation in the new institute.

By the law itself, the probationary period for those transferring is a minimum of three years. The code leaves to proper law the specific determination of the length and manner of probation. Some institutes may permit or require more than three years. However, it should be remembered that the individuals involved are perpetually professed religious, not novices; they are learning the charism, spirituality, way of life, and mission of a new institute. They are not new to the practice of the evangelical counsels, but must integrate the way in which they are observed in the new institute.

The permission to enter into a probationary period does not oblige either the individual or the institute to complete the process with perpetual profession. The decision to admit the individual seeking transfer to perpetual profession in the new institute is a distinct decision left in the hands of the competent superior and council according to the proper law of the receiving institute. If the individual decides not to seek perpetual profession, or is not accepted, he or she must return to the original institute unless an indult of departure has been received. (The use of the term "secularization" in the canon seems to be inadvertent.) If the individual wishes an indult of departure, normally it should be requested through the original institute of which the religious is still a professed member.

The third paragraph of the canon provides for transfers within a particular monastic family. Here it is clearly stated that the competent superiors are major superiors. In this case, only the consent of the chapter of the receiving monastery is required at the level of the universal law. Any other norms of proper law must be observed. Since both monasteries are of the same family and share the same rule, a new profession is not required.

Because of the particular circumstances and traditions of monasteries of the same institute, federation, or confederation, this paragraph of the canon became the object of an authentic interpretation. It clarified that for such monasteries, religious in temporary profession were also included under paragraph three.[1]

When a proposed transfer involves institutes of a different type, the consent of the supreme moderators and their councils is no longer sufficient. For a religious to transfer to a secular institute or a society of apostolic life, or for a religious institute to accept a member of a secular institute or a society, the permission must come from the Holy See. The same Holy See permission is relevant to members of secular institutes (c. 730) and societies of apostolic life (c. 744, §2) who wish to transfer to institutes of a different type.

Because religious and secular institutes have diverse life-styles and approaches to mission, and because institutes of consecrated life and societies have quite different practices regarding the assumption and observance of the evangelical counsels, the members will have experienced different approaches to formation. All of these factors help explain why such transfers are reserved to the Holy See and why, at times, specific provisions or conditions may be included as part of the permission. The same norms apply regardless of whether the institute or society is of pontifical or diocesan right.

As interest grows in the life of hermits (c. 603) and of consecrated virgins (c. 604), it has been asked whether a transfer is possible in these cases. Technically it is not, since no institute or society with its superiors and councils is involved. Hermits and consecrated virgins are recognized canonically as individual, not collective, forms of consecrated life.

One who wishes to pass from a religious institute to one of these individual forms of consecration must request an indult of departure in the usual way. To enter into the new state, the individual must follow the necessary procedures for being accepted by the diocesan bishop. If all of the necessary arrangements have actually been made, the indult may be requested to take effect at the time of receiving the consecration of virgins from the bishop or of pronouncing eremitical vows in his hands. Because of the great diversity between these life-styles, however, and because many bishops wisely require probationary periods before accepting individuals into these forms of consecration, it is often best, following serious discernment, to receive an indult of departure and then begin or continue preparations for definitive acceptance into the new state. Private vows or promises could be made if desired or if required by the bishop as a part of the preparation.

The question also arises about passing between approved institutes of consecrated life or societies of apostolic life and various forms of associations of the faithful. Once again, the canons on transfer cannot be applied. One wishing to make such a move must legitimately leave his or her institute or society and join the new association according to its internal procedures for accepting new members. Likewise, a member of an association cannot simply transfer to an institute of consecrated life or a society of apostolic life, even if the association is in the process of becoming such an institute or society. The individual must proceed through the normal steps for entering the institute or society.

Status of the Transferring Member

Canon 685 — §1. Until a person makes profession in the new institute, the rights and obligations which the member had in the former institute are suspended although the vows remain. Nevertheless, from the beginning of probation, the member is bound to the observance of the proper law of the new institute.

§2. Through profession in the new institute, the member is incorporated into it while the preceding vows, rights, and obligations cease.

The status of a religious during the probationary period is truly a provisional one. While still technically a member of the original institute, with the right to return there, the rights and obligations flowing from that membership are suspended in favor of observance of the proper law of the new institute. In particular, the observance of the evangelical counsels and the relationship to authority are those of the new institute. Active and passive voice in the original institute are suspended and are not acquired in the new institute until the religious actually becomes a member of it through profession.

[1] CodCom, April 29, 1987, AAS 79 (1987) 1249. See also L. Wrenn, Authentic Interpretations on the 1983 Code (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1993) 36–38.

When, in fact, the transferring religious makes perpetual profession in the new institute, there is not a new consecration to God, but a new locus of incorporation, with the resulting rights and obligations according to the new proper law.

A transfer between an institute with simple vows and one with solemn vows requires additional attention to the vow of poverty. One who originally professed solemn vows does not reacquire renounced personal patrimony; however he or she does reacquire the capacity to inherit which, canonically, had been lost. In the case of a future inheritance, attention will have to be given to the cession of administration and possibly to the adjustment of one's will.

If, however, the transfer is to an institute with solemn vows, a transferring religious will have to make the total renunciation called for in canon 668, §§4–5 at the time of the new profession. The previous act of cession will be terminated and the will adjusted as necessary.

In all cases, prior to the new profession any documents regarding personal patrimony must be appropriately reexamined and revised as necessary. The will and other legal documents pertaining to the individual would be returned at this point. With the new profession, the incardination of a religious deacon or priest passes to the new institute. In a word, the profession in the new institute effects full incorporation into it as a perpetually professed member.

Experience with such transfers has raised certain practical questions which an institute should consider. Since transferring religious have not interrupted their religious life, they should logically be inserted into the "ranks" of the new institute according to their original profession dates and celebrate jubilees according to the practice of the new institute, dating these accordingly from entrance into the novitiate, first vows, or perpetual profession in their original institute.

Institutes might profitably interpret how they will apply their constitution's requirements for certain offices. Where the role of superior or some other office requires a certain number of years of perpetual profession, it should be made clear, in the case of those who have transferred, if this will be calculated from their profession in the new institute or in the original one. This matter, unlike the matter of "rank" or celebrating jubilees, involves the issue of how much knowledge of and experience in the institute is necessary for fulfilling the office in question.

The transfer process in the Eastern code[2] is not limited to religious in perpetual vows. It almost always requires some intervention of external ecclesiastical authority and normally calls for the observance of the entire time of novitiate. Unlike the Latin code, the Eastern code has detailed provisions regarding monasteries.

ARTICLE 2: DEPARTURE FROM AN INSTITUTE [cc. 686–693]

Under the title of departure, the canons deal with the diverse categories of exclaustration and indults of departure, and with the specific questions of exclusion from further profession and of readmission to the same institute of one who has left it. Particular provisions are included for clerics.

Exclaustration

Canon 686 — §1. With the consent of the council, the supreme moderator for a grave cause can grant an indult of exclaustration to a member professed by perpetual vows, but not for more than three years, and if it concerns a cleric, with the prior consent of the ordinary of the place in which he must reside. To extend an indult or to grant it for more than three years is reserved to the Holy See, or to the diocesan bishop if it concerns institutes of diocesan right.

[2] CCEO 487–488 and 544–545.

§2. It is only for the Apostolic See to grant an indult of exclaustration for nuns.

§3. At the petition of the supreme moderator with the consent of the council, exclaustration can be imposed by the Holy See on a member of an institute of pontifical right, or by a diocesan bishop on a member of an institute of diocesan right, for grave causes, with equity and charity observed.

It is useful to note from the outset that exclaustration is not the same as the permission to be absent from a house of the institute (c. 665). The "grave cause" warranting exclaustration is something beyond the care of health, the pursuit of studies, and the exercise of an apostolate in the name of the institute. The juridic status of an individual on exclaustration (c. 687) also demonstrates a conscious distancing of the individual from the institute, which is not the case in a simple permission of absence.[3]

The same expression of a grave cause (gravi de causa) is used here and in canon 688, §2 regarding the voluntary departure of a religious in temporary vows. By way of distinction, the case of a perpetually professed seeking an indult of departure requires the gravest of causes (ob gravissimas causas, c. 691, §1). These terms are not easily quantified or explained. Nevertheless, certain examples can suggest criteria for the judgment of superiors.

The discernment of one's vocation has frequently been cited as a motive for granting a period of exclaustration. Likewise, exclaustration is often recommended as a transitional time for one who intends to leave definitively. However, it is doubtful if exclaustration is necessarily the best solution for resolving a vocational crisis and for receiving the help necessary in such circumstances.[4]

In many congregations, when a religious has a filial duty to care for an aged or dying parent, the matter is handled through a permission of absence. Such a religious is not seeking to separate, even temporarily, from the institute, but is impelled to accept a physical separation to fulfill this act of filial charity.

On the other hand, some religious, without permission, have undertaken apostolic projects which are not recognized by superiors as works in the name of the institute. After dialogue, a new apostolic assignment may be given but not accepted. Such a religious, hoping to maintain his or her project without leaving the institute, may seek exclaustration. While the religious has the right to ask, the superiors are not obliged to grant the request. The desire to avoid the demands of legitimate authority does not seem to constitute a grave cause for exclaustration.

By contrast, there may be cases of serious psychological needs which are better served by the distancing of exclaustration. Counseling undertaken to deal with trauma, such as abuse suffered in childhood, may also involve vocational discernment. Sometimes not all issues can be handled at the same time, but reasonable parameters should be set with the assistance of professional counselors who understand religious life.

Requests to the Holy See, or to the diocesan bishop, for an extension of exclaustration after three years must be judged in light of the motives indicated by the religious and the accompanying opinion of the superior and the council. The latter may also wish to recommend the duration of an extension. In some cases the Holy See, rather than determining the extension of exclaustration, may grant to the superior general the faculty necessary to do so according to his or her discretion, and with the consent of the council.

[3] Some commentators consider a period of less than one year as absence (see c. 665) rather than exclaustration. See T. Rincón Pérez, in Pamplona ComEng, 467. However, the motives for a request and the implications of the resulting juridic status would apparently have to be taken into consideration in each case.

[4] J. Torres, "La procedura di esclaustrazione del consacrato," in I procedimenti speciali nel diritto canonico (Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1992) 321.

A cleric requires the added prior consent of the ordinary of the place where he intends to reside. In some cases exclaustration may be requested precisely in view of seeking diocesan incardination. This desire is more appropriately handled under canon 693. However, in each case, it is essential that there be clarity on the part of both religious and bishop regarding the exercise of orders and any intent regarding incardination.

If a religious priest is not seeking incardination or even the exercise of sacred orders, the matter is more complex. Historically, the concept of "qualified exclaustration" was developed, with the hope of preventing laicization in cases of vocational doubt. It essentially permitted and required the priest to live as a lay person in using the sacraments, and dispensed him from all clerical obligations except celibacy for a specified amount of time. This form of exclaustration is used only where there is hope for the individual's return to priestly life.[5]

The code reserves the exclaustration of nuns to the Apostolic See. Most cloistered nuns are of the type described in canon 615, having no supreme moderator of their own. The request of a nun for exclaustration would be processed internally according to the constitutions and forwarded to the Holy See, often either through the diocesan bishop or through appointed personnel of an order of men with a special supervisory relationship to the nuns in question.

Imposed Exclaustration

The imposition of exclaustration on a religious is also reserved to the ecclesiastical authority competent according to the pontifical or diocesan status of the institute. In the latter case, the canon does not specify which bishop is competent. It would seem most plausible, however, to make the request of the bishop within whose jurisdiction the religious is living at the time of the petition.

[5] Ibid., 329–331.

The initiative in these cases comes from the institute, not the individual religious. The superior general with the consent of his or her council may request the exclaustration for grave causes. The qualification of the cause is the same as in cases of voluntary exclaustration, but the process is obviously more complex since the individual in question has not requested it. The canon calls for equity and charity in an effort to avoid overly harsh treatment of one who, in the judgment of the superior, must be removed from the community for the well-being of the other members.

In today's less structured community life, individuals with problems arising from personality disorders, childhood abuse, or substance abuse may experience some difficulty living in community. Often unwittingly, they become disruptive of it. Treatment for substance abuse or counseling for healing from childhood trauma are the preferred solutions. To be successful, these solutions need to be accompanied by the support of an informed community. However, the willingness of the individual and the capacity of the community to respond are not always present.

Where, for the good of the community, it becomes necessary to insist that an individual live out of community, the major superior, having heard the council, may initiate a process toward imposed exclaustration. The process is somewhat parallel to that for dismissal, but is necessarily different because the causal behavior often is not fully culpable. The individual must be warned that this process is under consideration, told the reasons why, encouraged to change, and informed of the right of self-defense directly to the major superior or to the supreme moderator. Unlike the process for dismissal, the process for imposed exclaustration does not require two warnings, but the efforts to assist and to warn the religious, as well as the responses, should be put in writing, even if first given verbally in the presence of two witnesses. These acts will be forwarded to the superior general.

If the individual, objectively speaking, seems to need treatment for substance abuse or a psychological evaluation and/or counseling, this should be offered and even urged, prior to initiating the process of imposing exclaustration. However, such treatment cannot be forced on an individual under obedience, with a threat of imposed exclaustration or dismissal for failure to comply.

A petition to the competent ecclesiastical authority for imposed exclaustration should include: the request of the superior general with an extract from the council meeting at which consent was given, a summary of the efforts made to assist the individual over a period of time, the concrete cause for requesting the exclaustration, the individual's response to the warning, and an indication of how the institute intends to observe equity and charity toward the individual. Since the very causes for imposed exclaustration may also be ones which limit the individual's ability to support himself or herself, specific attention must be given to this matter.

While perhaps necessary at times for the well-being of a larger number of religious, this remedy, developed after the formulation of the 1917 code largely for the sake of cloistered monasteries,[6] poses serious problems as well. In many cases it must be asked if living alone is a desired solution for certain personalities. Nevertheless, all pertinent factors must be taken into consideration and presented in the petition.

The specific case of clerics is not treated separately here, but would be conditioned by the provisions of canons 686, §1 and 687.

Exclaustration may be imposed for a specific period of time, thus building in a review, or it may be imposed without a time limit. In the latter case, it ends only by being lifted by the same authority which imposed it. Although it is not stated in the document imposing the exclaustration, such cases may give rise to administrative recourse to the Apostolic See.

Status of the Exclaustrated

Canon 687 — An exclaustrated member is considered freed from the obligations which cannot be reconciled with the new condition of his or her life, yet remains dependent upon and under the care of superiors and also of the local ordinary, especially if the member is a cleric. The member can wear the habit of the institute unless the indult determines otherwise. Nevertheless, the member lacks active and passive voice.

The canonical status of all exclaustrated individuals is essentially the same. The individual, while living out of community, is in fact still a member of the institute under vow. Celibate chastity remains unaltered; usually an individual is expected to be self-supporting, having discretion in the use of earnings, and consequently is also subject to civil norms for taxation; obedience is largely suspended in daily living, but dependence on and care from the religious superior remain. The exclaustrated religious is also under the local ordinary, presumably with particular reference to apostolic activities. This is particularly the case of religious clerics, who will have already received the consent of the same ordinary. In the case of other religious, the local ordinary should be informed of the exclaustrated religious's presence in the diocese by the competent superior, who in turn should be informed if the religious moves. The reasons for which exclaustration was requested or imposed will help suggest how much contact between the superior and the religious is desirable.

While still a member, the exclaustrated religious clearly is not living the usual life of a religious. In helping the religious get settled, the institute should not provide a community-owned car or allow the continued use of congregational credit cards. In certain circumstances, an institute may have to take civil means to clarify the distancing between the institute and the individual to distinguish the locus of liability for financial transactions or criminal behavior.

The indult, according to the situation, may prohibit the use of the institute's habit. A decision on this will also be influenced by the motivations for the exclaustration, and the living and work situations of the religious. Another clear indication of the individual's unusual status is the loss of active and passive voice. There is an internal logic in this, since the individual is neither living within the institute nor subject to its usual patterns of governance.

[6] Ibid., 327.

Voluntary exclaustration in the Eastern code[7] is granted only by the competent ecclesiastical authority to which the monastery, order, or congregation is subject. The effects of the indult are similar except for the obligation to remove the habit and the fact that the individual is subject to the eparchial bishop of the place where he or she lives, rather than to the religious superior. Exclaustration may also be imposed by the aforementioned ecclesiastical authority at the request of the competent superior with the consent of his or her council.[8]

Separation of Members in Temporary Vows

Canon 688 — §1. A person who wishes to leave an institute can depart from it when the time of profession has been completed.

§2. During the time of temporary profession, a person who asks to leave the institute for a grave cause can obtain an indult of departure from the supreme moderator with the consent of the council in an institute of pontifical right. In institutes of diocesan right and in the monasteries mentioned in can. 615, however, the bishop of the house of assignment must confirm the indult for it to be valid.

Those who have made vows for a specific period of time may freely leave at their expiration, or may request an indult to leave if the vows have not yet expired. One who wishes to leave at the expiration of vows will make this known to the superior, most probably at the time when there would otherwise be a request for admission to renewal. On the other hand, one who, in ongoing dialogue with superiors, has been advised that admission to renewal or to perpetual vows probably will not be granted may decide not to make the request.

In congregations where temporary vows are made for a number of years at a time, a religious in temporary vows may for grave reasons[9] request an indult to leave without waiting for the expiration of vows. The gravity of the cause will be discerned together with the formation director and with the competent major superior. Those who are convinced of having erred regarding a religious vocation or who find insupportable the observance of the vows or of common life may find it better for themselves and for the community to face this honestly and to move on to another form of Christian life. Formators and superiors must seek the delicate balance between emphasizing the seriousness of a vow and recognizing the necessity of some to be released from their obligations.

The supreme moderator with the consent of the council may issue the indult of departure in pontifical or diocesan institutes.[10] However, in the latter case, for validity, the indult must be confirmed by the diocesan bishop of the house to which the religious is assigned. This confirmation is also required for religious of canon 615 monasteries. In this case, unless proper law provides otherwise, the major superior would act with the council's consent.

Since perpetual profession is required for admission to the diaconate,[11] there are no particular difficulties for temporarily professed members of clerical institutes.

Canon 692, on the time when the indult takes effect, applies equally to those in temporary or perpetual vows.

[7] CCEO 489, 491, and 548.

[8] CCEO 490 and 548.

[9] For a discussion of such a grave cause see J. Torres, "La dispensa dai voti e dal giuramento," in I procedimenti, 359–360.

[10] The granting of this faculty to supreme moderators of lay religious institutes raised the question of whether they had the power to dispense from vows. See Rincón Pérez, in Pamplona ComEng, 468–469. However, since canon 692 clarifies that the dispensation comes from the law itself, the clerical or lay condition of the moderator is a moot question.

[11] See cc. 266, §2; 1019, §1.

The Eastern canons provide in a similar way for granting an indult of departure for religious in temporary vows.[12]

Exclusion from Further Profession

Canon 689 — §1. If there are just causes, the competent major superior, after having heard the council, can exclude a member from making a subsequent profession when the period of temporary profession has been completed.

§2. Physical or psychic illness, even contracted after profession, which in the judgment of experts renders the member mentioned in §1 unsuited to lead the life of the institute constitutes a cause for not admitting the member to renew profession or to make perpetual profession, unless the illness had been contracted through the negligence of the institute or through work performed in the institute.

§3. If, however, a religious becomes insane during the period of temporary vows, even though unable to make a new profession, the religious cannot be dismissed from the institute.

The language of the code shifts when speaking of excluding a religious from the renewing of vows or from perpetual profession. Here the canon speaks of just causes (iustae causae) and gives explicit norms in some of the cases which could be the most controversial.

The competent major superior is the one who, according to proper law, has the authority to admit to profession at the point of renewal or at the point of perpetual vows. In many institutes, the renewal may be provided for at the provincial level, while perpetual vows may be reserved to the superior general. In any case, unless approved proper law explicitly states otherwise, the major superior is required only to hear the council.

The major superior may seek the consent or advice of the council in the sense of canon 656, 3° and receive a negative vote. However, in applying the present canon, the major superior who has serious doubts about admitting a religious to further profession must present the perceived just causes to the council. Only after hearing the council may he or she exclude the religious.

The usual just causes for non-renewal of vows will be serious failures in observing the vows and a common life in charity. In charity and justice, these concerns will have been pointed out to the individual by those responsible for his or her formation. At times it is more charitable and just to assist an individual in returning to lay life than to continue to give a candidate the benefit of the doubt where serious questions about the person's suitability for religious life persist.

A decree resulting from the 1970 Plenaria of the Sacred Congregation for Religious and Secular Institutes[13] significantly redefined "just cause" for exclusion from further profession. Its provisions underlie canon 689, §2, with the addition of the final exceptive clause.

If the religious themselves do not see that they are physically or psychologically unsuited for the particular institute, or for religious life in general, the competent superior must have recourse to appropriate experts to apply the canon. While the canons do not grant a right to renewal of vows or to perpetual profession, but rather require for validity of vows that the individual be admitted by the competent superior (c. 656, 3°), the present canon does require a just cause for exclusion. To assure this in the case of illness, medical experts are to be used, with due respect for confidentiality and personal privacy (c. 220). Presumably a religious whose case is doubtful and who wishes to be admitted to further profession will cooperate in releasing necessary information to the competent superior.

The expert opinion is to address the individual's suitability for the life of the institute. Clearly, what is necessary for missions beyond one's own culture, or what is necessary for the cloistered life, will differ from what is required for other forms of apostolic religious life. A particular institute's way of living poverty or its community life-style may be pertinent factors. In an era when many potential candidates have suffered some form of childhood trauma and/or have been involved in substance abuse, problems may surface during the early years of profession which were not evident at the time of entrance, even to the candidate. Such persons must be treated with charity, yet justice toward the individual and the institute is also a central concern. One who is dealing with too many personal issues often cannot also make the necessary adjustment to religious life.

[12] CCEO 496 and 546, §2.

[13] SCRIS, Dum canonicarum, December 8, 1970, AAS 63 (1971) 318–319; CLD 7, 531–533.

The final clause of paragraph two further protects the individual. A young religious who, in the course of apostolic experience, has contracted an illness or suffered an injury cannot be refused profession for that reason. Likewise, if an institute has been negligent toward an individual and this has resulted in serious illness, the illness itself cannot be a cause to refuse further profession. The subjectivity possible in judging such cases is a cause of concern. At the same time, these provisions remind institutes to provide reasonable health care for all of their members.

The case of one who becomes insane (amens) is different. Since such an individual is unable freely to request renewal or to depart, he or she is, as it were, suspended in the state of temporary profession, although the temporary vows expire. The individual cannot be dismissed but rather must receive appropriate treatment and care. The institute should consult with parents or close relatives regarding their wishes in the matter. If treatment enables the individual to act responsibly, in due time a decision will be made by both the religious and the institute regarding further profession.

The Eastern canon 547 makes the same provision for excluding members in temporary vows from renewing vows or from perpetual profession.

Readmission to the Same Institute

Canon 690 — §1. The supreme moderator with the consent of the council can readmit without the burden of repeating the novitiate one who had legitimately left the institute after completing the novitiate or after profession. Moreover, it will be for the same moderator to determine an appropriate probation prior to temporary profession and the time of vows to precede perpetual profession, according to the norm of cann. 655 and 657.

§2. The superior of an autonomous monastery with the consent of the council possesses the same faculty.

This canon applies only to readmission to the same institute which one has left, and not to a generic readmission to religious life. Competency to readmit is reserved to the supreme moderator with the consent of the council. In institutes where a provincial superior usually admits to the institute, his or her role in readmission is consultative.

Readmission to an institute without the necessity of repeating the novitiate applies to one who has completed the novitiate, or left following profession, whether temporary or perpetual. While not explicitly stated, most authors judge that the canon does not apply to those who were dismissed.[14]

The canon does not explicitly state if it intends completion of the novitiate according to the minimum required by the code for validity (c. 648, §1) or if it intends the full time required according to proper law, which frequently is longer. If the minimum is taken as the norm, the superior readmitting the individual would take this factor into consideration in determining the length of probation before profession.

The supreme moderator will determine the amount of time necessary for an individual as a period of probation or preparation prior to temporary profession. In all cases there will be a period of reintegration, which may vary depending on when an individual left and for how long a time he or she was away from the institute. Likewise, in all cases there will be temporary profession.

[14] See V. De Paolis, La vita consacrata nella Chiesa (Bologna: Dehoniane, 1991) 380; E. Gambari, I Religiosi nel Codice (Milan: Ancora, 1986) 354–355; G. Girotti, in Urbaniana Com, 432; and E. Williamson, in CLSGBI Com, 387. The authors do not consider those who have been legitimately dismissed as being included among those who have "legitimately left" the institute. Canon 702's explicit reference to both those who have departed and those who have been dismissed supports this interpretation.

Some have questioned whether or not the final phrase of the canon regarding the time of vows to precede perpetual profession is to be interpreted according to Renovationis causam 38, which took into consideration the years of temporary vows completed by an individual prior to leaving the institute.[15] However, the canon does not justify such an interpretation, but rather refers to the canons which state the minimum canonical requirements for valid admission to temporary and to perpetual vows (cc. 655, 657). What the present canon does allow is a relaxation of proper law which, for example, may require six years in temporary vows before admission to perpetual profession. In accordance with canon 690, the superior general could permit a readmitted member to make perpetual profession after only three years in temporary vows, regardless of the time previously spent under vows.

All that the canon allows to superiors general is equally applicable to the superiors of autonomous monasteries, which are defined in canons 613, §1 and 615. Canon 613, §2 defines the superiors of autonomous houses as major superiors. Since candidates in these cases normally enter the monastery, as such, rather than a centralized institute, this is a logical adaptation of the canon provided by the law itself.

Under the Eastern code, the possibility of reentry into an institute is mentioned only in the canons on monasteries. Those returning must repeat the novitiate and profession "as if they have never entered religious life."[16]

[15] SCRIS, instr Renovationis causam, January 6, 1969, AAS 61 (1969) 103–120. Article 38–II required a minimum of one year before perpetual profession, "or no less than the period of temporary probation which he would have had to complete before perpetual profession at the time he left the institute."

[16] CCEO 493, §2.

Departure of the Perpetually Professed

Canon 691 — §1. A perpetually professed religious is not to request an indult of departure from an institute except for the gravest of causes considered before the Lord. The religious is to present a petition to the supreme moderator of the institute who is to transmit it along with a personal opinion and the opinion of the council to the competent authority.

§2. In institutes of pontifical right, an indult of this type is reserved to the Apostolic See. In institutes of diocesan right, however, the bishop of the diocese in which the house of assignment is situated can also grant it.

The act of perpetual profession is truly intended to be for all of one's life in all its aspects. Only the gravest of causes (ob gravissimas causas) justifies requesting an indult of departure; this petition will have been tested in serious spiritual discernment. If the religious superior has been directly involved in this discernment process, there is a better possibility of distinguishing temporary crises occasioned by some particular event or circumstance from those very grave causes which indicate a real inability to persevere in observing the evangelical counsels or community life. In some cases the admission to perpetual vows may have been poorly discerned.[17]

The granting of the indult for the perpetually professed is reserved to the competent ecclesiastical authority, but the petition must first be reviewed by the authority of the institute. Proper law may provide that the petition be presented first at the provincial level if such exists. The canon, [17] The 1995 Statistical Yearbook of the Church published by the Secretariat of State lists the departure of 398 religious priests of pontifical institutes and 46 priest members of pontifical societies of apostolic life during 1995 (378). In pontifical institutes of women, there were 198 departures from autonomous houses and 2666 from centralized institutes in 1995 (384–385). Among non-priest members of pontifical institutes of men, 1169 religious departed in 1995, as did 74 members of societies of apostolic life (531).

however, requires that the supreme moderator receive the petition and forward it to the appropriate ecclesiastical authority. It is not essential that the petition be addressed to the Holy Father or to the bishop; it may also be addressed to the general superior. What is essential is that the request stating the motives for the petition be written and signed by the petitioner.

The code does not require the consent of the general council, and it should not be required by proper law because the congregation is not competent to grant the indult. What is necessary is that the superior general express his or her own opinion in the matter, and that of the council. Nevertheless, the petition must be forwarded to the competent authority, whatever be the opinion of the superior and the council. That opinion is important since the individual requesting an indult does not always give a full account of his or her difficulties.

In forwarding the petition, the superior should also include a brief curriculum vitae of the religious, indicating dates of birth, entry, and profession as well as major apostolic activities and periods of formal education. If there have been periods of absence or of exclaustration, they should also be noted.

The granting of the indult of departure in pontifical institutes is reserved to the Apostolic See. Diocesan institutes presumably could also send their request to the Apostolic See, but the diocesan bishop of the house of assignment can also grant it. The "also" could refer to this bishop, in addition to the bishop of the principal seat of the institute. In any event, the common practice would be to turn to the diocesan bishop of the house of assignment, who possibly knows the religious better.

The major superior of a canon 615 monastery would forward the request for departure to the Holy See. The particular provisions for clerics are treated in canon 693.

The indult of departure for the perpetually professed is provided for similarly in the Eastern code: canon 492 for monasteries and canon 549 for orders and congregations. The particular provisions for clerics are found in Eastern code canons 494 and 549, §3.

Juridic Effect of the Indult

Canon 692 — Unless it has been rejected by the member in the act of notification, an indult of departure granted legitimately and made known to the member entails by the law itself dispensation from the vows and from all the obligations arising from profession.

During a discussion of the procedure for an indult of departure with any religious, whether of temporary or of perpetual vows, it could be very beneficial to point out the content of this canon in advance. The basic principles involved are those found in canons 59–71 on rescripts. The indult of departure is entrusted to the general superior who forwards it to ecclesiastical authority, and it takes effect when it is made known to the member (see c. 62). The petitioner presumably desires the rescript; thus it takes effect once it has been granted and communicated.

Nevertheless, since one is not bound to use a rescript "given only in his or her favor" unless bound by another canonical obligation (c. 71), an individual may reject the rescript in the act of notification. If in the interval between the petition and the receipt of the rescript the motivating cause has changed, the individual may, in fact, reject the indult. If the individual has had a change of heart, he or she should reject the rescript when it is communicated; otherwise the indult is effective immediately. If, in fact, it is rejected, then the individual is expected to remain in or return to full observance of religious life.

Superiors should not confuse the validity of the indult of departure from the institute with the member's signing of documents acknowledging receipt of the rescript, of financial assistance (c. 702), and of personal documents, e.g., baptismal certificate, diplomas, will. A refusal of the rescript because of disagreement over such assistance means that the individual must fully return to the institute, or petition anew. A personal acceptance of the indult or its retention when communicated through the mail, accompanied by a refusal to sign other documents, does not affect the validity of the rescript. The indult, legitimately granted and communicated to the petitioner, results ipso iure in dispensation from one's vows and from all obligations arising from profession.

The code does not specify a method of communication. The superior general is often at a distance from the petitioner and, in large institutes, the channels followed in making the request will be followed in communicating the rescript. Even a provincial may be at some distance, but presumably will know the individual; this will dictate the wisdom of communicating the rescript in person, through another, or through the mail.

The Eastern canon 493 on monasteries is essentially the same as the above, adding explicitly that obligations arising from sacred orders are not dispensed. This provision is applied to orders and congregations by canon 549, §3.

Departure of Clerics

Canon 693 — If a member is a cleric, an indult is not granted before he finds a bishop who incardinates him in the diocese or at least receives him experimentally. If he is received experimentally, he is incardinated into the diocese by the law itself after five years have passed, unless the bishop has refused him.

In the case of a religious cleric, whether deacon or priest, the canon presumes a desire to leave religious life, but not the clerical state. Hence in these cases, an indult of departure is not granted (non conceditur)[18] before a bishop has agreed to receive the cleric directly for incardination or to receive him experimentally.

If the cleric is received experimentally into the diocese, a special indult of secularization ad experimentum[19] is provided. This allows the religious cleric to remain outside his institute, in the diocese, up to the limit of the five-year experimental period. If he is subsequently incardinated in the diocese by the bishop during that period, or incardinated by the law ipso iure at the end of the five-year period, his departure from the institute is effected. Should he be refused incardination, he must return to his institute.

Because a superior general can grant exclaustration only for three years (c. 686, §1), and incardination by the law requires five years' experimentation, exclaustration is not usually the best solution for a religious cleric seeking diocesan incardination. However, a period of exclaustration for three years may possibly result in the bishop's readiness to incardinate the cleric immediately. In that case, the bishop's letter is added to the usual documents required by canon 691 for a simple indult of departure.

The cases not envisioned by the canon, but which continue to occur, are those of religious clerics who wish to terminate their membership in the religious institute, but who either have not found or do not seek a bishop who will incardinate them. These individuals most frequently state that they intend neither to exercise sacred orders nor to marry; however, they do not choose to seek laicization. It is preferable that they be assisted in seeking laicization. However, in those cases where an indult of departure has been granted, it states that the individual may not exercise sacred orders. Furthermore, while the vows and other obligations arising from religious profession are dispensed, the obligation of priestly celibacy remains.[20]

If a religious cleric seeks laicization through the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments, that dicastery is competent to dispense from religious vows at the same time.[21]

[18] It has been questioned whether this phrase of the canon prohibits the granting of an indult or expresses what is customary. Current practice, while cautious, favors the latter interpretation.

[19] Torres, "La dispensa," 370, and "La procedura," 330–331.

[20] On this point see CLD 11, 97–98.

[21] See CDWDS, littcirc, June 6, 1997, Origins 27 (August 28, 1997) 169–172.

Canon 494 of the Eastern code clearly indicates the status of a monk in sacred orders who receives an indult of departure and the ways in which he may be incardinated in a diocese. Canon 549, §3 applies to other religious in sacred orders what the above canon states for monks.

ARTICLE 3: DISMISSAL OF MEMBERS [cc. 694–704]

Three distinct canonical procedures are provided for the dismissal of a religious in temporary or perpetual vows.[22]

The first form is ipso facto dismissal (c. 694). Second, canon 695 presents the circumstances under which dismissal is required by law. Third, canon 696 introduces those other circumstances under which a member may be dismissed. These rather precise and detailed administrative procedures have been clarified through authentic interpretations; furthermore, they all admit of administrative recourse. However, as will be seen, certain concepts are borrowed from penal law. This fact, together with the grave effects of dismissal (i.e., cessation of all vows, rights, and obligations derived from profession—c. 701), make it clear that the canons are to be strictly interpreted (c. 18).

Ipso facto Dismissal

Canon 694 — §1. A member must be held as ipso facto dismissed from an institute who:

1° has defected notoriously from the Catholic faith;

2° has contracted marriage or attempted it, even only civilly.

§2. In these cases, after the proofs have been collected, the major superior with the council is to issue without any delay a declaration of fact so that the dismissal is established juridically.

In the cases described here, the performance of the act itself (ipso facto) effects the member's dismissal from the institute. While the major superior must collect proofs to establish the fact juridically, it is not the superior's declaration which effects the dismissal.

The determination of notorious defection from the Catholic faith is not a simple matter in every case. It surely is not present in every statement critical of the Church's teaching or practice. Canon 750 clarifies somewhat precisely yet generically the content of Catholic faith. However, this canon on dismissal does not mention any of the delicts defined in canon 751: heresy, apostasy, or schism, each of which entails a latae sententiae excommunication (c. 1364, §1).

The notorious nature of one's defection is not simply a matter of popular opinion regarding the individual. Rather, there must be clear proof in the external forum. A case of notorious defection would be that of a religious who, without seeking an indult of departure, has, in fact, joined another Christian or non-Christian faith community, consistently substituting that community's public worship for that of the Catholic Church. In some cases, individuals may have begun studies for official ministry in such a community. If, after having acted publicly in this way, the religious seeks an indult of departure, the major superior, having reviewed the proofs with the council, should simply declare the fact of dismissal (c. 694, §1, 1°).

If, in the above case, the defection is doubtful, but there is a petition for an indult of departure, it should be handled according to canon 688, §2 or canon 691. If there is doubt about the notoriety of the defection, and there is no request for an indult, it may be more prudent to follow the procedure for facultative dismissal (c. 696).

Cases of marriage or attempted marriage are more easily proven through written documents. In all such cases, including that of one in temporary vows, there follows ipso facto dismissal, with the effects expressed in canon 701. Furthermore, a public perpetual vow of chastity in a religious institute renders marriage invalid (c. 1088). Likewise, a perpetually professed religious cleric who attempts marriage incurs a latae sententiae suspension; a non-clerical religious incurs a latae sententiae interdict (c. 1394).

[22] For a summary of the changes here from the 1917 code see Rincón Pérez, in Pamplona ComEng, 471–472.

Since the superior's declaration does not effect the dismissal, this process is not reserved to the highest superior. It is a major superior (c. 620) who acts with the council; the canon does not specify a vote in this case, but a common reflection on the proofs. The declaration, which must not be delayed once proof is obtained, should state the objective facts: the name of the person, the factual cause of dismissal, and the declaration of the fact of dismissal in virtue of this canon. The declaration, duly signed by the major superior and a notary, should be communicated to the individual concerned, placed in the individual's file, and, if handled at the provincial level, communicated to the generalate. It should be noted that canon 702 applies also to dismissed members.

Norms regulating ipso facto dismissal in the Eastern code[23] are essentially the same as those above, with the added useful provision that the ecclesiastical authority to which the monastery, order, or congregation is subject should be informed.

Mandatory Dismissal

Canon 695 — §1. A member must be dismissed for the delicts mentioned in cann. 1397, 1398, and 1395, unless in the delicts mentioned in can. 1395, §2, the superior decides that dismissal is not completely necessary and that correction of the member, restitution of justice, and reparation of scandal can be resolved sufficiently in another way.

§2. In these cases, after the proofs regarding the facts and imputability have been collected, the major superior is to make known the accusation and proofs to the member to be dismissed, giving the member the opportunity for self-defense. All the acts, signed by the major superior and a notary, together with the responses of the member, put in writing and signed by that member, are to be transmitted to the supreme moderator.

Cases of mandatory dismissal are indicated through references to delicts found in Book VI of the code.[24] In brief, canon 1397 involves homicide, fraudulent or forcible kidnapping or detention, mutilation or grave wounding of another. Canon 1398 deals with one who procures a completed abortion. Canon 1395, §1 deals with living in concubinage, or persisting in a scandalous situation involving an external sin against the sixth commandment. Canon 1395, §2 then speaks of other offenses against the same commandment, committed by force or threats or publicly or with a minor below the age of sixteen. Private acts with a consenting adult would not be considered under this particular paragraph.

Two preliminary observations are warranted. First, the present canon on mandatory dismissal applies each of these delicts to all religious. Thus, the procuring of an abortion pertains not only to women religious but also to a religious priest or brother actively involved in such an abortion. Similarly, although canon 1395 defines a delict for clerics, canon 695 makes the same acts the cause for dismissal of any religious.[25]

Second, the canon makes a clear distinction in the case of canon 1395, §2. Not every case of such a delict entails obligatory dismissal. Consideration must be given to the possible reform of the offender, the restitution of justice, and the reparation of scandal. In addition, the delicts in paragraph one are continuing offenses, whereas those in paragraph two seem to be single acts. In this context, the offender might be reformed, justice might possibly be restored, and scandal could be repaired through other penalties or non-penal measures on the part of the institute.

[23] CCEO 497 and 551.

[24] See commentary regarding cc. 1397, 1398, and 1395.

[25] De Paolis observes that, on this point, the canon is poorly written. Canon 695 speaks of dismissal for delicts, yet in the case of canon 1395 only clerics are the subject of the delict. Nevertheless, De Paolis states that the sense of the canon seems obvious: even non-clerical religious are to be dismissed for committing the acts listed in canon 1395 (387).

In today's climate of litigation against priests and religious men and women on charges of child sexual abuse, the superior's decision in such cases requires great prudence, with due regard for the input of experienced legal counsel.

The procedure in cases of mandatory dismissal begins at the level of a major superior, if there is one other than the superior general. He or she must collect the proofs regarding the fact and imputability of the alleged delict, observing certain principles from penal law. Canon 1321, §3 expresses the principle that imputability is presumed where an external legal violation has occurred, unless it is otherwise apparent. Thus, it is particularly important first to have proof of the fact, and then consider canons 1322–1327 on exempting, mitigating, or aggravating circumstances.[26]

In such cases of mandatory dismissal, the council need not be consulted before beginning the process, as in the case of facultative dismissal (c. 696). Once the proofs are gathered, the accusations and the proofs are made known to the religious and the individual is given an opportunity for self-defense. While presumably the member's self-defense will be written and signed as part of the acts transmitted to the superior general, canon 698 also provides the option of offering one's defense directly to the highest superior.

The religious in this situation should be treated with sincere pastoral concern. At the same time, however, such cases should be handled expeditiously. At some point in the process, depending on the circumstances, the religious should also be informed of the possible penal implications of his or her acts. If simultaneously civil law action is taken against the individual, another prudent judgment may have to be made regarding the timeliness of the dismissal process.

It is important to note that since the intermediate major superior makes no decision in the matter, the council has no formal role. All of the acts, whatever their probative force regarding the facts or the imputability, are signed by that superior and a notary (usually the provincial secretary) and forwarded to the superior general.[27]

In these cases, the procedure then continues with the collegial act of the general council (c. 699). Since the law requires dismissal for the delicts listed, the decision to be made by the superior general with the council is whether the acts constitute proof of the fact and the imputability of the legal violation. If the answer to this question is yes, then the decree is to be issued (c. 700). If the case involves a violation of canon 1395, §2, a decision must be made as to how to proceed in reforming the offender, restoring justice, and repairing scandal, if it seems that dismissal is not necessary.[28]

There is no parallel to canon 695 in the Eastern code.

Facultative Dismissal

Canon 696 — §1. A member can also be dismissed for other causes provided that they are grave, external, imputable, and juridically proven such as: habitual neglect of the obligations of consecrated life; repeated violations of the sacred bonds; stubborn disobedience to the legitimate prescripts of superiors in a grave matter; grave scandal arising from the culpable behavior of the member; stubborn upholding or diffusion of doctrines condemned by the magisterium of the Church; public adherence to ideologies infected by materialism or atheism; the illegitimate absence mentioned in can. 665, §2, lasting six months; other causes of [26] De Paolis, 389.

[27] In cases of alleged abortion, medical proofs of the fact cannot always be procured. Likewise, even if there is strong evidence that the act probably occurred, there may be equally clear evidence of circumstances which mitigate imputability and call for a solution other than dismissal. The same mitigating circumstances also exempt from the latae sententiae penalty for abortion (c. 1324, §3).

[28] De Paolis notes that possibly there are cases other than those of canon 1395, §2, when measures other than dismissal might be taken, in consultation with the Holy See (390).

similar gravity which the proper law of the institute may determine.

§2. For the dismissal of a member in temporary vows, even causes of lesser gravity established in proper law are sufficient.

The motives justifying facultative dismissal are extensive but not taxative. They touch upon essential areas of religious life, its public witness and ecclesial communion. In every case, such causes must be grave, external, imputable, and juridically proven. The seriousness of the process is further manifested in the qualifying words such as "habitual," "repeated," "stubborn," "grave," "culpable," "public." Isolated acts, acts involving less serious matters, acts entailing mitigated imputability, or acts not provable in the external forum cannot become the cause of dismissal. At each stage of the process these aspects of the case are to be examined, and warnings are to be repeated enabling the individual to terminate the behavior for which dismissal is threatened. It should be noted that in the case of illegitimate absence, the process cannot be initiated prior to a six-month absence.

If proper law adds other causes of dismissal for perpetually professed members, these causes must be of similar gravity. However, religious in temporary vows can be dismissed for less grave causes, such as a lack of religious spirit which causes scandal. These causes are to be established in proper law.

Unless temporary profession has been made for several years, or the situation, while not covered by canons 694 or 695, is nevertheless extremely serious, it is advisable to await the expiration of the vows. Normally the individual will have been made aware of the problems and advised that he or she will probably not be accepted for further profession, in accord with canon 689, §1. If, however, the dismissal is to be pursued, the following canons are to be observed.

Canonical Warnings

Canon 697 — In the cases mentioned in can. 696, if the major superior, after having heard the council, has decided that a process of dismissal must be begun:

1° the major superior is to collect or complete the proofs;

2° the major superior is to warn the member in writing or before two witnesses with an explicit threat of subsequent dismissal unless the member reforms, with the cause for dismissal clearly indicated and full opportunity for self-defense given to the member; if the warning occurs in vain, however, the superior is to proceed to another warning after an intervening space of at least fifteen days;

3° if this warning also occurs in vain and the major superior with the council decides that incorrigibility is sufficiently evident and that the defenses of the member are insufficient, after fifteen days have elapsed from the last warning without effect, the major superior is to transmit to the supreme moderator all the acts, signed personally and by a notary, along with the signed responses of the member.

In cases of facultative dismissal, unless there is no major superior other than the superior general, the process of dismissal is initiated by an intermediate major superior such as a provincial.[29] The first formal step, to be documented in the acts of the case, is the meeting of the major superior with the council. After hearing the council, a major superior who decides to proceed collects or completes the proofs. Depending on the cause, these may include documents, writings, letters, formal obediences issued by the same superior, etc.

The next step, the formal canonical warnings, should always be put in writing, even if they are first communicated verbally in the presence of two witnesses. These warnings must be clear, complete, and precise in justice to the individual and as a basis for an eventual decree. The cause indicated in the warnings will be the same as that eventually written in the decree and cannot change as the case proceeds. Although a member may be guilty of various violations of his or her religious obligations, it is better to proceed with one juridically proven cause which is clearly grave, external, and imputable rather than trying to include everything in the canonical warnings.

[29] In the spirit of canon 1341, the superior will have made various pastoral efforts to correct the behavior of the religious before initiating a dismissal process.

Each warning must clearly indicate the cause warranting dismissal and explicitly threaten subsequent dismissal if the member does not reform. What is expected on the part of the individual must be clear and measurable: compliance with an explicit obedience, return to a designated house by a specific date, written retraction of condemned teachings, etc. It is not acceptable, however, to require the religious to request an indult of departure to avoid dismissal, nor may one be forced by this threat into psychological counseling or substance abuse treatment. These require a free act on the part of the individual. The warnings must also provide the individual with full opportunity for self-defense. This may be through personal meetings, by letter to the major superior, or through direct communication with the superior general (c. 698).

A religious threatened with dismissal may request the assistance of a canonist, a vicar or delegate for religious, or some other qualified person.

The code requires two such warnings, with an interval of at least fifteen days between them. When the warning has been given in person, the days count from that date. When it is communicated in writing, the days would count from the day on which the individual receives the warning. Thus, it is preferable, whenever possible, to send such letters through some form of registered mail which will result in proof of delivery. In some circumstances, the letter should be delivered in person, and this can then be attested to in the acts. In extreme cases, when the whereabouts of the religious cannot be determined, the canonical warnings may be expedited by posting them in the most recent house of assignment.

Although the canon does not state fifteen days of "useful time," it is more prudent to follow the principle of canon 201, §2, discounting Sundays and holidays. Beyond this formality, there must be a reasonable consideration of location, postal service, and circumstances permitting compliance with the warning or receipt of a response.

The second warning should be essentially the same in content as the first, with due regard for any possible defense received. If the first warning is in vain, the superior is to proceed to the second. Obviously, if the individual complies with what was required, the process is terminated. If there is a defense, but one which the superior considers inadequate, the process continues to the second warning, without any required consultation with the council. If the individual at this point spontaneously requests an indult of departure, it may be processed in the usual way, rather than proceeding with dismissal.

After a second warning and a second period of at least fifteen days, the superior's council must be involved in the process again. However, the canon does not state its explicit role: "the major superior with the council decides." From this it is at least evident that the formality of consent is not required.[30] The minutes of the council meeting will record the decision taken by the superior after having heard the council. The superior with the council examines two points: whether the incorrigibility of the member is evident and whether the defenses are insufficient. Perhaps the individual has sufficiently convinced the superior and council of his or her intent and capacity to reform. Likewise, the defenses may be sufficient to convince the superior and council that the accusations against the religious were exaggerated and not actually a cause for dismissal. If so, the process ends; if not, the case is referred to the superior general, who proceeds in accord with canon 699.[31]

[30] See canon 127, §1 for the distinction between consent and counsel. Williamson, without explanation, refers to consent of the council in this context (CLSGBI Com, 392). De Paolis, on the other hand, interprets the canon as calling for the hearing of the council (393).

[31] If there is no intermediate major superior, the general superior will have handled all of the preceding steps.

The acts which must be transmitted to the superior general will include: the minutes of the first meeting prior to beginning the process; the significant proofs upon which the case is based; the two warning letters with some proof of receipt; the defenses of the member received in writing or signed by the member if given orally and later put into writing; the minutes of the council meeting to consider incorrigibility and the sufficiency of defense. The acts are to be signed by the major superior and a notary, normally the provincial secretary.

At this point in the process, the acts of dismissal involving a religious of those monasteries mentioned in canon 615 would be forwarded to the diocesan bishop for his decision (c. 699, §2).

Access to the Supreme Moderator

Canon 698 — In all the cases mentioned in cann. 695 and 696, the right of the member to communicate with and to offer defenses directly to the supreme moderator always remains intact.

In all mandatory or facultative dismissal cases, where the institute's structures include intermediate major superiors, this canon recognizes the right of the religious to offer his or her self-defense directly to the highest superior. However, this does not interrupt the process begun at the lower level. The major superior must complete the acts to be transmitted to the general superior according to the procedure indicated in canons 695 and 697. Obviously, matters will be greatly facilitated if the intermediate major superior has been informed of the fact that the defense of the religious has been sent and/or received by the general superior, thus completing the acts.

Decision on Dismissal

Canon 699 — §1. The supreme moderator with the council, which must consist of at least four members for validity, is to proceed collegially to the accurate consideration of the proofs, arguments, and defenses; if it has been decided through secret ballot, the supreme moderator is to issue a decree of dismissal with the reasons in law and in fact expressed at least summarily for validity.

§2. In the autonomous monasteries mentioned in can. 615, it belongs to the diocesan bishop, to whom the superior is to submit the acts examined by the council, to decide on dismissal.

The formal decision regarding dismissal is made collegially by the general superior with the council. Two points condition the validity of the act; these deal with the composition of the council and the content of the decree.

The council must, for validity, consist of at least four members in addition to the superior general. In institutes without four general councilors, proper law should indicate who is to be called, or specify how the decision is made. In the absence of these provisions in proper law, the superior general should, with the consent of the council, choose a perpetually professed member who is prudent and experienced to complete the required number.

The council is to study all of the acts submitted to determine whether the religious in question is to be dismissed. In this secret collegial vote, the superior general and councilors all have equal voice in deciding the matter. This is not a question of the council giving consent, subject to canon 127. If an absolute majority votes in favor of dismissal, the superior general is to issue the decree. While the canon does not require more than this, a seriously divided vote inevitably raises doubts about the dismissal being justified. The letter accompanying the decree to be confirmed by ecclesiastical authority should indicate the vote, unanimous or otherwise. The decision is made by a collegial vote, but the decree is to be issued by the superior general.[32]

The second point of the canon touching the validity of the decree concerns its content. It must, for validity, contain the reason for dismissal, in law and in fact, at least in summary form. As noted earlier, these will be the points already set forth in the canonical warnings. The decree will express that a specific matter is cause for dismissal in universal (c. 696, §1) and proper law and then indicate factually the individual's violation in this matter as the reason for dismissal.

[32] See c. 48 on individual decrees issued by one having executive authority. On the decree being an act of the superior general, see also De Paolis, 394.

The above procedure is the same whether the institute is of pontifical or diocesan right. However, for canon 615 monasteries, the diocesan bishop makes the decision, there being no general superior. Because these monasteries are of pontifical right, he then forwards the decree to the Holy See for confirmation (c. 700).

Confirmation of the Decree

Canon 700 — A decree of dismissal does not have effect unless it has been confirmed by the Holy See, to which the decree and all the acts must be transmitted; if it concerns an institute of diocesan right, confirmation belongs to the bishop of the diocese where the house to which the religious has been attached is situated. To be valid, however, the decree must indicate the right which the dismissed possesses to make recourse to the competent authority within ten days from receiving notification. The recourse has suspensive effect.

The necessity of having the decree of dismissal confirmed by the Holy See or by the bishop of the house to which the religious has been attached, before it takes effect, gave rise to certain questions. Was the religious in question to be informed of the decree before or after its confirmation? Did the religious have a right to know that the process was at this stage, or would such notification place the superior in an untenable position if the confirmation were delayed or refused? The March 21, 1986 authentic interpretation stated that the confirmation was to be sought first.[33]

This canon adds a further point regarding the validity of the decree to those factors listed in canon 699, §1. The decree must include the right of the dismissed to make recourse to the competent authority within ten days from receiving notification of dismissal. Given the above authentic interpretation, this clearly refers to notification of the confirmed decree. If made within the ten days, the recourse has suspensive effect by the law itself; in short, the decree of dismissal has no effect as yet. Presumably the canon intends the ten "useful" days as provided for in canon 1734, §2 regarding recourse against administrative decrees.

There remained, however, the question as to who was the competent authority. This also occasioned an authentic interpretation, given together with that regarding notification of the decree. The question posed asked if the authority competent to receive the suspensive recourse was the Congregation for Religious and Secular Institutes which confirmed the decree, or the Supreme Tribunal of the Apostolic Signatura. The response: affirmative to the first; negative to the second.[34] The interpretation has not ended discussion over the appropriateness of the congregation which confirms the decree also being the body which rules on recourse against such a confirmation. However, the interpretation has made clear to institutes and their members what avenues to follow.

Despite such authoritative confirmation, the decree actually remains an act of the superior general, to whom the religious has had access as author of the decree throughout the process (c. 698). The canons on administrative recourse cannot be applied literally since this is a distinct procedure provided for in religious law. Nevertheless, there is a certain logic in directing the recourse to the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life as hierarchical superior of the author of the decree (c. 1737, §1).

The fact remains that, following an unsuccessful recourse to the confirming dicastery, a dismissed religious may have recourse to the Apostolic Signatura following the norms for hierarchical recourse (cc. 1734–1739). The continued suspensive effect of the recourse must be decided according to these canons. Such recourse should have some firm foundation, above all in procedural law. A canonist asked to assist a religious in such a recourse should have access to the full acts of the case to avoid useless procedures and delays occasioned by partial information. The institute must pay the expenses of a recourse to the Signatura.

[33] AAS 78 (1986) 1323.

[34] Ibid. For comments on these two interpretations, see also A. Stankiewicz, P 77 (1988) 149–158 and L. Wrenn, Authentic Interpretations, 24–26.

The authentic interpretation on recourse does not deal with diocesan institutes, but its logical application to them would make the diocesan bishop the first avenue of recourse, followed by the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life.

Juridic Effect of the Decree

Canon 701 — By legitimate dismissal, vows as well as the rights and obligations deriving from profession cease ipso facto. Nevertheless, if the member is a cleric, he cannot exercise sacred orders until he finds a bishop who receives him into the diocese after an appropriate probation according to the norm of can. 693 or at least permits him to exercise sacred orders.

The effects of legitimate dismissal follow ipso facto, in all types of dismissal. All that derives from religious profession ceases: vows, rights, and obligations. This phrase, "deriving from profession," is of juridic significance, since other obligations may remain. This is particularly true for the dismissed cleric who remains bound by clerical celibacy. Such a clerical dismissal clearly results in the anomaly of a cleric without incardination. Unlike a cleric with an indult granted to cover a period ad experimentum[35] with a view to diocesan incardination, the dismissed cleric is no longer a member of his institute.[36]

The canon itself prohibits the exercise of sacred orders until a bishop permits this. The obligation of celibacy remains unless laicization has been obtained. Sometimes such a cleric has been living away from his institute for some time and has not been exercising orders. When it is clear that he intends neither to return nor to regularize his status, the institute sometimes chooses to proceed to dismissal. When a bishop allows a priest dismissed from a religious institute or a society with the faculty of incardination to exercise sacred ministry in the diocese, he should establish clearly in writing whether a period of experimentation toward incardination is being initiated (c. 268, §1).

In treating facultative dismissal of a professed religious, the Eastern code provides differently for those in temporary vows.[37] In these cases, for which "a lack of religious spirit which can be a cause of scandal to others" (CCEO 552, §1, 2°) is sufficient cause, the superior general may act with the consent of the council, unless the statutes reserve this to another authority. The code itself reserves the confirmation of dismissal of those in temporary profession to hierarchical authority in the case of sui iuris monasteries.[38]

In the case of the perpetually professed, orders and congregations follow canons 500–503 provided for monks and nuns, with the added clarification that the competent authority is the superior general.[39] The full canonical process is spelled out, without, however, a listing of causes of dismissal. The most significant procedural difference is the provision at the point of recourse for a petition that the case be handled judicially rather than through administrative recourse. This is not an option, however, if the Apostolic See has confirmed the decree.[40] The competent tribunal is that of the authority immediately superior to the one which has confirmed the decree.[41]

[35] See c. 693.

[36] For two opinions on the status of a dismissed cleric see T. Green and R. Wiatrowski, CLSA Advisory Opinions: 1984–1993, ed. P. Cogan (Washington D.C.: CLSA, 1995) 205–210.

[37] CCEO 499 and 552.

[38] CCEO 499.

[39] CCEO 553.

[40] CCEO 501, §2. See also R. Metz, Le Nouveau Droit des Eglises Orientales Catholiques (Paris: Cerf, 1997) 175, 167–169.

[41] CCEO 501, §4.

The effects of dismissal are similar to those of the Latin code, except that those dismissed ipso iure are not considered released from the bonds and obligations stemming from profession.[42] Thus, in order to regularize his or her status, the religious dismissed ipso iure must pursue the normal canonical procedures for seeking the dispensation from vows and, according to the particular case, the lifting of sanctions and irregularities for the exercise of orders.[43]

Concluding Canons

The three final canons of chapter 6 are not specifically related to those immediately preceding on dismissal. Rather, they deal with certain other points touching various areas of separation.

Assisting Those Who Leave

Canon 702 — §1. Those who depart from a religious institute legitimately or have been dismissed from it legitimately can request nothing from the institute for any work done in it.

§2. Nevertheless, the institute is to observe equity and the charity of the gospel toward a member who is separated from it.

The two parts of canon 702 strike a balance. The religious who departs from the institute has no right to ask recompense for years of work in the institute. One must remember the interrelatedness of canon 668, §3 on a community of goods created through observance of the vow of poverty, and canon 670 on the obligations of the institute to support the members through that community of goods. The religious has not owned his or her earnings and has accumulated nothing. On the other hand, he or she has received formation, education, food, shelter, and all that was reasonably necessary to fulfill his or her vocation. Thus, one who leaves the institute has received much, but aside from possible personal patrimony, he or she has nothing. Thus, the canon's second paragraph speaks of treating the departing member with equity and gospel charity. The same logic explains the canon's inclusion even of those who have been legitimately dismissed.

The use of the term "equity," rather than "justice," indicates that cases vary and not every departing member will receive the same assistance. Factors entering into the discernment of how to observe equity and gospel charity include age, health, education, employable skills, personal patrimony, investment in work-related and/or government pension programs, the financial status of the institute, and its capacity to support all of its members into the future. A prior period of exclaustration may have included funds for helping a departing religious get established. At any point in such processes, it is best that financial arrangements be in writing. As canon 692 is better understood, there should be fewer cases of confusion over a departing member's refusing to sign a financial statement while not really wishing to refuse the indult of departure.

Various legal instruments may be used to assist departing members in an ongoing way, rather than by giving a lump sum. With proper care, these can be used without harm to the institute.[44]

Expulsion from a House

Canon 703 — In the case of grave external scandal or of most grave imminent harm to the institute, a member can be expelled immediately from [42] CCEO 502. On this point see C. Pujol, La Vita Religiosa Orientale (Rome: Pontificio Istituto Orientale, 1994) 390. There is an interesting similarity between this provision and canon 669 of the 1917 code.

[43] The code commission did not wish to permit a situation in which, by way of a delict, one would be freed from all bonds flowing from monastic profession or appear to be in a state to seek diocesan incardination. Nu 16 (1983) 70–71 and 28 (1989) 70.

[44] For a detailed canonical and civil discussion of this canon, see M. Welch and P. Campbell, "Provisions for Departing Members," Bulletin on Issues of Religious Law 12 (Fall, 1996).

a religious house by the major superior or, if there is danger in delay, by the local superior with the consent of the council. If it is necessary, the major superior is to take care to begin a process of dismissal according to the norm of law or is to refer the matter to the Apostolic See.

The application of this canon is and should be very rare. Although it follows the canons on dismissal, this provision is clearly not a form of dismissal from the institute. However, under certain circumstances it may be necessary to begin a formal dismissal process.

Immediate expulsion from a religious house is justified only by grave external scandal and most grave imminent harm to the institute. The scandal here must be external, not internal to the community; the danger must be imminent, that is, already present and threatening.[45]

Expulsion as such is a provisional measure. If dismissal is called for, the applicable procedure is to be initiated according to the canons. In other cases, the matter is to be referred to the Apostolic See for further indications on how to proceed. In such cases a member may, of course, spontaneously request an indult of departure.

A major superior may expel the member on his or her own authority; however, if it is urgent that a local superior act, the council must have given consent. Obviously, the major superior who will take the next step must be informed immediately.[46]

Periodic Report of Separations

Canon 704 — In the report referred to in can. 592, §1, which is to be sent to the Apostolic See, mention is to be made of members who have been separated from the institute in any way.

In a circular letter dated January 2, 1988,[47] the Congregation for Religious and Secular Institutes provided guidelines for the reports referred to in this canon. When providing membership statistics, the institute will include information regarding those who have separated from it.

[45] De Paolis, 397. In commenting on the parallel material in CCEO 498 and 551, Pujol observes that such scandal or harm may be increased if civil legal action has been taken or if there is publicity through the media (381).

[46] For other comments on this canon, see J. Beyer, Le Droit de la Vie Consacrée (Paris: Tardy, 1988) 2:201, and Williamson, in CLSGBI Com, 395.

[47] AAS 80 (1988) 104–106; Con Lif 14 (1988) 266–267. A commentary by E. Sastre Santos follows the text of the documents for religious and for secular institutes, 270–287.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bibliographical material for canons 684–704 can be found after the commentary on canon 746.

CHAPTER VII
RELIGIOUS RAISED TO THE EPISCOPATE[1]
[cc. 705–707]

Religious life belongs to the life and holiness of the Church; however, it is not part of the hierarchical structure of the Church.[2] At times the Roman Pontiff calls an individual religious to serve as a diocesan or titular bishop (c. 376) or in an office equivalent to that of a diocesan bishop (cc. 368, 381, §2).[3] To serve as pastor of the Christian faithful would not be incompatible with the vocation of one who has offered a total gift of self to God in service to his people through the profession of the evangelical counsels. However, certain adjustments need to be made, particularly in the areas of obedience and poverty, in order to free the religious for this more extensive service to the Church.

Juridical Status of the Religious[4]

Canon 705 — A religious raised to the episcopate remains a member of his institute but is subject only to the Roman Pontiff by virtue of the vow of obedience and is not bound by obligations which he himself prudently judges cannot be reconciled with his condition.

The religious remains a member of his institute and is bound by the obligations of religious life that are not incompatible with his office as bishop. Appointment to the episcopal office removes him from the authority of the superiors at all levels in his institute and renders him immediately subject to the Roman Pontiff by reason of his vow of obedience.[5] Any office the religious held within or beyond the religious institute would cease with his appointment as bishop.

Appointment to the episcopal office implies serious obligations toward a community of the Christian faithful. The norm permits the religious appointed a bishop to make prudential judgments in dispensing himself from obligations of religious life that are incompatible with the demands of his office. The obligations of common life,[6] traditional or devotional practices of the religious institute,[7] and restrictions on the use of personal goods resultant from the vow of poverty[8] addressed in the next canon are some examples of such possibly incompatible obligations.

Effects on Vow of Poverty[9]

Canon 706 — The religious mentioned above:

1° if he has lost the right of ownership of goods through profession, has the use, revenue, and administration of goods which accrue to him; a diocesan bishop and the others mentioned in can. 381, §2, however, acquire property on behalf of the particular church; others, on behalf of the institute or the Holy See insofar as the institute is capable or not of possession;

This canon provides for adjustments in the vow of poverty for the religious appointed a bishop. Number one applies to a religious who has re-

[1] Beyer observes that the content of these canons could be more appropriately placed in the section on bishops or in general norms on consecrated life, since they can apply to clerics belonging to secular institutes or societies of apostolic life. The principle of c. 19 provides that the provisions of cc. 705–707 would apply in such similar cases. See Beyer, Le Droit de la Vie Consacrée (Paris: Editions Tardy, 1988) 2: 206.

[2] LG 44.

[3] Canons 705–707 apply to cardinals, inasmuch as they are consecrated bishops when promoted to the cardinalate (c. 351, §1).

[4] Cf. CCEO 431, §2.

[5] Canon 590, §2. For example, the religious consecrated a bishop would no longer be subject to religious superiors in accord with c. 671.

[6] Canon 607, §2.

[7] Canons 662; 663, §3.

[8] Canon 668.

[9] Cf. CCEO 431, §3, 1°.

nounced the ownership of goods by religious profession.[10] The religious does not regain the ownership he renounced, but he does enjoy the administration, use, and revenues of goods that come to him during the time he holds episcopal office. If he is a diocesan bishop or equivalent to a diocesan bishop,[11] he acquires the ownership of the goods for the particular church he serves. Titular bishops acquire the ownership of such goods for their own institute, if it is capable of ownership;[12] otherwise, ownership is acquired by the Apostolic See.

2° if he has not lost the right of ownership of goods through profession, recovers the use, revenue, and administration of the goods which he had; those things which accrue to him afterwards he fully acquires for himself;[13]

If the religious bishop did not renounce the ownership of his goods by religious profession,[14] he regains the administration, use, and revenues of the temporal goods that already belong to him, as well as those goods coming to him through the episcopal office. He acquires the ownership of those temporal goods which come to him personally as remuneration or gift while he serves as bishop. However, it would seem that the bishop remains bound by the spirit of his vow of poverty in the administration and use of all temporal goods.

3° in either case, however, must dispose of goods according to the intention of the donors when they do not accrue to him personally.[15]

The legislation of Book V, "The Temporal Goods of the Church," binds the religious as a bishop. Goods that do not come to the bishop personally (intuitu personae) must be disposed of in accord with the intention of the donors or testators.[16]

Retired Bishop Religious

Canon 707 — §1. A retired religious bishop can choose a place of residence even outside the houses of his institute, unless the Apostolic See has provided otherwise.[17]

A retired bishop has the right to choose a place of residence in or outside his institute, unless the Apostolic See has provided otherwise.[18]

§2. If he has served some diocese, can. 402, §2 is to be observed with respect to his appropriate and worthy support, unless his own institute wishes to provide such support; otherwise the Apostolic See is to provide in another manner.

While a religious institute may offer to provide for a retired bishop who is one of its members, the primary obligation for the bishop's suitable and decent support belongs to the particular church he served given his ongoing pastoral relationship to that people of God.[19] Episcopal conferences must ensure that suitable and worthy provision be made for a bishop who retires.[20]

The retired religious bishop continues to be a member of the episcopal college.[21] He can participate in an ecumenical council with a deliberative vote[22] and exercise collegial activity.[23] A retired diocesan bishop retains the title of emeritus of his diocese and has the right to be buried in its cathedral.[24]

[10] Canon 668, §§4–5.
[11] Canon 381, §2.
[12] Canon 634, §1.
[13] Cf. CCEO 431, §3, 2°.
[14] Canon 668, §1.
[15] Cf. CCEO 431, §3, 3°.
[16] Canons 1267, §3; 1300–1306; 1310.
[17] Cf. CCEO 431, §2, 2°.
[18] Canons 401; 402, §1.
[19] Canons 368; 381, §2.
[20] Canons 402, §2; 411.
[21] Canon 336.
[22] Canon 339.
[23] Canon 377, §2.
[24] Canons 402, §1; 1242; CFB, October 31, 1988, Comm 20 (1988) 167–168.

The canons do not address the issue of active and passive voice in the religious institute for an active or retired bishop.[25] However, on May 17, 1986, John Paul II approved a response of the Pontifical Council for the Interpretation of Legislative Texts. The response was in the negative as to whether a religious consecrated bishop enjoyed active or passive voice in his religious institute. Neither the question nor the response distinguished between an active and retired bishop.[26]

CHAPTER VIII
CONFERENCES OF MAJOR SUPERIORS
[cc. 708–709]

Conferences and councils of major superiors of religious institutes bear witness to ecclesial communion. While they date back to 1898, Pope Pius XII promoted these structures by convoking the International Congress of the States of Perfection in 1950, enabling religious institutes to offer mutual assistance to one another through common efforts. By the 1950s, six international and over one hundred fifty national conferences existed with at least thirty of the latter composed of both men and women religious. These structures have been helpful in promoting collaboration among the religious institutes and between them and the bishops in the dioceses and episcopal conferences.[27]

Nature/End of Conferences[28]

Canon 708 — Major superiors can be associated usefully in conferences or councils so that by common efforts they work to achieve more fully the purpose of the individual institutes, always without prejudice to their autonomy, character, and proper spirit, or to transact common affairs, or to establish appropriate coordination and cooperation with the conferences of bishops and also with individual bishops.

The norm describes the optional nature of the conferences and councils composed of major superiors[29] of religious institutes.[30] The structures have three basic tasks: (1) to achieve more fully the purpose of individual institutes, (2) to transact common affairs, and (3) to establish coordination and cooperation with the conferences of bishops and individual bishops.[31] Unlike episcopal conferences, conferences and councils of religious do not possess the power of governance.[32] Rather, they enjoy persuasive power to promote consecrated life within the life and mission of the Church.[33] The structures must always respect the patrimony and autonomy of each institute.[34] They address issues of [25] CCEO 431, §2, 1°–2° provides that the religious elevated to the episcopacy lacks active and passive voice in his own monastery, order, or congregation. Having fulfilled his office and returned to his religious institute, he can regain active and passive voice if the typicon (law proper to monasteries) or statutes (law proper to orders and congregations) permit.

[26] AAS 78 (1986) 1324. For discussions of this issue, see D. J. Andres, "De religioso episcopo carente voce activa et passiva in proprio instituto," ComRelMiss 68 (1987) 294–308; J. Beyer's commentary in P 77 (1988) 158–162. Wrenn recognizes the response as seemingly new law and an ultra-restrictive interpretation. See L. Wrenn, Authentic Interpretations on the 1983 Code (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1993) 27–28.

[27] G. Ghirlanda, "Nature and Institutional Ends of the Conferences of Men and Women Religious Superiors," Con Lif 19/2 (1993) 85–106. For an understanding of these structures, see CD 35, 5–6; PC 22–23; AG 33; ES II: 42–43; MR 21, 61–66; PA 21; VC 50, 52; G. Nardin, "De accommodata renovatione statuum perfectionis... motus unionis inter status perfectionis," ComRelMiss 39 (1960) 165–195.

[28] The Eastern code has no canons comparable to cc. 708–709.

[29] Canon 620. See CLD 7, 462–467 for the statutes of the Union of Superiors General (USG), which was formally erected as the Roman Union of Superiors General in 1957; see CLD 6, 448–455, 472–478 for the erection and statutes of the International Union of Superioresses General (UISG).

[30] The World Conference of Secular Institutes (WCSI) was established and its statutes approved on May 23, 1974; see CLD 8, 313–315; 11, 113.

[31] PC 23 also lists as a purpose of such conferences and councils a more equitable distribution of apostolic efforts of religious in missionary territories, which is not included in the canon.

[32] MR 21.

[33] VC 53.

[34] Canon 586, §1.

common concern to all religious institutes and stimulate coordination and cooperation between them and the episcopal conferences as well as with individual bishops in their respective dioceses.

Pope John Paul II recommends that mixed commissions of bishops and major superiors be formed at the national level. He suggests structures whereby delegates from conferences of major superiors be invited to conferences of bishops, and delegates from episcopal conferences be invited to conferences and councils of major superiors.[35] Finally, he encourages seminaries to offer courses in the theology and spirituality of consecrated life, and religious formation programs to provide courses on the theology and structure of the particular church. Such education at the formative stages of vocations would greatly contribute to the effectiveness of mutual relations between bishops and religious.[36]

Erection/Approval of Statutes

Canon 709 — Conferences of major superiors are to have their own statutes approved by the Holy See, by which alone they can be erected even as a juridic person and under whose supreme direction they remain.

The Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life establishes conferences and councils as juridical persons[37] and approves their statutes. Likewise, the same congregation exercises a vigilance over these structures in order that their activities may be directed to achieving their purposes.[38] It is important that the members of conferences and councils maintain contact with the Holy See.[39]

In the United States, the Conference of Major Superiors of Men (CMSM) was erected on September 12, 1957, and the Conference of Major Superiors of Women (CMSW) was erected on December 12, 1959. Subsequently, the Conference of Major Superiors of Women changed its name to Leadership Conference of Women Religious (LCWR).[40] On June 13, 1992, CICLSAL established the Council of Major Superiors of Women Religious (CMSWR) in the United States. This structure parallels but does not supplant the already existing LCWR. Major superiors must meet certain additional criteria for membership in the CMSWR. The council has pledged to cooperate with the NCCB and the two already existing conferences of major superiors in the United States.[41]

[35] VC 50. This issue was addressed in MR 61–65.

[36] VC 50.

[37] Canons 113, §2; 114, §1; 117.

[38] PB 109.

[39] ES II: 42; MR 67; VC 53. This is accomplished by a council formed from the USG and UISG that meets with CICLSAL; major superiors of religious institutes dedicated to missionary activity meet with CEP. Major superiors of national conferences of men and women religious hold annual meetings and send reports of them to CICLSAL.

[40] The secretariats of the two conferences are located at 8808 Cameron St., Silver Spring, Maryland 20910. In cooperation with the National Conference of Vicars for Religious and the CLSA the two conferences publish the Bulletin on Issues of Religious Law. On November 25, 1954, the Canadian Religious Conference (CRC), an association of major superiors of men and women religious of Canada, was established. The address of the CRC is 324 Laurier E., Ottawa, Ontario K1N 6P6. See CLD 11, 104–109 for the establishment of the Conference of Major Superiors of France and the Union of European Conferences of Major Superiors.

[41] For further information on this council, see CICLSAL, "New Council of Major Superiors of Women Religious." Origins 22/9 (July 23, 1992) 157, 159–163.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bibliographical material for canons 705–709 can be found after the commentary on canon 746.

TITLE III
SECULAR INSTITUTES
[cc. 710–730]

The fiftieth anniversary of the February 2, 1947 apostolic constitution Provida Mater Ecclesia[1] occasioned new reflections on the unique identity of secular institutes in ecclesial life today.[2] Addressing an international colloquium celebrating the occasion in Rome, Pope John Paul II recognized in Provida Mater a prophetic inspiration in which Pope Pius XII anticipated certain great themes of Vatican Council II.[3] The document, in recognizing what today would be called a new form of consecrated life, is indeed the magna carta of secular institutes,[4] providing also their particular law prior to the 1983 code. Two complementary documents followed: Pius XII's motu proprio Primo feliciter (March 12, 1948)[5] and the instruction from the Sacred Congregation for Religious, Cum sanctissimus (March 19, 1948).[6]

The eloquent language of Pius XII, calling upon members to be salt which does not lose its savor, light in darkness, and the leaven of Christ permeating every strata of society,[7] paved the way for later synthetic expressions such as consecrated secularity and secular consecration.[8]

As the conciliar theology of the laity and the role of the Church in the contemporary world have evolved, so also has the role of secular institutes as the "experimental laboratory" in which the Church can test concretely her relations with the world.[9] The ever deepening understanding of the vocation of consecrated secularity is reflected anew in the 1996 apostolic exhortation Vita consecrata. Members live their consecration to God in the world as "a leaven of wisdom and a witness of grace within cultural, economic and political life."[10]

The organization of the Latin code provides norms common to all institutes of consecrated life[11] that complement these twenty-one canons explicitly dedicated to secular institutes. In contrast, the Eastern code is structured around religious life as such, with an accent on monasticism. Consequently, its brief treatment of secular institutes[12] requires certain additional repetitions or references to religious law.[13] However, the main

[1] AAS 39 (1947) 114–124; CLD 3, 135–146.

[2] Statistics on secular institutes as of 1996 show a total of 191 recognized institutes. Of these, 187 depend on CICLSAL and four on CEC. Of the former, 61 are of pontifical right and 126 are diocesan. The vast majority of these are institutes of women (156). Ten institutes are of laymen, seventeen are clerical, and four have various branches. "Istituti secolari secondo l'archivio della CIVCSVA," ComRelMiss 78 (1997) 311.

[3] John Paul II, "Bearing Witness to Christ in Secular Life," OssRomEng (February 12, 1997) 5, nn. 1–2.

[4] J. Dorronsoro, "Cinquantesimo della Provida Mater," Informationes 23 (1997) 53. This article contains a brief history of the document. For a brief history of institutes, see also S. Holland in CLSA Com, 521 and E. Williamson in CLSGBI Com, 398–399.

[5] AAS 40 (1948) 283–286; CLD 3, 147–151.

[6] AAS 40 (1948) 293–297; CLD 3, 151–157.

[7] Provida Mater Ecclesia, Intro.

[8] The addresses of Pope Paul VI to secular institutes were characterized by such expressions. See Secular Institutes, Documents (Rome: CMIS, 1998) 77–100.

[9] Paul VI. "A Living Presence in the Service of the World and the Church," in Secular Institutes, Documents, 97. The theme of the 1996 CMIS Congress in Brazil was "How to Be an Experimental Laboratory in the Third Millennium." See Dialogue 24 (1996) 65–140.

[10] VC 10. AAS 88 (1996) 377–486; Origins 25 (April 4, 1996) 681; 683–720.

[11] Canons 573–606. For background on the significance of this structure, see Holland, in CLSA Com, 543.

[12] CCEO 653–659.

[13] For example, CCEO 563, §2 refers to CCEO 505, §2 for the status of institutes as pontifical, patriarchal, and eparchial; CCEO 564 reiterates the obligation of obedience to the Roman Pontiff; CCEO 566 refers back to a series of canons dealing with the erection and suppression of institutes and their dependence on ecclesiastical authority.

reason there are only seven canons is found in canon 569 of the Eastern code. The particular law of each sui iuris church is to make further provisions for such institutes.

Identity

Canon 710 — A secular institute is an institute of consecrated life in which the Christian faithful, living in the world, strive for the perfection of charity and seek to contribute to the sanctification of the world, especially from within.

The canon's point of departure may be said to be canon 573 where the conciliar doctrine on consecrated life is summarized. To that fundamental teaching taken from Lumen gentium VI and Perfectae caritatis is added the peculiar note of secular institutes: consecration lived in the world, contributing to its sanctification from within. This phrase touches the essence of such institutes. Italian Franciscan Agostino Gemelli (1875–1959) in his Pro memoria (1939) setting forth the possibility of such a life, insisted that members, rather than seeking to affect the world from outside, would work, "as it were, within the world."[14]

The phrase was subsequently echoed in Primo feliciter II and in Perfectae caritatis 11, before being adopted here and in canon 713, §2. Likewise Vita consecrata recognizes a "specific blending of presence in the world and consecration," making present in society "the newness and power of Christ's Kingdom."[15] J. Dorronsoro, undersecretary for secular institutes at the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life, calls this blending a real symbiosis, in which consecration and secularity do not weaken each other but rather give meaning to all of the daily activities and the entire life of the members. In this way they are open and available to the will of God who called them in the world and for the world.[16]

State of Members

Canon 711 — The consecration of a member of a secular institute does not change the member's proper canonical condition among the people of God, whether lay or clerical, with due regard for the prescripts of the law which refer to institutes of consecrated life.

Canon 588 states that consecrated life, of its nature, is neither clerical nor lay. Its paragraphs two and three then clarify how institutes are recognized as either clerical or lay. This is a common norm applying to all institutes of consecrated life. From another angle, canon 207 identifies all of the Christian faithful as either clerics or laity. The canon's second paragraph then helps clarify the point that through profession of the evangelical counsels the lives of those called are consecrated to God "in their own special way." Thus, one who professes vows in a religious institute is known as a religious. Those who assume the evangelical counsels through sacred bonds in a secular institute are consecrated precisely in their condition as secular priests or lay persons.[17] Canons regulating religious life do not apply unless explicitly invoked by the code; the norms common to all institutes of consecrated life (cc. 573–606) are noted here as applicable.

The teaching of Vita consecrata develops more clearly the relationship of baptismal consecration, in which every new and special consecration is [14] "Le associazioni di laici consacrati a Dio nel mondo," in Secolarità e Vita Consacrata (Milan: Ancora, 1966) 424.

[15] VC 10. As regards the earlier phrase quoad substantiam vere religiosa, used to identify secular institutes as religious in substance, see T. Rincón Pérez, in Pamplona ComEng, 479. While intended by Gemelli and Pius XII to defend the full consecration of life in secular institutes, the use of the phrase tended to perpetuate confusion regarding the particular identity of the newly recognized institutes. Thus it was not employed in PC 11.

[16] "Con il cuore di Cristo aperto sul mondo," OssRom (February 2, 1997) 7.

[17] Based on c. 207, §2, Rincón Pérez refers to these persons as belonging to the "status consecratorum." Pamplona ComEng, 480.

rooted,[18] and that undertaken through profession of the evangelical counsels. All are called to holiness of life, to chastity according to their state, to obedience to God and the Church, and to a reasonable detachment from temporal possessions. Not all, however, are called to celibate chastity or to a particular form of poverty and obedience according to the charism of an institute.[19] A new consecration has been added to the members' secular state; they have not been removed from it, but in a sense, more deeply rooted in it.

The Eastern code's description of secular institutes also includes this concept, noting that members, whether clerical or lay, remain in their own state, "in respect to all canonical effects" (CCEO 563, §1, 4°).

Both codes have now clearly affirmed the reality of a lay secular consecration which in earlier decades had been placed in doubt.

Evangelical Counsels

Canon 712 — Without prejudice to the prescripts of cann. 598–601, the constitutions are to establish the sacred bonds by which the evangelical counsels are assumed in the institute and are to define the obligations which these same bonds bring about; the proper secularity of the institute, however, is always to be preserved in its way of life.

The constitutions of every institute of consecrated life must describe its particular way of observing the evangelical counsels (c. 598). According to the founding charism's orientation for the spirituality, way of life, and mission of the institute, there will be different accents on the manner of living chastity, poverty, and obedience (cc. 599–601), always within the context of the Church's magisterium and legislation. The constitutions of secular institutes must also define what sacred bonds will be used to assume the aforementioned counsels.

The bonds are called sacred; they effect the consecration of the members of the institute. A vow is a promise made to God which must be fulfilled by reason of the virtue of religion.[20] For the assumption of chastity, the secular institutes were, from the beginning, required to use a vow, an oath, or a consecration binding in conscience.[21]

A further specific point is that the secularity of the institute is not to be lost in defining the obligation of the evangelical counsels. Celibate chastity will be lived in the midst of one's lay colleagues or brother priests. The evangelical poverty of members of secular institutes will most frequently be observed individually. Members earn their living, take appropriate measures for their health care and future retirement, and contribute to the support of their institute according to their means and internal norms. Their accountability is basically to the moderators of the institute. Likewise, secular obedience is oriented to the more individual situation of the member, living and working as the leaven of the gospel. Important decisions or changes in one's life are discerned with moderators. Institutes that have one or more common works will have to provide for involvement in such works in terms of both the obedience of members and the support of such members engaged in these works.

While institutes that use vows do not necessarily receive them "in the name of the Church" as public vows, the regulation of these vows by the code and proper law, and the manner of dispensing from their obligations, argue against calling them purely private vows.[22]

Apostolate

Canon 713 — §1. Members of these institutes express and exercise their own consecration in apostolic activity, and like leaven they strive to imbue all things with the spirit of the gospel for the strengthening and growth of the Body of Christ.

[18] See LG 44 and PC 5.

[19] VC 30.

[20] Canon 1191, §1.

[21] Provida Mater Ecclesia, III-2. The same text provides for the use of a vow or a promise for poverty and obedience, according to the constitutions.

[22] See cc. 726–728 regarding dispensation from sacred bonds; canon 1196 explains dispensation from private vows.

§2. In the world and from the world, lay members participate in the evangelizing function of the Church whether through the witness of a Christian life and of fidelity toward their own consecration, or through the assistance they offer to order temporal things according to God and to inform the world by the power of the gospel. They also cooperate in the service of the ecclesial community according to their own secular way of life.

§3. Through the witness of consecrated life especially in the presbyterate, clerical members help their brothers by a particular apostolic charity, and by their sacred ministry among the people of God they bring about the sanctification of the world.

Although secular institutes are sometimes said to be characterized by three elements, consecration, secularity, and apostolate, it is more in harmony with the image of leaven to understand the integration of consecration and secularity as becoming apostolate.[23] The image of leaven used by Pius XII[24] was repeated in Perfectae caritatis 11 with specific reference to secular institutes. A year earlier, Lumen gentium had used the term "secular" to characterize the laity as a whole, recognizing their special apostolate as one of leaven, sanctifying the world from within and seeking to order temporal affairs according to the spirit of the gospel.[25]

Paragraph one speaks of all members of secular institutes. The sphere of their apostolic activities may be as diverse as the discreet presence of a consecrated secular in parliament and the public priestly ministry of a member of a clerical secular institute. The terminology of the paragraph is largely based on texts addressed to the laity, but it is applicable also to the clerics mentioned in paragraph three.

Paragraph two reiterates the theme of working in and from within the world, whatever may be the specific context of a lay member's life. Those who are fully engaged in a secular profession or field of labor bring to it the witness of their lives. This is their way of participating in the Church's evangelizing mission. Wherever one is, gospel values are to be brought to bear on the situation—be it office, factory, field, commerce, or politics. These truly secular spheres of labor are most specifically seen as being affected by a leavening presence which is consecrated and consecrating.

Members of lay secular institutes more directly engaged in ecclesial service, whether full-time or as volunteers, are to function in that capacity in accord with their secular way of life.[26]

Pope John Paul II, while accenting the particular value of this witness, makes it clear that values such as honesty, competence, and fidelity to duty are not enough. Presuming these, he insists it is a matter of "putting on the mind of Jesus Christ in order to be signs of his love in the world." This, he states, is "the meaning and the goal of authentic Christian secularity, and thus the purpose and value of the Christian consecration lived in secular institutes."[27]

Speaking of the Church's mission of initial evangelization, John Paul II notes how secular institute members, in fields "more suited to their lay vocation," are able to evangelize society in all of its aspects, including the laws and structures which regulate it.[28] Two other fields of mission are specifically recommended to secular institute members: the educational structures of the state[29] and the field of social communications. In this latter area they are asked to assist in the religious [23] Canon 722, §2 calls for a formation in which candidates learn "to transform their whole life into the apostolate."

[24] Provida Mater Ecclesia, Intro., and PF, Intro.

[25] See LG 31.

[26] Appropriate to lay secular institutes, therefore, is the teaching of John Paul II's apostolic exhortation Christifideles laici, December 30, 1988, AAS 81 (1989) 393–521; Origins 18 (1989) 561, 563–595. Likewise of interest is the August 15, 1997 instruction which was jointly promulgated by the heads of eight Roman dicasteries, on "Some Questions Regarding Collaboration of Non-Ordained Faithful in Priests' Sacred Ministry," Origins 27 (1997) 397, 399–409.

[27] John Paul II, "Bearing Witness," n. 6

[28] VC 78.

[29] VC 97.

formation of media personnel to offset the inappropriate use of the media and to improve the quality of programming, especially with respect to moral law and human and Christian values.[30]

Although questions are occasionally raised about the meaning of secular institutes of priests,[31] they existed long before Provida Mater.[32] The recognition of institutes as both clerical and lay came in Provida Mater, art. I and was reiterated in Perfectae caritatis 11.

The canon recognizes clerical members as having two broad spheres for their leavening apostolic presence and activity: in the midst of their brother priests, and among the people of God. Canon 711 makes it clear that the assumption of the evangelical counsels does not change a member's status as a diocesan or secular priest. Canon 266, §3 favors diocesan incardination, as referred to in canon 715. Vita consecrata sees in the clerical secular institutes a source of spiritual riches for the member and for his ministry. He is helped in "living more deeply the spirituality proper to priesthood" and is thereby further enabled "to be a leaven of communion and apostolic generosity" among the clergy.[33]

In this context, it is helpful to return to Presbyterorum ordinis 3 which, discussing the place of priests in the world, presents them as chosen and appointed for the things of God but as remaining with all as brothers. Here, Jesus the Incarnate One, who became like us in all things but sin, is the model. Priests are set apart "in the midst of the people of God, but this is not in order to be separated from that people." Through assumption of the evangelical counsels in a secular institute, a priest is more deeply rooted in this specific priestly vocation.

The priest's ministry is indeed directed more toward the people to be evangelized than toward temporal realities as such. However, in the end, the persons evangelized and sanctified are enabled to guide such realities to God and to animate them with the spirit of the gospel.[34]

Life Style

Canon 714 — Members are to lead their lives in the ordinary conditions of the world according to the norm of the constitutions, whether alone, or in their own families, or in a group living as brothers or sisters.

The possibility of different living situations for members of secular institutes is simply another reflection of their identity as lay persons remaining in their secular context, or as clergy living as do other priests of their diocese. While obviously the members are not prohibited from living together—indeed some community of life among clerics is recommended in canon 280—secular institutes are distinctly different from religious institutes in this matter. Members share the bond of a common vocation as described in canon 602. When living together, their life style will be informed by those values but not regulated by canon 607, §2 on the common life of religious.[35]

[30] VC 99. For further development of this theme of lay secular institute members living their consecration at the heart of the world, see E. Tresalti, "The Past and Future of Secular Institutes," Dialogue 24 (1996) 82–86.

[31] For a discussion of this question, see S. Holland, "Secular Institutes: Can They Be Both Clerical and Lay?" CLSAP 49 (1987) 135–144.

[32] The French Jesuit Pierre de Clorivière founded such a group at the time of the suppression of the Jesuits in France. It continued from 1791 to 1835 and was reorganized in 1918, receiving recognition in 1952 as the secular institute, Society of the Heart of Christ. J. Beyer, Les Instituts Séculiers (Paris: D.D.B., 1954) 35–50.

[33] VC 10. On this point see also V. De Paolis, La vita consacrata nella Chiesa (Bologna: Centro Editoriale Dehoniano, 1991) 415.

[34] C. Rocchetta, "La vita basata sui consigli evangelici è segno della libertà per Dio," OssRom (February 2, 1997) 7.

[35] De Paolis, 413. Beyer, in view of the distinctive secularity of the institutes, sees a preference expressed in the canon's ordering of the options. Most desirable is the first, i.e., living alone; then, living with family members. The third option of group living, although it may be necessary in certain circumstances, is deemed less desirable for lay members. J. Beyer, Le Droit de la Vié Consacrée (Paris: Tardy, 1988) 2:232.

An earlier draft of the canon prohibited wearing any external sign of consecration.[36] However, the matter is better left to the principle of canon 711 which recognizes the secular status of members as clerical or lay. Both this discussion of an external sign, and that of the living situation of members, accentuate the difference between the nature of this state and the public and communal nature of the religious state. The Eastern code explicitly states that secular institute members do not imitate the life style of religious (CCEO 563, §1, 3°).

Provida Mater called for one or more houses according to practical needs; these houses could include residences of major moderators; a location for certain steps of formation, retreats, and gatherings; and a place for members who cannot or should not remain on their own.[37] When the instruction Cum sanctissimus clarified certain criteria for approving secular institutes, it mentioned such houses. This was immediately followed by a stress on the importance of "steering clear of things incompatible with a true Secular Institute life, e.g., clothing and common life of a Religious type."[38]

Clerics

Canon 715 — §1. Clerical members incardinated in a diocese are subject to the diocesan bishop, without prejudice to those things which regard consecrated life in their own institute.

§2. Those who are incardinated in an institute according to the norm of can. 266, §3, however, are subject to the bishop like religious if they are appointed to the proper works of the institute or to the governance of the institute.

The canons generally presume diocesan incardination for clerics in secular institutes. Other aspects of their lives which pertain to their membership in a particular institute are respected by the canon. Matters such as a particular spirituality, a way of observing evangelical poverty, institute meetings, assemblies, and retreats would be regulated by approved proper law and subject to moderators of the institute. As clerics incardinated in the diocese, clerical members of secular institutes are subject to the diocesan bishop in the usual way and enjoy the same essential rights and obligations.[39]

If a clerical secular institute has the faculty to incardinate by concession of the Holy See (c. 266, §3), this renders the relationship of such clerics to the bishop closer to that of religious in certain circumstances. The canon mentions dedication to the proper works or involvement in the governance of the institute. This latter must also be worked out in cases of diocesan incardination, especially if the institute is large and the role time consuming.[40]

The other matter which must be considered here is the fact that the major moderators of clerical secular institutes of pontifical right are not ordinaries (c. 134, §1), nor are they authorized to grant dimissorial letters (c. 1019, §1) for their members. Thus, unless special provision has been made in approving the institute and its proper law, the members' ordination is governed by the law for seculars.[41]

The Eastern code makes essentially the same provision, with the added possibility of patriarchal concession of incardination in a patriarchal institute (CCEO 565).

Spirit of Communion

Canon 716 — §1. All members are to participate actively in the life of the institute according to proper law.

§2. Members of the same institute are to preserve communion among themselves, caring solicitously for a spirit of unity and a genuine relationship as brothers or sisters.

[36] On this point see Beyer, Le Droit, 2:231–232, and Rincón Pérez, in Pamplona ComEng, 481.

[37] Provida Mater Ecclesia, III-4.

[38] Cum sanctissimus 7 c-d.

[39] On the advisability of a cleric informing his bishop of his incorporation in a secular institute, see Beyer, Le Droit, 2:232–233, and Williamson, in CLSGBI Com, 401.

[40] DePaolis warns against excessive emphasis on diocesan incardination as the criterion of an institute's secularity (La vita consacrata, 416).

[41] See c. 1019, §2.

Because secular institute members frequently neither live nor work together, greater efforts may be required to maintain that unity required by their common charism. Responsibility for the institute's spirit, the attraction of vocations, the formation of members, and the building of communion cannot be left to moderators alone. This canon further expresses for secular institutes the principles enunciated in canon 602 of the common norms. Deliberately avoiding explicitly religious language, it calls for union in Christ of those who share the same vocation and charism.

According to their capacity, all members need to be available to assist in forming candidates, to assume roles in government, and to assist in providing internal services. Likewise, all are urged to make permanent formation sessions a priority, and to be responsive to consultations from moderators.

Governance

Canon 717 — §1. The constitutions are to prescribe the proper manner of governance; they are to define the time during which the moderators hold their office and the manner by which they are designated.

§2. No one is to be designated as supreme moderator who is not incorporated definitively.

§3. Those who have been placed in charge of the governance of an institute are to take care that its unity of spirit is preserved and that the active participation of the members is promoted.

In contrast to the governance of religious institutes, the governance of secular institutes appears to be minimally regulated. What is said primarily touches upon moderators and what must be provided for in the constitutions. One may draw from the common norms the recognition of an institute's rightful autonomy of life, especially of governance[42] and of the authority of its superiors and chapters.[43]

[42] Canon 586.

[43] Canon 596.

The constitutions must provide for the way of choosing moderators at each level and the length of their terms (§1). The supreme moderator must be definitively incorporated (§2). The third paragraph of the canon outlines broadly the moderator's role in promoting the unity and participation urged upon all (c. 716).

The subsequent canons directly or indirectly address further governance issues. Moderators will have a role in administering any goods belonging to the institute (c. 718); they will be available to members for spiritual direction and advice (c. 719, §4); major moderators and their councils are competent to admit to probation and to the assumption of bonds (c. 720); moderators must be attentive to the permanent spiritual formation of members (c. 724, §2); moderators and councils will act in cases of separation from the institute (cc. 726–727; 729–730).

The constitutions must complete the description of roles and structures. There may be major moderators at more than one level and councils must exist and be consulted in certain matters. Except for canon 596 from the common norms, there is no mention of chapters or similar representative gatherings. These must be appropriately included in the constitutions.

The canons are also silent on conferences of secular institutes, although their existence was already foreseen in Perfectae caritatis 23. Today, these are seen as important instruments of communion with the Holy See and of coordination and promotion of mutual relations with episcopal conferences.[44] The World Conference of Secular Institutes (CMIS) was formally approved by the Holy See in 1974.[45] The 1997 Annuario Pontificio also lists an international conference for Latin America.[46]

[44] VC 53.

[45] E. Tresalti, "Past and Future," 82.

[46] Page 1689. For a history of the U.S. Conference (USCSI) see B. M. Ottinger, "History of Secular Institutes in the United States," in Secular Institutes in the 1983 Code (Westminster, Md.: Christian Classics, 1988) 13–19.

Administration of Goods

Canon 718 — The administration of the goods of an institute, which must express and foster evangelical poverty, is governed by the norms of Book V, The Temporal Goods of the Church, and by the proper law of the institute. Likewise, proper law is to define the obligations of the institute, especially financial ones, towards members who carry on work for it.

As public juridic persons in the Church, secular institutes must administer any goods pertaining to them in accordance with Book V of the code. The canon requires consonance with evangelical poverty, which is not to be equated with the collective witness expected of religious institutes.[47] Because of the whole manner of life and ministry of secular institutes, they are less likely to own many houses, institutions, or designated funds than religious institutes which require these to support their members.

Practical questions raised by the canon must be addressed in proper law according to the institute's specific nature. If some members are engaged full-time in internal services or works of the institute, provision must be made for matters such as their support, insurance, and retirement.

The Eastern code attributes juridic personality not only to institutes but also to their lawfully erected provinces and houses (CCEO 567). References to religious law require proper law to regulate the use and administration of goods with reference to poverty and to ensure the observance of the Eastern norms parallel to those in Book V of the Latin code (CCEO 1007–1054).

Spiritual Duties

Canon 719 — §1. For members to respond faithfully to their vocation and for their apostolic action to proceed from their union with Christ, they are to devote themselves diligently to prayer, to give themselves in a fitting way to the reading of sacred scripture, to observe an annual period of spiritual retreat, and to perform other spiritual exercises according to proper law.

§2. The celebration of the Eucharist, daily if possible, is to be the source and strength of their whole consecrated life.

§3. They are to approach freely the sacrament of penance which they are to receive frequently.

§4. They are to obtain freely necessary direction of conscience and to seek counsel of this kind even from the moderators, if they wish.

Secular institute members must have a profound spiritual life of sacramental and personal prayer, which will enable them to live their vocation faithfully and which ensures that their apostolic activity proceeds from union with Christ. The great fonts of the spiritual life are outlined, with explicit reference to spiritual direction, a subject not addressed in the parallel canons on religious life.[48] On the other hand, the recitation of the liturgy of the hours, recommended to all consecrated persons in Vita consecrata,[49] is left to proper law.[50] In the case of clerical institutes, these spiritual obligations are clearly mentioned as part of the member's clerical obligations.[51]

Admission

Canon 720 — The right of admission into the institute, either for probation or for the assumption of sacred bonds, whether temporary or perpetual or definitive, belongs to the major moderators with their council, according to the norm of the constitutions.

The canon on admission is supplemented by canon 597, which requires that the prospective member be Catholic, of right intention, and pos-

[47] Canon 640.

[48] Canons 663–664.

[49] VC 95.

[50] Williamson also notes that the canon makes no reference to Marian devotion (CLSBGI Com, 403).

[51] Canon 276, §2, 3°, 5°.

sess the qualities and be free of the impediments mentioned in universal and proper law. Several specific points must be added in each institute's constitutions: which major superior admits new members and what vote of the council is required in the case of probation and at each stage of assuming sacred bonds.

Invalidating Impediments

Canon 721 — §1. A person is admitted to initial probation invalidly:

1° who has not yet attained the age of majority;

2° who is bound currently by a sacred bond in some institute of consecrated life or is incorporated in a society of apostolic life;

3° a spouse, while the marriage continues to exist.

§2. The constitutions can establish other impediments to admission even for validity or can attach conditions.

§3. Moreover, to be received, the person must have the maturity necessary to lead rightly the proper life of the institute.

The code maintains for secular institutes three of the five impediments listed for the religious novitiate.[52] For the validity of admission to initial probation, individuals must have reached their canonical majority, that is, have completed their eighteenth year.[53] They may not be bound by another life commitment: sacred bonds in an institute of consecrated life, incorporation in a society of apostolic life, or marriage bonds (§l). Although the canon does not refer to transfers when listing sacred bonds and incorporation, there is no impediment in those cases (c. 730).

When it is a question of a marriage bond, the impediment ceases with the death of the spouse or the issuance of a decree of nullity. Cases involving civil divorce are considered cautiously when there is a request for a dispensation from the impediment. Besides taking into account the usual requirements for membership, the institute will also consider any hope of marital reconciliation, the status and attitude of the former spouse, and provisions for children. Canonically, a decree of separation issued by the diocesan bishop will also be required (c. 1692, §1).

The elements of the religious law impediment regarding force, grave fear, or fraud (c. 643, 4°) must be interpreted according to canon 125 on the effect of those factors on any juridic act. The life style of consecrated seculars, however, is less likely to make these institutes appear as a place of refuge or security from the world. The religious law impediment of having concealed previous incorporation in another institute of consecrated life or society of apostolic life (c. 643, 5°) could be added in constitutions (§2). Adding impediments which affect validity should be weighed carefully, and such impediments should refer to facts which can be objectively verified.

The third paragraph here is a good example of a very significant criterion which cannot be readily measured and proven. Individuals and moderators must make prudential judgments; then the progressive stages of probation and formation allow for periodic evaluations. If an institute uses experts in evaluating prospective members, it must observe canon 220 on the individual's right to his or her good reputation and to privacy.

The Eastern code applies to secular institutes the list of invalidating impediments pertinent to monastic novitiates, orders, and congregations (CCEO 568, §1).[54]

Initial Probation

Canon 722 — §1. Initial probation is to be ordered in a way that the candidates understand more fittingly their own divine vocation, and indeed, the one proper to the institute, and that they are trained in the spirit and way of life of the institute.

[52] See c. 643, §1.

[53] See c. 97, §1.

[54] See CCEO 450.

§2. Candidates are properly to be formed to lead a life according to the evangelical counsels and are to be taught to transform their whole life into the apostolate, employing those forms of evangelization which better respond to the purpose, spirit, and character of the institute.

§3. The constitutions are to define the manner and length of this probation before first taking on sacred bonds in the institute; the length is not to be less than two years.

The canon provides broad areas of content for initial probation, calling attention again to the specific nature of the vocation to secular consecration. The constitutions must provide most of the specifics, but, in every institute, the length of this period before sacred bonds must be no less than two years. The fact that secular institutes do not necessarily have a full-time residential formation program like a religious novitiate explains the longer required minimum probationary period.

The code basically outlines the key concerns of the probationary period: an understanding of a vocation to consecrated life and formation in the particular spirit and way of life of the institute; formation in living the evangelical counsels with the distinctive secularity of the institute; formation for a life fully translated into apostolate which, like leaven, strives to imbue all things with the spirit of the gospel; formation as laity to share in the Church's evangelizing tasks, using the means which most clearly respond to the purpose, spirit, and character of the institute; formation for ordering and informing the temporal order according to the values of the gospel; formation as ecclesial men and women, thinking with the Church; formation in a life of prayer, both personal and liturgical, enabling the institute's members to fulfill fruitfully those obligations mentioned in canon 719.

A 1980 document on formation in secular institutes resulted from a study carried out by the Sacred Congregation for Religious and Secular Institutes.[55] The document recognized the specific problems of formation in institutes: the synthesis of faith, consecration, and secular life; finding appropriate times and places for professionally employed persons to engage in formation activities, whether as candidates or formators; an ecclesial milieu in which the vocation is often misunderstood.[56] The document indicates various particular aspects of formation: the spiritual, doctrinal-biblical, and theological; the psychological, moral, and ascetical; formation for the secular apostolate; and professional formation.[57]

The second paragraph of the canon reiterates the fact that one's whole life is transformed into apostolate. In harmony with this, the formation text insists that work, professional activity, and every type of presence in society must become both a means of personal sanctification and a way of inserting Christian values, above all charity, into a world to be sanctified from within.

While not explicitly stated, it is understood that clerical institutes must observe the universal norms of law in preparation for the reception of orders.

Incorporation

Canon 723 — §1. When the period of initial probation has elapsed, a candidate who is judged suitable is to assume the three evangelical counsels strengthened by a sacred bond or is to depart from the institute.

§2. This first incorporation is to be temporary according to the norm of the constitutions; it is not to be less than five years.

§3. When the period of this incorporation has elapsed, the member who is judged suitable is to be admitted to perpetual incorporation or to definitive incorporation, that is, with temporary bonds that are always to be renewed.

§4. Definitive incorporation is equivalent to perpetual incorporation with regard to the specific juridic effects established in the constitutions.

[55] SCRIS, "Formation in Secular Institutes," in Secular Institutes, Documents, 113–126.

[56] Ibid. II-B, 115.

[57] Ibid. III-D, 118–121.

The constitutions of each institute will state who is competent to judge suitability to assume the evangelical counsels initially, perpetually, or definitively (c. 720). They will also specify what sacred bonds are used (c. 712). With the first assumption of the evangelical counsels, strengthened by sacred bonds, the individual leaves the probationary stage and becomes incorporated in the institute for a specific time. The first period of incorporation must last a minimum of five years, whether the bonds are taken immediately for the full time or with renewals during the five years. No maximum time in temporary bonds is specified, but the constitutions should distinguish temporary from definitive incorporation.

An institute's proper law must also clarify its practice of perpetual and/or definitive incorporation. The canon gives a basic explanation of definitive incorporation: the bonds are made for a specific period of time—as distinct from making them for life—but they are always to be renewed. That is, there is no longer the sense of the initial, temporary incorporation at the end of which it is clear that the individual and the moderators must again discern its continuation. According to paragraph four, the juridic effects of definitive and perpetual incorporation will be equivalent for those matters established in the constitutions. As noted, the code establishes definitive incorporation as a requirement for a supreme moderator (c. 717, §2).[58]

Ongoing Formation

Canon 724 — §1. Formation after the first assumption of sacred bonds is to be continued without interruption according to the constitutions.

§2. Members are to be formed in divine and human things at the same time; moreover, moderators of the institute are to have a serious concern for the continued spiritual formation of the members.

It is commonly understood today that formation in consecrated life must continue for the whole of one's life. This was already explicitly stated for secular institutes in Perfectae caritatis 11, which called for this integration of the human and divine.

Addressing the 1996 World Congress in Brazil, E. Tresalti urged the necessity of support and training for living out the "secularity-consecration synthesis." This training must enable members to "stand on their own two feet as Christians in a world which refuses the values of the Gospel."[59]

Likewise, Vita consecrata accentuates the fact that formation, integrating every aspect of the consecrated person's life, never ends precisely because it aims at transformation of the whole person in identification with Christ.[60]

Associates

Canon 725 — An institute can associate to itself by some bond determined in the constitutions other members of the Christian faithful who are to strive for evangelical perfection according to the spirit of the institute and are to participate in its mission.

In distinguishing which existing associations could be canonically established as secular institutes, Provida Mater specified that members "in the strict sense" assume the three evangelical counsels.[61] More specifically, Cum sanctissimus added that there could be "members attached and incorporated in various degrees who aspire to the perfect life of the gospel, and try to live it in their own situation but do not, or cannot, rise to a commitment to all three counsels at a higher level."[62] A 1976 study on married people and secular institutes concluded that they "necessarily belong to S.I. as members in the wider sense."[63]

[58] Rincón Pérez refers to definitive incorporation as "potentially perpetual" (Pamplona ComEng, 485).

[59] Tresalti, "Past and Future," 85.

[60] VC 65. Numbers 69–71 explicitly discuss continuing formation.

[61] Provida Mater Ecclesia, III, §2.

[62] Cum sanctissimus 7 a.

[63] SCRIS, "Married People and the Secular Institutes," in Secular Institutes, Documents, 111. See also De Paolis

Vita consecrata further clarifies the distinction between baptismal consecration, with its evangelical demands on all, and that further consecration which is rooted in baptism but is not a necessary consequence of it. In particular, the call to and gift of celibacy are characteristic of the consecrated life.[64]

Discussing this point at the 1996 World Congress, Martine Carrez-Maratray noted that many institutes are experimenting with associates, especially couples. In doing so, they seek communion through a shared spirit in mission, without confusion of their respective states of life.[65] Besides referring to an association formalized in accordance with constitutions as provided for in the canon, Vita consecrata, in discussing cooperation with the laity also notes that secular institute members "relate to other members of the faithful at the level of everyday life."[66]

Departure of the Temporarily Incorporated

Canon 726 — §1. When the period of temporary incorporation has elapsed, a member is able to leave the institute freely or the major moderator, after having heard the council, can exclude a member for a just cause from the renewal of the sacred bonds.

§2. For a grave cause, a temporarily incorporated member who freely petitions it is able to obtain an indult of departure from the supreme moderator with the consent of the council.

Either the individual or the major moderator may take the initiative to terminate the relationship when the period of temporary incorporation has concluded. One is free to depart when the sacred bonds expire, or a major moderator may exclude the individual from renewal for a just cause. The present canon does not specify any such causes, unlike canon 689 on religious institutes, nor are such causes generally applicable, since they presuppose the more corporate life-style and mission of religious. Rather, a failure or inability to live the life of the evangelical counsels in a secular context, to fulfill the obligations of the spiritual and apostolic life, or to participate in the life of the institute according to proper law would constitute just causes of exclusion from renewal.

A grave cause is necessary to request an indult of departure during temporary incorporation. The competent authority is the supreme moderator with the consent of the council, without distinction between pontifical and diocesan institutes. The effects of the indult are given in canon 728.

Departure of the Perpetually Incorporated

Canon 727 — §1. After having considered the matter seriously before the Lord, a perpetually incorporated member who wishes to leave the institute is to seek an indult of departure from the Apostolic See through the supreme moderator if the institute is of pontifical right; otherwise the member may also seek it from the diocesan bishop, as it is defined in the constitutions.

§2. If it concerns a cleric incardinated in the institute, the prescript of can. 693 is to be observed.

A request for an indult of departure by a perpetually incorporated member is transmitted to ecclesiastical authority: the Apostolic See or the diocesan bishop.[67] Further particulars are to be found in the constitutions. The request is pro-who states that the faithful associated with an institute, sharing in some way in its spirituality and apostolate, are not, by that fact, incorporated in it (La vita consacrata, 423).

[64] VC 30.

[65] M. Carrez-Maratray, "Speech," Dialogue 24 (1996) 77.

[66] VC 54.

[67] Beyer notes that the term etiam in the Latin text is of considerable importance. Because of the practice of discretion in some institutes, that is, of not making one's membership commonly known, those of diocesan right may prefer to petition the indult through the Apostolic See (Le Droit, 2:268). On this point De Paolis concludes that the bishop does not enjoy the competency to grant the indult unless this competency is provided for in the constitutions (La vita consacrata, 424).

cessed through the supreme moderator. The canon is silent regarding the council; thus, unless the constitutions state otherwise, the council is not involved.

A question may be raised as to the procedure to be followed in the case of those who are definitively incorporated, "with temporary bonds that are always to be renewed" (c. 723, §3). Unless it is so stated in the constitutions (cf. c. 723, §4), these bonds should not simply be equated with perpetual incorporation, requiring recourse to ecclesiastical authority.[68] J. Beyer believes that allowing the supreme moderator to permit these departures favors respect of the freedom of the individual, secularity, and discretion.[69] Clearly, an institute which uses this option must make appropriate provisions in its proper law.

The above applies equally to clerics with diocesan incardination. However, if the cleric has been incardinated in the institute, canon 693 from religious law must be observed.

Juridic Effect of an Indult of Departure

Canon 728 — When an indult of departure has been granted legitimately, all the bonds as well as the rights and obligations deriving from incorporation cease.

The canon is a simple, straightforward statement. With a legitimately granted indult of departure, the bonds and all that arose from the resulting incorporation cease, whether on the part of the individual or of the institute. By contrast, all that arises from baptismal consecration and priestly ordination remains unchanged.

Dismissal

Canon 729 — A member is dismissed from an institute according to the norm of cann. 694 and 695; moreover, the constitutions are to determine other causes for dismissal provided that they are proportionately grave, external, imputable, and juridically proven, and the method of proceeding established in cann. 697–700 is to be observed. The prescript of can. 701 applies to one dismissed.

By way of exception, this canon borrows large portions of religious law. The norms for ipso facto dismissal (c. 694) and for obligatory dismissal (c. 695) are simply incorporated. In the case of facultative dismissal, the pertinent canonical principles are repeated, but the list of causes is omitted (see c. 696, §1). In their own constitutions, institutes may list causes for dismissal which are appropriate to the secular nature of these institutes. Since the canon refers explicitly to constitutions and not to proper law in general, these causes will have been approved by ecclesiastical authority.

The procedure for dismissal is according to canons 697–700, with the inclusion of canon 701 on the effects of the pertinent decree.

The Eastern code leaves the decree of dismissal of a perpetually incorporated member to the institute's statutes, but requires its approval by the eparchial bishop or a higher ecclesiastical authority before it is executed.[70] This quite general treatment of such a sensitive matter must be understood in light of the reservation of more detailed norms for secular institutes to the particular law of each sui iuris church (CCEO 569).

Transfer

Canon 730 — In order for a member of a secular institute to transfer to another secular institute, the prescripts of cann. 684, §§1, 2, 4, and 685 are to be observed; moreover, for transfer to be made to a religious institute or to a society of apostolic life or from them to a secular institute, the permission of the Apostolic See is required, whose mandates must be observed.

In the case of transfers, religious law is again borrowed, although the section on monasteries is omitted (c. 684, §3) and the provisions for transfer between different types of institutes and societies are adapted (c. 684, §5). Thus the competency for allowing transfers between secular institutes remains with the internal authority, while those involving religious or members of societies of apostolic life require the permission of the Apostolic See. This latter provision is true regardless of whether the institutes involved are pontifical or diocesan. The diverse bonds employed and the diverse forms of incorporation provided for in religious institutes, secular institutes, and societies of apostolic life may occasion certain provisions or "mandates" from the Apostolic See when granting the permission for transfer, in order to supply details not contained in universal law.

[68] See also Williamson, in CLSGBI Com, 406.
[69] Beyer, Le Droit, 2:267–268.
[70] CCEO 568, §2.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bibliographical material for canons 710–730 can be found after the commentary on canon 746.

SECTION II
SOCIETIES OF APOSTOLIC LIFE
[cc. 731–746]

A glance at history helps explain the charismatic and juridic identity of societies of apostolic life and why the code dedicates a distinct section to them. Two broad periods are identifiable: the first includes the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries and the second takes in the nineteenth century and the beginning of the twentieth.[1]

Many of the best known societies from the first period were founded in France where widespread poverty and misery were compounded by the attitude of a society little disposed to assist its poor. These were the circumstances that gave rise to the Oratory of Jesus and Mary Immaculate under the guidance of Pierre de Bérulle in 1611, the Company of Priests of S. Sulpice founded by Jean-Jacques Olier in 1642, and the Congregation of Jesus and Mary (Eudists), founded by St. John Eudes in 1643.

These three founders were fathers of a school of French spirituality which contributed greatly to the formation of society in France in those difficult times. Even today, both the Sulpicians and the Eudists continue to be engaged in seminary formation, a work of critical importance following the Council of Trent.

Two other great societies of the first period are the Congregation of the Mission founded by St. Vincent de Paul in 1625 and the Daughters of Charity founded by St. Vincent and St. Louise de Marillac in 1633. St. Vincent de Paul sought to revitalize the faith through popular missions, reinforcing the work of the parishes. What was new in his society was the accent on mission. His priests would be secular priests, living in community and working for the salvation of rural people. This mission, not consecration of life through profession of the evangelical counsels, would be their principal identity.

The founders also sought a greater flexibility of life for the Daughters of Charity than would have been possible in the religious life of that time. The words of St. Vincent are well known: the Daughters would have as their monastery the houses of the poor; as their cell, a rented room; as their chapel, the parish church; and as their cloister, the streets of the city.

While the societies of the first period focused their attention primarily on the local population, those of the second period took impetus from the movement of world exploration. With the fleets of the world powers went the first evangelizers: religious priests, especially Dominicans, Franciscans, and Jesuits. These orders produced great missionaries, but for many it was difficult to reconcile the demands of religious observance with those of missionary life.

In 1622 Pope Gregory XV founded the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith to separate church authority from colonial governments and to provide a centralized authority for the missions in the newly discovered territories. The first society of a new type followed in 1660 with the creation of the Paris Foreign Mission Society. This was a society of secular priests exclusively dedicated to the missions. It served as a model for groups which developed later, largely in the nineteenth century.

In this second period there were diverse foundations but, most frequently, new societies were founded for the missions abroad. These included: the Society of African Missions (1856), the Missionary Society of St. Joseph of Mill Hill (1866), the Missionaries of Africa ("White Fathers," 1868), the Maryknoll Foreign Mission Society (1911), and

[1] The 1998 Annuario Pontificio lists thirty pontifical societies of men and nine of women. Of the former, fifteen relate to CEP and one to CEC. The others and all of the women's societies relate to CICLSAL (1494–1503 and 1704–1705).

the Missionary Society of St. Columban (1917). Also founded during this period, but with a scope broader than the foreign missions, was the Society of the Catholic Apostolate (Pallottines, 1835).[2]

Prior to the 1917 code, these clerical societies were often referred to as secular congregations. In that code they appeared in Book II, De personis (On Persons), part two, De religiosis (On Religious), under the specific title XVII, De societatibus sive virorum sive mulierum in communi viventium sine votis (On Societies of Men or Women Leading a Common Life without Vows). Many canons were borrowed from religious law, but the members clearly were not bound by religious vows. Nevertheless, they were said to live in a way that "imitated" religious life (CIC 673, §1).

During the code revision process, the 1977 draft of canons on consecrated life treated societies together with religious institutes and secular institutes as a third category of institutes of consecrated life, entitled De institutis vitae apostolicae consociatae (On Institutes of Associated Apostolic Life). This positioning and identity were sharply debated during the 1980 code commission meetings because of the great diversity among societies and the diversity of views regarding the meaning of consecrated life and the means of undertaking it.[3]

[2] For additional historical background on such societies, see C. Duster, The Canonical Status of Members of Missionary Societies of Apostolic Life of Pontifical Right (Rome: Columban Fathers, 1994).

[3] Comm 13 (1981) 377–387.

Following the publication of the 1983 code, an interesting exchange of correspondence between representatives of missionary societies, the Pontifical Commission for the Interpretation of the Code, and the Sacred Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples resulted in the determination that those missionary societies recognized under title XVII of the 1917 code now fell under the 1983 code's canons on societies of apostolic life. The option of being considered clerical associations according to the canons on associations of the faithful (cc. 298–329) was not seen as appropriate, since those canons envision neither incardination in a clerical association nor the exercise of the power of governance (potestas regiminis), both of which are very important for these missionary societies.[4]

The difficulty of giving the societies a single juridic identity is reflected also in the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches. There, within title XII, "Monks and Other Religious as well as Members of Other Institutes of Consecrated Life" (CCEO 410–572), two separate sections speak of societies: chapter 2, "Societies of Common Life according to the Manner of Religious" (CCEO 554–562), and chapter 4, "Other Forms of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life" (CCEO 570–572). Within the latter, only Eastern code canon 572 is dedicated to societies.

[4] J. Beyer. Le Droit de la Vie Consacrée (Paris: Tardy, 1988) 1: 196–198.

Identity

Canon 731 — §1. Societies of apostolic life resemble institutes of consecrated life; their members, without religious vows, pursue the apostolic purpose proper to the society and, leading a life in common as brothers or sisters according to their proper manner of life, strive for the perfection of charity through the observance of the constitutions.

§2. Among these are societies in which members assume the evangelical counsels by some bond defined in the constitutions.

This canon presents the key identifying characteristic of societies: the pursuit of their proper apostolic purpose. In common with all Christians, members seek the perfection of charity; as members of their particular society, they do so through observance of their constitutions.

The juridic identity of societies is presented by way of comparison. The former phrase regarding "imitation" of religious life has been replaced by the statement that societies "resemble" institutes of consecrated life. The canon further clarifies the fact that societies do not have religious vows. Not surprisingly, the proper translation and interpretation of accedunt is still controverted.[5] Historically, the primary point of comparison with religious seems to have been with reference to common life. Nevertheless, the distinctive way of living common life in societies must be spelled out in proper law.

In the end, it is most helpful to glean the positive elements of the identity of such societies from universal law, remembering that their constitutions will provide further detail.

As a rule, where religious law has not been invoked, it should not be considered applicable to societies. The post-synodal apostolic exhortation, Vita consecrata, recognizes that each society pursues its particular apostolic or missionary end and that the "specific identity of this form of life is to be preserved and promoted."[6] Indeed the specific nature of societies of apostolic life demonstrates that the apostolate, rightly understood as a mission received from the Lord Jesus, may in itself constitute a way to holiness, to the perfection of charity.[7]

It is common to all societies to be active in the apostolate, living a common life and pursuing charity through observance of their constitutions. According to the second paragraph of the canon, some societies assume the evangelical counsels. The bond by which they do so, according to their constitutions, may be a vow (though not a religious vow), a promise, an oath, or a written contract. It is essential that, in addition to identifying the kind of bond by which the counsels are assumed, the constitutions state the more specific manner of observing them.

On the one hand, this second paragraph of the canon recognizes the real diversity among societies. On the other, it continues to fuel the debate over whether such societies really belong in the category of institutes of consecrated life.[8] Some consider it an anomaly to have members assume the evangelical counsels in a society which is not considered to be an institute of consecrated life.[9]

The Eastern code canon 572 is essentially the same as canon 731, §1, with the added provision that these societies are regulated by the particular law of their own church sui iuris or that issued by [5] J. Bonfils, "De societatibus vitae apostolicae," in Com Ex, 1882–1883. See also T. Rincón Pérez, in Pamplona ComEng, 488–489. While clearly noting that societies are not institutes of consecrated life, the latter author returns to the earlier language, stating that many of the norms regulating societies are in "imitation" (ad instar) of religious or consecrated life.

[6] AAS 88 (1996) 377–486, n. 11; Origins 25 (1996) 681, 683–719.

[7] Bonfils, "De societatibus," 1918.

[8] Strongly opposed to such a categorization is Bonfils, "De societatibus," 1918; in favor of such recognition for at least some societies is J. Beyer, "De novo iure circa vitae consecratae instituta et eorum sodales quaesita et dubia solvenda," P 73 (1984) 413–417.

[9] See E. Williamson, in CLSGBI Com, 408.

the Apostolic See. In contrast, Eastern code canon 554, §1 speaks of societies of common life in the manner of religious (ad instar religiosorum) in which the members assume the evangelical counsels. Unlike canon 731, §2, it provides for this assumption of the counsels by sacred bonds.

Applicable Canons from Religious Law

Canon 732 — Those things which are established in cann. 578–597 and 606 apply to societies of apostolic life, without prejudice, however, to the nature of each society; moreover, cann. 598–602 apply to the societies mentioned in can. 731, §2.

Canon 732 necessarily has two parts to accommodate the diversity provided for in the preceding canon. The canons applicable to societies of apostolic life are borrowed from the norms common to all institutes of consecrated life,[10] excluding the initial canons which more specifically deal with consecration through profession of the evangelical counsels.[11] However, the use of the canons invoked is conditioned by the phrase "without prejudice . . . to the nature of each society."

The first such reference, canon 578, speaks of fidelity to the intent of the founder or foundress. This is followed by general norms which regulate: erection, aggregation, divisions, mergers, changes subject to the Holy See, suppression, autonomy, proper law, types of institutes (clerical or lay; diocesan or pontifical), exemption, communication with the Holy See, chapters, and general norms for admission.[12] Canon 606 affirms the equal applicability of the law to societies of men and of women.

In addition to the above, another set of canons is invoked to provide further for those societies mentioned in canon 731, §2. These canons broadly regulate the evangelical counsels[13] and communitarian life (vita fraterna) for both religious and secular institutes. Canon 602 speaks of that spiritual communion which binds members of the same institute or society; it is not, however, the common life of religious or of societies. Thus, it is not clear why this canon is applied only to those societies referred to in canon 731, §2.

Eastern code canon 554, §2 similarly applies a number of canons from religious law to the societies treated in chapter 2. Further, canon 554, §3 equates the members of such societies with religious in what pertains to canonical effects unless the law provides otherwise or it is apparent from the nature of the matter.

Houses and Communities

Canon 733 — §1. The competent authority of the society erects a house and establishes a local community with the previous written consent of the diocesan bishop, who must also be consulted concerning its suppression.

§2. Consent to erect a house entails the right to have at least an oratory in which the Most Holy Eucharist is to be celebrated and reserved.

The constitutions of each society must establish which internal authority—normally a major superior with advice or consent of the council—is competent to erect a house or establish a local community. In either case, the role of the diocesan bishop is constant; his prior written consent is necessary for the erection or establishment of a house, and he is to be consulted prior to its suppression. Given his essential role in the coordination of apostolates in the particular church,[14] these contacts with the diocesan bishop must be carried out in a timely fashion, especially when the withdrawal of members is involved. Thus, the canon needs to be read in conjunction with canon 738, §2 regarding apostolic activities and canon 740 on the common life of members.

The canons do not explicitly present the differences between an erected house and an established community. However, one example is present in paragraph two of the canon, which attaches

[10] Canons 573–606.
[11] Canons 573–577.
[12] Canons 579–597.
[13] Canons 598–601.

[14] Cf. c. 394.

to the consent to erect a house the right to have at least an oratory. This paragraph was added out of deference to women's societies.[15]

It is noteworthy that here the canons on religious houses have not been invoked[16] and the concepts of house and community are separable in a way religious law does not permit.

As regards erecting and suppressing societies, their provinces, and their houses, Eastern code canon 556 invokes the canons provided for religious congregations.

Governance

Canon 734 — The constitutions determine the governance of a society, with cann. 617–633 observed according to the nature of each society.

In the matter of the governance of societies, there is once again a broad recourse to the canons regulating religious institutes. However, it is important to note the recurring phrase "according to the nature of each society."[17] Particulars for the application of the canons must be sought in the approved constitutions.

The canons involved make up two of three articles on religious governance. The third article on the administration of temporal goods is mentioned in canon 741. Canons 617–630 deal with superiors at all levels and their councils, while canons 631–633 discuss chapters and other organs of participation and consultation. Canon 596 on the power of superiors and chapters was already applied to all societies by canon 732. In applying those canons which deal more explicitly with the relationship of authority and obedience in the life of members[18] it must be remembered that not all societies formally assume the evangelical counsels. A society member's relationship to its moderators is broadly stated in canon 738, §1.

While recognizing that the statutes of each society must determine its government, Eastern code canon 557 lists as applicable a number of canons from the law regulating congregations (CCEO 422; 511–515).

Becoming a Member

Canon 735 — §1. The proper law of each society determines the admission, probation, incorporation, and formation of members.

§2. In what pertains to admission into a society, the conditions established in cann. 642–645 are to be observed.

§3. Proper law must determine the manner of probation and formation, especially doctrinal, spiritual, and apostolic, adapted to the purpose and character of the society, in such a way that the members, recognizing their divine vocation, are suitably prepared for the mission and life of the society.

The canon highlights the primacy of proper law in determining the way in which each society must adequately provide for the admission, probation, incorporation, and formation of the members. Only canons 642–645 are borrowed from religious law. These provide for the criteria, requirements, impediments, and necessary documents for admission. Omitted is canon 641, which states that major superiors have the right to admit to the religious novitiate. Canon 732 invokes canon 597 from the general norms on requirements for admission and the necessity of suitable preparation.

The final paragraph of the canon provides a sort of checklist for the elaboration of proper law. The goal of formation is helping members recognize their vocation and providing for well integrated doctrinal, spiritual, and apostolic training which will prepare the candidate to fulfill the mis-

[15] Comm 13 (1981) 391.

[16] Canons 608–616.

[17] By way of example, Bonfils points out the unique structure of the Oratory of St. Philip Neri, which does not have a superior general but rather a general congress and a delegate of the Apostolic See. He also notes that the Daughters of Charity elect a superior general in their own chapter, but are also subject to the superior general of the Congregation of the Mission who names a director general for them ("De societatibus," 1894).

[18] See, for example, cc. 618–619 and 622.

sion and live the life of the particular society. Thus, missionary societies may require aspects of formation not required for members of societies working in their own country and culture. Canon 736, §2 further specifies the formation required in clerical societies. Since universal law provides extensively for priestly formation, particular attention may have to be given to formative programs in societies of women or of laymen.

Because of the vast diversity among societies, proper law must state clearly the modality and meaning of incorporation. Canon 737 views incorporation as the basis for rights and obligations in the society. The fact that the assumption of the evangelical counsels is not normative for all societies helps clarify the fact that such an act is not necessarily the means of incorporation. Some societies use an oath and others a promise to effect incorporation, even if other bonds are used for the assumption of the evangelical counsels. Proper law must indicate whether there is temporary incorporation prior to that which is definitive. The specific terms used must also be clear, since some societies speak of "aggregation" rather than "incorporation" in the case of clerics who are incardinated in a diocese rather than in the society.[19]

Eastern code canon 559, §1 obliges societies to observe the norms regarding invalidating impediments to the novitiate in religious institutes (CCEO 450), and the norm indicating when the Apostolic See needs to grant permission to admit a candidate from another church sui iuris (CCEO 451).

Incardination

Canon 736 — §1. In clerical societies, clerics are incardinated in the society itself unless the constitutions establish otherwise.

§2. In those things which belong to the program of studies and to the reception of orders, the norms for secular clerics are to be observed, without prejudice to §1.

The actual legislation making incardination in the society normative results from considerable historical evolution. The early "secular congregations" were made up of diocesan priests, incardinated in their dioceses, who came together for a particular mission either in foreign territories or in their own particular church. Before the 1917 code, the Sacred Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith permitted the use of the title of mission (titulus missionis) for ordination. That code did not speak directly of incardination in the society,[20] but the dicastery customarily granted indults of excardination from the diocese for incardination in a society.[21]

Without prejudice to the right of incardination, paragraph two states that the norms for studies and reception of orders in societies are those for secular clerics. It should be noted, however, that canon 1019, §1 recognizes the competency of major moderators of pontifical clerical societies of apostolic life to grant dimissorial letters on behalf of their members. Those moderators are identified as ordinaries in canon 134, §1.[22]

Eastern code canon 560 provides for incardination in societies, without reference to an option of diocesan incardination. It is the major superior who may present dimissorial letters, according to the statutes of the society. No distinction is made between pontifical, patriarchal, and diocesan societies.

Obligations and Rights

Canon 737 — Incorporation entails on the part of the members the obligations and rights de-

[19] Bonfils, "De societatibus," 1897–1899. Here the author also points out the need to distinguish associates and affiliates who may be attached in some way to a society without full incorporation.

[20] CIC 678.

[21] Duster, 154–157.

[22] On the question of incardination in societies of diocesan right, see Williamson, in CLSBGI Com, 410, n. 1. While this incardination is provided for in c. 266, §2, major superiors of diocesan societies are still not ordinaries according to c. 134, §1.

fined in the constitutions and on the part of the society concern for leading the members to the purpose of their proper vocation according to the constitutions.

Incorporation involves a mutuality of obligations and rights between members and the society. These must be clearly defined in the constitutions. Canon 732's inclusion of canon 587 provides a broad outline of the content to be included in various parts of proper law. The diversity among societies, however, entails considerable latitude in that law, especially with reference to the evangelical counsels. Subsequently, canons 738–740 further specify the content of the rights and obligations.

This canon does not distinguish between those temporarily and those definitively incorporated. However, any implications of this difference for obligations and rights should be clarified where necessary in proper law.

Eastern code canon 561 refers to rights and obligations as determined in statutes, with an accent on clerical obligations where applicable.

Relationship to Authority

Canon 738 — §1. All members are subject to their proper moderators according to the norm of the constitutions in those matters which regard the internal life and discipline of the society.

§2. They are also subject to the diocesan bishop in those matters which regard public worship, the care of souls, and other works of the apostolate, with attention to cann. 679–683.

§3. The constitutions or particular agreements define the relations of a member incardinated in a diocese with his own bishop.

The canon sets forth in broad strokes the relationship of members to the authority of their moderators and to that of the diocesan bishop. In light of the just autonomy of a society (c. 586, §1), its moderators govern its internal life according to its spiritual patrimony, its manner of living common life, the observance of the evangelical counsels in societies mentioned in canon 731, §2, and the workings and decisions of various governance structures.

The provisions of paragraph two flow from the very nature of the episcopal office in the diocese.[23] The exercise of public worship, the care of souls, and other works of the apostolate are necessarily subject to the diocesan bishop's authority. Other canons from religious law are introduced with the expression, "with attention to cann. 679–683."

The Eastern code similarly expresses the diocesan bishop's authority. The equivalent norm (CCEO 415, §1) is applied to societies in Eastern canon 554, §2. The role of moderators is treated broadly in Eastern canon 557 on governance, without specific reference to the apostolate.

The subject of incardination in the diocese implicitly alluded to in canon 736, §1 is the subject of particular attention here in paragraph three. Particular agreements must be entered into between bishops and societies if this issue is not already regulated by the constitutions. If a society member is incardinated in his diocese of origin, but goes to work in another diocese, the need for clarity is all the more evident.[24]

Obligations of Clerics

Canon 739 — In addition to the obligations to which members as members are subject according to the constitutions, they are bound by the common obligations of clerics unless it is otherwise evident from the nature of the thing or the context.

Continuing the discussion of the obligations and rights of members of societies, this canon

[23] For example, see cc. 392 and 394.

[24] Models of various types of agreements between societies and bishops regarding the incardination, mission, and support of clerical members are given in J. Bonfils, Les Sociétés de Vie Apostolique (Paris: Cerf, 1990) 177–182. Duster, 248–254, discusses the advantages and disadvantages of the option of diocesan incardination according to the experience of missionary societies.

states that the common obligations of clerics are normally binding (cc. 273–289). The present canon, however, does not indicate specific canons or distinguish between lay and clerical societies as does canon 672 on religious institutes. Rather, the key to the application of the various common obligations of clerics is found in the final clause, "unless it is otherwise evident from the nature of the thing or the context." According to these principles, certain obligations obviously do not bind societies of women or the lay members of clerical societies. Further, certain rights and obligations which flow directly from incardination in a diocese will be appropriately adjusted and expressed in proper law for members incardinated in the society.

Eastern code canon 561 is equivalent to canon 739. The parallel listing of obligations and rights of clerics is found in the Eastern canons 367–393. For societies with sacred bonds, the Eastern code adds a separate canon on obedience to the Roman Pontiff, in virtue of the bond of obedience (CCEO 555).

Common Life

Canon 740 — Members must live in a house or in a legitimately established community and must observe common life according to the norm of proper law, which also governs absences from the house or community.

This canon obliges society members to live in a house or community (cf. c. 733) and observe common life according to proper law. However, society members are not bound to the same kind of common life as religious, and canon 665 on absences is not applicable. Hence, proper law must provide norms for absences. This provision is dictated by the historical development of these societies and their thoroughly apostolic orientation. While community life is an obligation, it is always in service of the mission.

A 1994 document on community life specifically addresses religious institutes; however, as number 1 of the text notes, it also applies "to communities in societies of apostolic life, bearing in mind their specific character and proper legislation."[25] On this point, Pinto attributes to the legislator a tendency to create in these communities stable centers for the apostolate rather than residences (sedes) of religious life.[26] Thus, the accent remains on going out in mission more than on the corporate witness expected of a local religious community.

The diversity of societies may dictate varying practices regarding common life and absences from a house or community. For example, societies dedicated to priestly formation may have houses erected in seminaries. Societies dedicated to work in mission territories may have centers to which the members belong, and from which they go out for extended periods of ministry alone. Thus Bonfils notes that a member must belong to a community but might not habitually live there, though remaining a member of it.[27] Proper law must provide for various living situations, above all in terms of the apostolic orientation of the society. For example, although what is expressed in the canon remains normative, proper law may provide for one or more members to live with secular priests or members of another institute or society, while remaining dependent on their own superior.[28]

Proper law must also provide for absences for reasons other than the apostolate.[29]

There is no parallel canon for the societies presented in the Eastern code which live in imitation of religious common life (CCEO 554–562). The particular law which must regulate the societies mentioned in Eastern canon 572 could make provisions similar to those of the Latin code.

[25] CICLSAL, Fraternal Life in Community, February 2, 1994, Origins 23 (1994) 695.

[26] P. V. Pinto, in Urbaniana Com, 465.

[27] Bonfils, "De societatibus," 1909.

[28] Ibid., 1910.

[29] Ibid. On this point, Bonfils speaks of other possible causes: the health of the member or of his or her parents; family necessities; study or formation.

Temporal Goods

Canon 741 — §1. Societies and, unless the constitutions determine otherwise, their parts and houses are juridic persons and, as such, capable of acquiring, possessing, administering, and alienating temporal goods according to the norm of the prescripts of Book V, The Temporal Goods of the Church, of cann. 636, 638, and 639, and of proper law.

§2. According to the norm of proper law, members are also capable of acquiring, possessing, administering, and disposing of temporal goods, but whatever comes to them on behalf of the society is acquired by the society.

In essence, the canon applies to societies of apostolic life the canonical norms regulating the temporal goods of public juridic persons in the Church. The constitutions must provide for appropriate regulations on temporalities if provinces and houses do not have juridic personality. In addition to observing Book V of the code, societies are to observe canons 636, 638, and 639 on religious institutes, together with their proper law. The canons mentioned deal respectively with finance officers and reports, ordinary and extraordinary administration and alienation, and the liability of the juridic person or the individual member in contracting debts. However, those canons which stress the collective witness of religious institutes to charity and poverty are not cited here.[30]

Canon 741, §2 specifies a particular characteristic of societies. According to proper law, their members enjoy a wider sphere of autonomy regarding personal financial matters than do religious. This capacity is a logical consequence of the fact that society members do not take a religious vow of poverty. Thus, proper law will also clarify the essential distinction between personal patrimony and that which comes to a member "on behalf of the society." There is a wide diversity among societies, from those observing a poverty similar to that of religious, to those allowing a quite broad autonomy even including such matters as Mass stipends.[31]

Eastern code canon 558 similarly reflects the basic principles for the administration of goods of juridic persons. At the same time, it allows society members a greater autonomy in acquiring and administering goods personally (CCEO 558, §3) than might be expected in societies identified as living a common life in the manner of religious.

Departure and Dismissal before Definitive Incorporation

Canon 742 — The constitutions of each society govern the departure and dismissal of a member not yet definitively incorporated.

Until a member is definitively incorporated in the society, his or her departure or dismissal is to be regulated by the constitutions. This follows logically from the diverse modes of incorporation available to societies which are regulated entirely by proper law. The fact that this material must be in approved constitutions further provides for that clarity and justice which are especially important in cases of dismissal. A member should have information on who has the right to dismiss him or her and, at least in general, on the reasons permitting such action.

Eastern code canon 562, §4 states that the statutes of each society must determine who has the authority to dispense from the sacred bonds. Paragraph three of the same canon provides for the dismissal of the temporarily incorporated, observing Eastern canon 552 which regulates the matter in orders and congregations.

Departure of Definitively Incorporated Members

Canon 743 — Without prejudice to the prescript of can. 693, a definitively incorporated member

[30] See cc. 634, §2; 635, §2; and 640.

[31] Bonfils, "De societatibus," 1912.

can obtain an indult of departure from the society from the supreme moderator with the consent of the council, unless it is reserved to the Holy See according to the constitutions; with the indult, the rights and obligations deriving from incorporation cease.

An indult of departure requested by a definitively incorporated member can be granted by the supreme moderator with the consent of the council, unless the constitutions reserve this authority to the Holy See.[32] Canon 693 must be observed in the case of a cleric incardinated in the society. The rights and obligations deriving from incorporation cease with the indult.

In Eastern code canon 562, §4, this matter is left entirely to the statutes of each society.

Transfer

Canon 744 — §1. It is equally reserved to the supreme moderator with the consent of the council to grant permission for a definitively incorporated member to transfer to another society of apostolic life; the rights and obligations proper to the society are suspended in the meantime, without prejudice to the right of returning before definitive incorporation in the new society.

§2. Transfer to an institute of consecrated life or from one to a society of apostolic life requires the permission of the Holy See, whose mandates must be observed.

The transfer of a definitively incorporated member to another society may be authorized by the supreme moderators with the consent of their councils. Transfer to a religious institute or a secular institute, however, requires the permission of the Holy See. This latter norm, reflecting an awareness of the diversity of types of institutes and vocations, is parallel to canon 684, §5 on religious institutes and canon 730 on secular institutes.

While the individual's rights and obligations in the original society are suspended during the transfer process, the code itself does not speak of rights and obligations in the new society. In view of varying forms of incorporation, proper law needs to be clear regarding the length of the probationary period and the rights and obligations of one transferring. When the request for transfer must be submitted to the Holy See, its mandates can provide for what may be lacking in proper law or any other particulars which need clarification. For example, the indult permitting a religious to transfer to a society without vows may expressly provide for when and how the vows are dispensed. Requests to transfer should include not only the petition signed by the individual, but also the letters of both supreme moderators following consent of their respective councils. In all instances, the right to return to one's original society or institute before definitive incorporation in the new is protected.

Transfers between the societies mentioned in Eastern code canon 554 and those between societies and religious institutes are treated in canon 562, §1 and 2. Among the differences from the Latin code are the intervention of the Apostolic See when different churches sui iuris are involved and the necessity of making a full novitiate when transferring from a society to a religious institute. No reference is made to secular institutes in this context.

Permission to Live outside the Society

Canon 745 — The supreme moderator with the consent of the council can grant an indult to live outside the society to a definitively incorporated member, but not for more than three years; the rights and obligations which cannot be reconciled with the new condition of the member are suspended, but the member remains under the care of the moderators. If it concerns a cleric, moreover, the consent of the ordinary of the place in which he must reside is required, under whose care and dependence he also remains.

[32] The reservation of this decision to the Holy See is more common in societies of women with vows. Comm 13 (1981) 397.

This canon must be clearly distinguished from canon 740, which leaves to proper law provision for absences from a house or community of the society. This permission to live "outside the society" for a maximum of three years is reserved to the supreme moderator with the consent of the council and is similar to the concept of exclaustration in religious institutes (cc. 686–687). However, the parallel canons are not invoked. A cleric must have the consent of the ordinary of the place where he will reside and, presumably, if he is incardinated in a diocese different from the one where he will reside, will have made the required consultation mentioned in canon 271. While a member lives outside the society, those rights and obligations which are not reconcilable with this new condition are suspended. Clerics remain under the double care of the moderator and the bishop. Proper law may need to specify further the obligations and rights to be adjusted.

This matter is not addressed in the Eastern code canons on societies.

Dismissal of the Definitively Incorporated

Canon 746 — For the dismissal of a definitively incorporated member, cann. 694–704 are to be observed with appropriate adaptations.

In the case of the dismissal of definitively incorporated members, reference is made to the entire article on the dismissal of religious (cc. 694–704). These canons are to be observed with adaptations appropriate to the nature of a society (congrua congruis referendo). For example, references to sacred bonds and the obligations of consecrated life, which are found in the list of causes for dismissal (c. 696, §1) will need to be adapted in a society's proper law. Likewise, while the same procedures apply to the dismissal of religious in temporary vows (c. 696, §2), these formalities are required by the code only for definitively incorporated members of societies. The dismissal of those not yet definitively incorporated is left to the constitutions of each society (c. 742).

The Eastern code likewise refers to the law for religious in handling dismissals of society members (c. 562, §3).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

(The material listed below serves as a comprehensive bibliography for part three of Book II—canons 573–746.)

Documents

CCE. "Directives Concerning the Preparation of Seminary Educators." Origins 23 (1994) 557, 559–571.

———. "Instruction on Admitting Candidates Coming from Other Seminaries or Religious Communities." Origins 26/22 (November 14, 1996) 358–360.

———. Ordo Professionis, Rite of Religious Profession, February 2, 1970. In The Rites of the Catholic Church 2: 199–297. Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1991.

CICLSAL. Congregavit nos in unum Christi amor, "Fraternal Life in Community," February 2, 1994. Origins 23/40 (March 24, 1994) 693, 695–712.

———. Directive Potissimum institutionis, February 2, 1990. AAS 82 (1990) 470–532; Origins 19 (1990) 677, 679–699.

ComCICRec. Schema Canonum de Institutis Vitae Consecratae per Professionem Consiliorum Evangelicorum. Rome, 1977; Trans. USCC, Washington, D.C., 1977.

CRIS. Praescriptis canonum, February 2, 1984. AAS 76 (1984) 500; CLD 11, 91–92.

Paul VI. Alloc Magno gaudio, May 23, 1964. CLD 6, 429–431.

SCCE. Ratio fundamentalis institutionis sacerdotalis ad normam novi codicis iuris canonici recognita. Vatican Press, March 19, 1985.

SCDW. Mos virgines consecrandi, Introduction to the Rite of Consecration to a Life of Virginity, May 31, 1970.

———. Sacris religionis vinculis, Introduction to the Rite of Initiation to the Religious Life, February 1, 1970.

SCR. Decree on pensions and subsidies for military service prior to religious profession, March 16, 1922. AAS 14 (1922) 196.

SCRIS. La plenaria, The Contemplative Dimension of Religious Life, January, 1981. Origins 10 (1981) 550–555.

———. Le scelte evangeliche, Religious and Human Advancement, January, 1981.

———. Par une lettre, Acts of special general chapters, July 10, 1972.

———. Processus judicialis, Decree on the expulsion of religious who have taken perpetual vows in an exempt clerical religious institute, March 2, 1974.

———. Sacra congregatio, On help to be given to those who leave a religious institute, January 25, 1974.

Commentaries on Consecrated Life

Andres, D. J. Il Diritto dei Religiosi: Commento al Codice Versione della Seconda Edizione Spagnola. Rome: Editrice Commentarium pro Religiosis, 1984.

Beyer, J. Il Diritto della Vita Consacrata. Milan: Editrice Ancora Milano, 1989.

———. Le Droit de la Vie Consacrée. 2 vols. Paris: Editions Tardy, 1988.

De Paolis, V. La vita consacrata nella Chiesa. Bologna: Centro Editoriale Dehoniano, 1991.

Gambari, E. I Religiosi nel Codice Commento ai Singoli Canoni. Milan: Editrice Ancora Milano, 1986.

———. Religious Life according to Vatican II and the New Code of Canon Law. Boston: Daughters of St. Paul, 1986.

Hite, J., S. Holland, and D. Ward. Religious Institutes, Secular Institutes, Societies of Apostolic Life: A Handbook on Canons 573–746. Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1985.

General Works

Azevedo, M. The Consecrated Life: Crossroads and Directions. Trans. G. Cook. New York: Orbis, 1995.

———. Vocation for Mission: The Challenge of Religious Life Today. Mahwah, N.J.: Paulist, 1988.

Cada, L., R. Fitz, et al. Shaping the Coming Age of Religious Life. 2nd ed. New York: Seabury, 1985.

Cogan, P. J., ed. Selected Issues in Religious Law—Bulletin on Issues of Religious Law 1985–1995. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1997.

Cole, B., and P. Conner. Christian Totality: Theology of the Consecrated Life. Bombay: St. Paul Pub., 1992.

Fleming, D., and E. McDonough, eds. The Church & Consecrated Life—the Best of the Review. St. Louis: RfR, 1996.

Khoury, J. Vie Consacrée. Rome: n.p., 1983.

Knowles, D. From Pachomius to Ignatius. Oxford: Clarendon, 1966.

Lozano, J. M. Discipleship: Towards an Understanding of Religious Life. Trans. B. Wilczynski. Chicago/Los Angeles/Manila: Claret Center for Resources in Spirituality, 1980.

———. Life as Parable: Reinterpreting the Religious Life. New York/Mahwah, N.J.: Paulist, 1986.

Moloney, F. J. Disciples and Prophets: A Biblical Model for the Religious Life. New York: Crossroad, 1981.

The 1983 Code

General Norms

Abbass, J. "Forms of Consecrated Life Recognized in the Eastern and Latin Codes." ComRelMiss 76/1–2 (1995) 5–38.

Beyer, J. "L'ordine delle virgini." VC 22 (1986) 591–602.

Cabra, G. "A Reflection for the Synod on the Consecrated Life." Con Lif 19/1 (1995) 45–59.

Darcy, C. The Institute of the Sisters of Mercy of the Americas: The Canonical Development of the Proposed Governance Model. New York: University Press, 1993.

De Paolis, V. "The New Forms of Consecrated Life." Con Lif 19/2 (1996) 62–85.

Desautels, D. C. "An Early Christian Rite Revised: Consecrated Virgins Living in the World." RfR 49 (1990) 567–580.

Gangoiti, B. "The Power of Major Superiors to Dispense from Common Laws and from the Laws of Their Own Institute." Con Lif 15 (1990) 85–99.

German Bishops' Pastoral. "Consecrated Virgins in the World." Trans. R. Barringer. Canadian Catholic Review (January 1988) 17–19.

Holland, S. "A Spirit to Animate the Letter: CCEO Title XII." J 56/1 (1996) 288–306.

Huels, J. "The Demise of Religious Exemption." J 54/1 (1994) 40–55.

———. "What Became of Exemption?" Conference of Major Superiors of Men Forum 66 (Spring 1994) 8–16.

Jimenez, A. "El Ordo 'Virgenes Consagradas' a la luz del Codigo vigente." ComRelMiss 75 (1994) 221–242.

MacDonald, H. "Hermits: The Juridical Implications of Canon 603." Stud Can 26 (1992) 163–189.

McDermott, R. "The Ninth Ordinary Session of the Synod of Bishops: Four Moments and Six Canonical Issues." ComRelMiss 77/3–4 (1996) 261–294.

———. "Two Approaches to Consecrated Life: The Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches and the Code of Canon Law." Stud Can 29 (1995) 193–239.

Neri, A. "Nuove forme di vita consacrata (can. 605-CIC): Profili giuridici." ComRelMiss 75/3–4 (1994) 253–308.

O'Hara, E. "Religious Issues of Dissolution, Mergers, Aggregations." CLSAP 49 (1987) 155–168.

Pfab, J. "The Episcopal Vicar for Religious." Con Lif 14/1 (1989) 81–93.

Pichard, D. "The Renewal of the Consecration of Virgins." RfR (January/February 1986) 17–24.

Selvaggi, A. "An Ancient Rite Restored—Consecrated Virgins Living in the World." Canadian Catholic Review (January 1987) 6–11.

Torres, J. "Ecclesiastical Approval of Constitutions—Meaning and Scope." Con Lif 9:1 (1984) 120–130.

Religious Institutes

Holland, S. "'Religious House' according to Canon 608." J 50 (1990) 524–552.

McDonough, E. "Religious Houses—Acquisition of Rights." CLSAP 46 (October 1984) 149–160.

Governance in Religious Institutes

Beal, J. "The Exercise of Jurisdiction by Lay Religious." Bulletin on Issues of Religious Law 13 (Winter, 1997) 1–6.

———. "The Exercise of the Power of Governance by Lay People: State of the Question." J 55/1 (1995) 1–92.

Dammertz, V. "The Juridical Structure of Contemplative Life." Con Lif 6/1 (1982) 33–39.

Darcy, C. "Models of Participation in Religious Community Chapters." CLSAP (1995) 181–200.

De Paolis, V. "Administrative Recourses and Recourses within Religious Institutes." Con Lif 18/1–2 (1993) 1: 90–114; 2: 58–81.

———. "An possit superior religiosus suffragium ferre cum suo consilio vel suo voto dirimere paritatem sui consilii." P 76 (1987) 413–446.

Koluthara, V. Rightful Autonomy of Religious Institutes. Rome: Dharmaram Pub., 1994.

McDonough, E. "Beyond the Liberal Model." Studies in Canon Law Presented to P. Huizing. Ed. J. Provost and K. Walf. Louvain: Louvain University, 1991.

———. "General Chapters: Current Legislation." RfR 55/4 (1996) 431–435.

———. "General Chapters: Historic Background." RfR 55/3 (1996) 320–325.

———. "The Potestas of Religious Superiors according to Canon 596." RfR 55/1 (January/February 1996) 87–91.

Nygren, D., and M. Ukeritis. "Religious-Leadership Competencies." RfR 52/3 (May/June 1993) 390–417.

Pfab, J. "The Right and Duty of the Superior General to Intervene in Certain Matters." Con Lif 11/1 (1986) 84–97.

Provost, J. "The Participation of the Laity in the Governance of the Church." Stud Can (1983) 417–449.

Radcliffe, T. "Towards a Spirituality of Government." Religious Life Review 36 (July/August 1997) 199–213.

Woestman, W. "De institutis clericalibus vitae consecratae et superioribus non clericis." ME 110 (1985) 411–420.

Temporal Goods

Connolly, M. "Creative Stewardship among Religious Communities, the Challenge of the 1990's." CLSAP 50 (1988) 233–248.

De Paolis, V. "Temporal Goods of the Church in the New Code, with Particular Reference to Institutes of Consecrated Life." J 43 (1983) 2: 343–360.

Kennedy, R. "McGrath, Maida, Michiels: Introduction to a Study of the Canonical and Civil-Law Status of Church-Related Institutions in the United States." J 50 (1990) 351–401.

Morrisey, F. "Ordinary and Extraordinary Administration." J 48 (1988) 709–726.

———. "The Alienation of Temporal Goods in Contemporary Practice." Stud Can 29/2 (1995) 293–316.

———. "The Conveyance of Ecclesiastical Goods." CLSAP 38 (1976) 123–137.

Admission of Candidates and Formation of Members

Con Lif 16 (1991). The entire volume contains articles on the document Potissimum institutionis, the directives on formation in religious institutes published by CICLSAL on February 2, 1990, AAS 82 (1990) 470–532; Origins 19 (1990) 677, 679–699.

Hill, R. "Admitting Former Members." RfR 45 (1986) 621–624.

———. "Denial of Profession." RfR 47 (1988) 934–939.

Loftus, J. "Victims of Abuse as Candidates." RfR 45 (1986) 725–738.

Obligations and Rights of Institutes and Their Members

Arnold, F. "Religious Obedience in a World in Search of Freedom and Maturity." UISG Bulletin n. 101 (1996) 34–41.

CMSM/LCWR Task Force on Health Care for Religious. A Vision of Life, Health, Sickness and Death for Religious. Silver Spring: CMSM/LCWR, 1995.

Euart, S. "Religious Institutes and the Juridical Relationship of the Members of the Institute." J 51 (1991) 103–118.

Koonamparampil, J. "Clerical Obligations Applied to the Religious: An Exegesis of Canon 672." ComRelMiss 69 (1988) 111–144, 271–284, 365–383.

McDermott, R. "Evangelical Poverty and the Vow in Religious Life." Religious Life Review 36 (November/December 1997) 357–367.

McDonough, E. "Cloister of Nuns: From the 1917 Code to the 1994 Synod." RfR 54 (1995) 772–778.

———. "The Protection of Rights in Religious Institutes." J 46 (1986) 164–204.

———."Understanding 'Obligations and Rights' in Church Law." RfR 49 (1990) 779–784.

McKay, G. "Spiritual Direction in the Diocesan Seminary." Stud Can 26 (1992) 401–413.

Morrisey, F. "The Vow of Poverty and Personal Patrimony." CLS-GBIN 72 (December 1987) 26–34.

Torres, J. "Absence from a Religious House." Con Lif 19/1 (1995) 69–103.

The Apostolate of Institutes

Bonfils, J. "'Mutuae Relationes' Ten Years Later." Con Lif 17/2 (1992) 122–134.

De Paolis, V. "Schema of an Agreement for the Assignment of a Parish to Religious." Con Lif 12/1–2 (1987–88) 1: 129–146; 2: 218–242.

Fullenbach, J. "Reflections on the Theological Foundation for Lay Association into Religious Institutes." UISG Bulletin n. 97 (1995) 22–31.

Gambari, E. "Affiliation of the Laity to Religious Institutes: A Canonist's Analysis." CMSM Forum 55 (Winter, 1990) 17–27.

Ghirlanda, G. "Relations between Religious Institutes and Diocesan Bishops." Con Lif 14:1 (1989) 37–71.

Hubbard, H. "The Collaboration Needed by Bishops and Religious." Origins 19 (Oct. 19, 1989) 332–336.

Jarrell, L. "Associate and the Relationship to the Religious Institute." Legal Bulletin 66 (June 1993) 32–38.

Kain, S. Written Agreements between Bishops and Religious for Entrusted Diocesan Works. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University, 1996.

Kolhensblag, M., ed. Between God and Caesar. Ramsey, N.J.: Paulist, 1985.

NCCB. "Proposed Guidelines on the Assessment of Clergy and Religious for Assignment." Canon Law Newsletter (March 1994) 3, 6–7.

O'Connor, D. "Lay Associate Programs: Some Canonical and Practical Considerations." RfR 44 (1985) 256–267.

Pagé, R. "Associations of the Faithful in the Church." J 47 (1987) 165–203.

Pfab, J. "The Particular Church and the Consecrated Life." Con Lif 19/1 (1995) 59–68.

Provost, J. "Clergy and Religious in Political Office." J 44 (1984) 276–303.

Separation of Members

Gomez-Iglesias, V. "El decreto de expulsión del canon 700 y las garantias iuridicas del afectado." IC 28 (1987) 643–670.

Hill, R. "Clarification of Dismissal: Canon 700." RfR 46 (1987) 782–786.

———."Departure of a Religious Priest or Deacon." RfR 46/6 (November/December 1987) 935–938.

McDermott, R. "Canon 702, 2: Equity and Charity to Separated Members." CLSAP (October 15–18, 1990) 120–133.

McDonough, E. "Communicating and Indult of Departure." RfR 51/5 (September/October 1992) 782–788.

———. "Exclaustration: Canonical Categories and Current Practice." J 49/2 (1989) 568–606.

"Procedure for the Separation of Members from Their Institute." Con Lif 10/1 (1986) 87–92; CLD 11, 92–98.

Ruessmann, M. "Aspects of Exclaustration." P 84 (1995) 237–266.

Torres, J. "Dispensation from Vows." Con Lif 18/2 (1995) 82–102.

———. "Procedure for the Exclaustration of a Religious." Con Lif 18/1 (1993) 47–73.

Welch, M., and P. Campbell. "Provisions for Departing Members." Bulletin on Issues of Religious Law 12 (Fall, 1996) 1–16.

Religious Raised to Episcopate

Andres, D. J. "De religioso episcopo carente voce activa et passiva in proprio Instituto." ComRelMiss 68 (1987) 294–308.

Goyeneche, S. "Various Queries and Replies." ComRelMiss 33 (1954) 54–59; 36 (1957) 225–226; 39 (1960) 72–75; 43 (1964) 174–175.

Conferences of Major Superiors

CICLSAL. "New Council of Major Superiors of Women Religious." Origins 22/9 (July 23, 1992) 157, 159–163.

Ghirlanda, G. "Nature and Institutional Ends of the Conferences of Men and Women Religious Superiors." Con Lif 19/2 (1993) 85–106.

Nardin, G. "De accommodata renovatione statuum perfectionis . . . motus unionis inter status perfectionis." ComRelMiss 39 (1960) 165–195.

Secular Institutes

ComRelMiss 18 (1997). Issue dedicated to secular institutes on 30th anniversary of Provida Mater Ecclesia, with extensive bibliography.

CRIS. "Secular Institutes—Informative Document." CLD 11, 109–131.

Holland, S. "Instituta saecularia et Codex 1983." P 74 (1985) 511–533.

O'Connor, D. "Two Forms of Consecrated Life: Religious and Secular Institutes." RfR 45 (1986) 205–219.

Secular Institutes, Documents. Rome: CMIS, 1998.

Walsh, D. A. The New Law on Secular Institutes. An Historical Synopsis and a Commentary. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1953.

"World Congress of Secular Institutes." Con Lif 14/2 (1989) 305–347.

Societies of Apostolic Life

Bonfils, J. Les Sociétés de Vie Apostolique. Paris: Cerf, 1990.

Duster, C. The Canonical Status of Members of Missionary Societies of Apostolic Life of Pontifical Right. Rome: Columban Fathers, 1994.

Finn, T. J. "An Old Entity—a New Name: Societies of Apostolic Life." Stud Can 20 (1986) 439–456.

BOOK III
THE TEACHING FUNCTION OF THE CHURCH
[cc. 747–833]

INTRODUCTION

James A. Coriden

Teaching is central to the purpose and mission of the Church:

> Go, therefore, and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, teaching them to observe all that I have commanded you. (Mt 28:19–20)

Everyone in the Church participates in this "prophetic function" of announcing the good news of Jesus Christ (cc. 204, 211) and helping one another to become his disciples. Hence the canons of this book relate to all of the Christian faithful because all have a part to play.

The five titles within the book deal with: (1) the ministry of the divine word, including preaching and catechesis, (2) missionary activity, (3) Catholic education, including schools, colleges, and ecclesiastical universities and faculties, (4) media of communications, and (5) the profession of faith. A major theme of the book is the assignment of responsibility for the various aspects of the entire teaching mission.

Because these proclamatory, formational, and educational ministries are gathered here in one location and given a highlighted place in the revised code does not imply that the teaching functions are separate from the sanctifying and pastoring functions. They are not. These activities are most often closely associated, like preaching within liturgical celebrations, and they are profoundly interdependent. They are separated here for disciplinary clarity, but in the life of the Church they must work together in harmony, like voices in a choir.

The Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches regulates these same ministries under four distinct titles: number 14 on evangelization (CCEO 584–594), 15 on the magisterium, including preaching, catechesis, catholic education, and media of communications (CCEO 595–666), 17 on bringing baptized non-Catholics into full communion (CCEO 896–901), and 18 on ecumenism (CCEO 902–908).

CANONS AND COMMENTARY

INTRODUCTORY CANONS [cc. 747–755]

The Church's Duty and Right to Preach the Gospel

Canon 747 — §1. The Church, to which Christ the Lord has entrusted the deposit of faith so that with the assistance of the Holy Spirit it might protect the revealed truth reverently, examine it more closely, and proclaim and expound it faithfully, has the duty and innate right, independent of any human power whatsoever, to preach the gospel to all peoples, also using the means of social communication proper to it.

§2. It belongs to the Church always and everywhere to announce moral principles, even about the social order, and to render judgment concerning any human affairs insofar as the fundamental rights of the human person or the salvation of souls requires it.

The Church exists in order to proclaim the gospel message. Jesus said, "Go into the whole world and proclaim the gospel to every creature" (Mk 16:15). This doctrinal canon reminds everyone of that solemn duty and right. It echoes the language of both the First and Second Vatican Councils; Lumen gentium 12, Dei verbum 7–10, and Dignitatis humanae 13 provide the most helpful conciliar background for the canon's first paragraph.

The Church as a whole, the holy people of God, is the active subject of this teaching function. It is not only the function of the ordained or of professional theologians; everyone in the Church has a role to play. They do so with the constant help of the Holy Spirit. The Spirit of truth arouses and sustains a "sense of the faith" in the universal body of the faithful, and the same Spirit distributes gifts to the faithful of every rank.

The entire Church, under the Spirit's guidance, dynamically engages God's revealed truth, safeguarding it, searching for a more profound grasp of it, faithfully announcing and explaining it.

The Church, as a result of the Lord's command, claims that its right to proclaim the gospel is "natively its own," and not dependent on any civil or state authority's concession, permission, or toleration.

The second paragraph further specifies the Church's teaching function in the moral and social orders. It is to be understood in the sense of Dignitatis humanae 14 and Gaudium et spes 76. The Church's mission is in the religious order, not in the political, economic, or social orders. Yet its properly religious role can contribute to the building up and strengthening of the human community (GS 42). To this end the Church announces moral principles, even on social issues.[1] The Church can also make judgments when basic human rights or the salvation of souls seem to require it; in making such discernments the Church uses "all and only those means appropriate to the gospel and the good of all"; its contribution is "to increase the spread of justice and charity within nations and between nations" (GS 76).

[1] Two major pastoral letters of the NCCB are fine examples of this social teaching: The Challenge of Peace: God's Promise and Our Response (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1983) and Economic Justice for All: Catholic Social Teaching and the U.S. Economy (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1986).

The Obligation and Right to Search for Truth and to Embrace It

Canon 748 — §1. All persons are bound to seek the truth in those things which regard God and his Church and by virtue of divine law are bound by the obligation and possess the right of embracing and observing the truth which they have come to know.

§2. No one is ever permitted to coerce persons to embrace the Catholic faith against their conscience.

Human dignity demands that persons should enjoy the use of their own judgment and freedom in making decisions. They should be free to base their own actions on their consciences, and not be coerced by internal (psychological) or external pressures.

However, all persons also have a moral obligation to seek the truth, especially religious truth, about God and about his Church. Once that quest is complete, once the truth is known, then they are obliged to hold on to the truth and regulate their lives in accord with it.

It is an obvious consequence of these teachings that no one can be forced to accept the Catholic faith, or any other faith for that matter, against his or her conscience.

This is the position articulated in the Declaration on Religious Freedom of the Second Vatican Council (specifically DH 1–3). That document is the basis for this canon and the context in which it should be read.

The first paragraph states two different responsibilities: (1) to seek the truth about God and his Church, and then, (2) having recognized that truth, to cling to it and live by it. Both are rights which belong to everyone.

The principle of the duty and freedom to search for religious truth is one which should pervade the life of the Church, for it is grounded not only on the dignity of the human person, but on the essential freedom of the act of faith. "The act of faith is by its very nature voluntary" (DH 10). A healthy atmosphere of freedom should characterize the community of faith.

The second paragraph traces the outer boundary of this zone of religious freedom: no coercion. The Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches (CCEO 586 in title XV on evangelization) is much more thoroughgoing; not only are force and untoward influences to be avoided, but the Church should show itself as an attractive community within which religious freedom is honored:

> It is strictly forbidden to compel someone, to persuade him or her in an inappropriate way, or to allure him or her to join the church; all the Christian faithful are to be concerned that the right to religious freedom is vindicated so that no one is driven away from the church by adverse harassment.

Infallibility of the Pope and of the College of Bishops

Canon 749 — §1. By virtue of his office, the Supreme Pontiff possesses infallibility in teaching when as the supreme pastor and teacher of all the Christian faithful, who strengthens his brothers and sisters in the faith, he proclaims by definitive act that a doctrine of faith or morals is to be held.

§2. The college of bishops also possesses infallibility in teaching when the bishops gathered together in an ecumenical council exercise the magisterium as teachers and judges of faith and morals who declare for the universal Church that a doctrine of faith or morals is to be held definitively; or when dispersed throughout the world but preserving the bond of communion among themselves and with the successor of Peter and teaching authentically together with the Roman Pontiff matters of faith or morals, they agree that a particular proposition is to be held definitively.

§3. No doctrine is understood as defined infallibly unless this is manifestly evident.

The narrowly circumscribed and almost-never-exercised prerogative of teaching infallibly, here attributed to the papal and episcopal offices, should be seen within the larger and more basic indefectibility and inerrancy of the Church itself. "The universal body of the faithful who have received the anointing of the holy one (see 1 Jn 2:20, 27) cannot be mistaken in belief" (LG 12).

Nearly all of the vast amount of papal teaching, i.e., encyclicals, exhortations, letters, addresses, homilies, etc., is non-infallible. That is, most of the time the pope makes no pretense of teaching definitively, of defining doctrines. The charism of infallibility is not only most rarely employed (twice in the last century and a half), but it is restricted by all of the conditions stated in the first paragraph of the canon.

Similarly, even when the college of bishops teaches solemnly, as it did at the Second Vatican Council, it does not exercise its infallible authority. If it wished to teach infallibly within or outside of an ecumenical council, the college would have to do so quite explicitly, that is, with the expressed intention to act infallibly and the agreement that an opinion is to be definitively held (tamquam definitive tenendam).[2]

The doctrine of infallibility has long roots in the history of the Church, but its solemn articula-

[2] The statement by the CDF of October 28, 1995 (Origins 25 [November 30, 1995] 401, 403), that the teaching to the effect that the Church has no authority to confer priestly ordination on women requires the definitive assent of the faithful since "it has been set forth infallibly by the ordinary and universal Magisterium" is an exaggeration. The teaching (restated in the aplett Ordinatio sacerdotalis, May 22, 1994, Origins 24 [June 9, 1994] 50–52) does not meet the test of explicitness; neither the pope nor the college of bishops declared that they were making an infallible definition, nor has it been demonstrated that the whole body of Catholic bishops has taught the doctrine in such a way as to oblige the faithful to give it definitive assent. Consequently its infallibility can hardly be considered "manifestly evident." For a careful discussion of this point, see "Tradition and the Ordination of Women," a document of the Catholic Theological Society of America of June, 1997 (Origins 27:5 [June 19, 1997] 75–79).

tion took place in the final session of the First Vatican Council (a. 1870). This canon should be viewed from that perspective and in the context of the more recent restatement of the teaching in Lumen gentium 25.

The third paragraph of the canon is perhaps the most important canonically. Unless a teaching is clearly established as infallibly defined, it is not infallible. Manifeste means manifestly, plainly, evidently. Doctrines which are assumed or deduced or inferred to be infallible do not so qualify. The action of teaching infallibly must be clear and unambiguous, so that it does not engender confusion.

Matters of Faith and Matters Connected to Faith

Canon 750 — §1. A person must believe with divine and Catholic faith all those things contained in the word of God, written or handed on, that is, in the one deposit of faith entrusted to the Church, and at the same time proposed as divinely revealed either by the solemn magisterium of the Church or by its ordinary and universal magisterium which is manifested by the common adherence of the Christian faithful under the leadership of the sacred magisterium; therefore all are bound to avoid any doctrines whatsoever contrary to them.

§2. Each and every thing which is proposed definitively by the magisterium of the Church concerning the doctrine of faith and morals, that is, each and every thing which is required to safeguard reverently and to expound faithfully the same deposit of faith, is also to be firmly embraced and retained; therefore, one who refuses those propositions which are to be held definitively is opposed to the doctrine of the Catholic Church.

Among all the things taught by the Church, what must be believed? The first paragraph of this canon answers that question by describing God's revelation, that single confluence made up of the written word of holy scripture and the spoken word of tradition, to which the believer gives the assent of faith. The faith is called "divine" because it responds to God's self-revelation, and "catholic" because it is proposed by the Church as divinely revealed.

The doctrine contained in the first paragraph was taught at the First Vatican Council (in the dogmatic constitution Dei Filius, chapter 3, and then modified in light of Lumen gentium 25 and Dei verbum 10 of the Second Vatican Council.

One important addition to the paragraph is the notion of "reception." The "common adherence of the Christian faithful" (communi adhaesione Christifidelium) is what makes manifest a teaching which emanates from the ordinary and universal magisterium. The people's "sense of faith" (sensus fidei), aroused and sustained by the Spirit of truth, receives the word of God and adheres unfailingly to the faith (LG 12). The Spirit facilitates the interaction between God's holy word and the belief of God's holy people.

> Thus it is clear that, by God's wise design, tradition, scripture and the church's teaching function are so connected and associated that one does not stand without the others, but all together, and each in its own way, subject to the action of the one Holy Spirit, contribute effectively to the salvation of souls. (DV 10)

The paragraph reminds every believer to avoid any teaching that is contrary to these core doctrines.

The second paragraph of this canon was added to the code (and to the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches) by Pope John Paul II on May 18, 1998.[3] It refers to truths which, although not divinely revealed, are necessarily connected, either historically or logically, with revealed truths, providing that those connected truths have been proposed definitively by the Church's teaching authority.

[3] Apostolic letter issued motu proprio, Ad tuendam fidem (Origins 28:8 [July 16, 1998] 113–116). In keeping with c. 8, the paragraph became effective three months after the date of the issue of AAS in which it was published, July 1, 1998 (AAS 90 [1998] 457–461).

The Congregation of the Doctrine of the Faith in 1989 published a new formula for the profession of faith which is to be taken by those listed in canon 833.[4] The formula includes a reference to this category of "definitively proposed" doctrines and states that they are to be "accepted and held" (not "believed," since they are not themselves divinely revealed). This present paragraph was added to the codes in 1998 to make the canons correspond to the formula for the profession of faith.

"Definitively proposed" doctrines are those solemnly defined by the pope or by an ecumenical council or taught infallibly by the ordinary and universal magisterium as teachings to be definitively held (LG 25).[5]

A person who obstinately rejects such teachings and fails to retract after being warned by the Apostolic See or an ordinary may be punished in accord with canon 1371, 1°.

Heresy, Apostasy, Schism

Canon 751 — Heresy is the obstinate denial or obstinate doubt after the reception of baptism of some truth which is to be believed by divine and Catholic faith; apostasy is the total repudiation of the Christian faith; schism is the refusal of submission to the Supreme Pontiff or of communion with the members of the Church subject to him.

Previous to the Second Vatican Council the canonical context for these offenses was the Protestant Reformation, that is, the perceived errors and divisions associated with those sixteenth-century events. Now the context is ecumenical. The concepts of heresy, apostasy, and schism must be viewed within the framework of communion, the several elements of which are detailed in Lumen gentium 14 and 15 and in Unitatis redintegratio 3. Christians are joined together by much more than the profession of common doctrine, not the least of which unifying factors is charity.

Indeed, the terms heresy, apostasy, and schism are no longer used of those born and baptized outside the visible communion of the Catholic Church. The offenses can be ascribed only to Catholics, those baptized into the Catholic Church or later received into it (UR 3; ED 19–20).

Heresy, apostasy, and schism are considered to be grave offenses against revealed truth and ecclesial communion, especially in a Church which takes both its doctrine and its communion very seriously. Because the possible consequences of these actions are so drastic, the notions must be correctly understood and narrowly construed.

If the elements of these offenses are ever verified, they can lead to loss of ecclesiastical office (c. 194, §1, 2°), to dismissal from one's religious community (c. 694, §1, 1°), to irregularity for receiving holy orders (c. 1041, §2) or for exercising them (c. 1044, §1, 2°), to dismissal from the clerical state (c. 1364, §2), to excommunication (c. 1364, §1), and even to denial of ecclesiastical funeral rites (c. 1184, §1, 1°).

The anomaly about these severe consequences is that some of the most serious of them are "automatic or self-imposed" (ipso iure, ipso facto, latae sententiae), while the alleged offenses are often quite complex, nuanced, and vigorously disputed, except in the extremely rare event that the persons themselves admit to being in heresy, apostasy, or schism. In other words, this system of sanctions for serious doctrinal deviations does not work. When a person denies the offense, the sanctions can be justly imposed or declared only by means of a canonical process (cc. 1717–1728), which is almost never employed.[6]

[4] L'Osservatore Romano, February 25, 1989, p. 6; AAS 81 (1989) 104–106. See the Report of the Catholic Theological Society of America Committee on the Profession of Faith and the Oath of Fidelity, April 15, 1990.

[5] A letter of June 29, 1998, signed by Cardinal Ratzinger (Origins 28:8 [July 16, 1998] 116–119), offered an explanation of the three categories of teachings contained in the 1989 formula of profession of faith and in this canon and c. 752. Paragraph 11 of that letter suggests several examples of truths which the congregation considers "definitively proposed."

[6] The canonical process was not used, for example, when the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith declared on January 2, 1997, that Tissa Balasuriya, a Sri Lankan

Heresy is a denial or doubt of "a truth which is to be believed with divine and Catholic faith" (cf. c. 750, §1; but the crime of heresy applies only to this narrow category of truths; it does not extend to the "secondary object of infallibility," i.e., those truths necessary to preserve and expound the deposit of faith, c. 750, §2); these are central truths like the Incarnation and Resurrection of the Lord, and not at all like the morality of artificial contraception or the discipline of not ordaining women to the priesthood.

The denial or doubt must be born of "bad faith" (mala fide, see Comm 7:2 [1975] 150, and the praenotanda to the 1977 schema on the Church's teaching office, no. 3), that is, positions taken with full knowledge, deliberate intent, and the understanding that they are contrary to divine and catholic faith. The denial or doubt must be pertinacious, that is, obstinate, defiant, and enduring, even after a process of reflection, reconsideration, dialogue, and attempted reconciliation.

Apostasy is the complete rejection and repudiation of the Christian (not only Catholic) faith. It implies much more than a withdrawal, distancing, separation, or abandonment of the faith. Like heresy, it requires full knowledge, deliberation, and persistence; it is neither sudden nor momentary.

Schism is more than mere refusal of communion. The canon uses the term detrectatio (in place of recusat in the 1917 code), implying an adamant refusal and persistent rejection of communion.[7] The solemn duty to maintain communion is stated in canon 209, but the elements of communion are many more than those summarized in canon 205, for example, possession of the Spirit and the life of grace (see LG 14 and 15, UR 3).

This canon on grave offenses against belief and communion is oddly placed among the canons on the teaching function of the Church. The Eastern code placed its treatment of these same issues within the "penal sanctions" section (CCEO 1436 and 1437). It wisely avoided "automatic" penalties and called for warnings before any punishment is imposed.

Teachings of the Pope and College of Bishops

Canon 752 — Although not an assent of faith, a religious submission of the intellect and will must be given to a doctrine which the Supreme Pontiff or the college of bishops declares concerning faith or morals when they exercise the authentic magisterium, even if they do not intend to proclaim it by definitive act; therefore, the Christian faithful are to take care to avoid those things which do not agree with it.

Nearly all of the teaching of the pope and the college of bishops is non-definitive. This includes papal encyclicals, letters, and constitutions, as well as the documents of ecumenical councils. This canon attempts to describe the response which the faithful ought to give to this solemn but non-infallible teaching. It clearly distinguishes this response from "the assent of faith," which is due only to what is contained in divine revelation.

The canon uses the technical expression "religiosum obsequium intellectus et voluntatis," here rendered as "a religious submission of the intellect and will." An exact translation of obsequium is difficult, but "submission" is not the best one because it exaggerates the force of the Latin. Such English terms as "respect," "deference," "concurrence," "adherence," "compliance," or "allegiance" would be better translations of obsequium.[8] theologian, had incurred excommunication latae sententiae (Origins 26:32 [January 30, 1997] 528–530). The congregation subsequently issued a new set of internal "Regulations for Doctrinal Examination" (August 29, 1997; Origins 27:13 [September 11, 1997] 221–224) which included an assertion (in art. 28) of its authority to declare such penalties without "a penal trial according to canon law," an exception to universal law.

[7] For example, Archbishop Marcel Lefebvre led his followers into effective schism in the early 1970s, shortly after the Second Vatican Council, but he was excommunicated only in 1988 after illegally ordaining four bishops.

[8] For a discussion of this point, see the writings by Boyle, Sullivan, and Blyskal in the bibliography at the end of Book III.

The point is not precision of language so much as the appropriate response to truth. The pope and the college of bishops exercise their authentic teaching authority even when they teach in a non-definitive manner. The proper reception of that teaching is usually acceptance, because the teaching enjoys a strong presumption of correctness. However, that same teaching authority has been mistaken in the past, for example in regard to the teachings of Galileo Galilei, and almost surely will be mistaken sometimes in the future. Hence, it would be wrong to expect the faithful to give absolute or unconditional obedience to it. That is what the canon points out: what is due to this authentic but non-infallible teaching is not the assent of faith but a respectful religious deference of intellect and will, and an avoidance of teachings which do not concur with it. The canon leaves room for dissent when such honest disagreement is based on preponderant evidence.[9]

The principal source for the canon is Lumen gentium 25. Among other things, the conciliar text recalls that these teachings are not all of the same import or weight; the level of the doctrine is indicated by the nature of the document, the repetition of the teaching, and the tenor of the language used to express it. (See also UR 11 on the intrinsic hierarchy of truths.)

This canon should also be viewed alongside canon 212, §1 on the Christian obedience due to bishops as teachers of the faith, and canon 218 on theological freedom of inquiry and expression, both in the section on the obligations and rights of all the Christian faithful.

A penal provision related to this canon was added to the 1983 code at the last minute; i.e., it did not appear in its present form in the draft approved by the Commission for Revision in 1981. Canon 1371, 1° provides for the possible punishment, after official admonition, of one who pertinaciously rejects the kind of non-definitive teaching described in canon 752. This intemperate provision ill accords with the duty and freedom to search for truth affirmed above in canons 748 and 218. It gives the impression that the Church is intolerant of legitimate debate or opposed to the development of doctrine. This punitive provision was not included in the 1990 Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches (cf. CCEO 1436, §2).

Teaching Authority of Bishops

Canon 753 — Although the bishops who are in communion with the head and members of the college, whether individually or joined together in conferences of bishops or in particular councils, do not possess infallibility in teaching, they are authentic teachers and instructors of the faith for the Christian faithful entrusted to their care; the Christian faithful are bound to adhere with religious submission of mind to the authentic magisterium of their bishops.

Bishops teach with authority when gathered in episcopal conferences or in local councils (i.e., plenary or provincial councils), and even when acting individually, for instance, when issuing a pastoral letter. Since bishops have been given an official teaching function in the Church, the faithful entrusted to them should give their teachings sincere and religious deference.[10] It is even more important here, when considering the teaching authority of individual bishops and of groups of bishops (as over against the authority of the entire college of bishops), to distinguish the response of religious respect from the assent of faith, and to discern the various levels of the doctrines being taught. To put it simply, there is greater danger of error here.

Bishops are not only not infallible, they are sometimes mistaken. What then is the nature of their authentic magisterium or teaching authority? Bishops stand in the shoes of James, Paul, Timothy, and Titus; they are overseers of churches who are charged to proclaim the word and to teach sound doctrine (e.g., 2 Tim 4:1–4). They are heralds of the faith, teachers endowed with the authority of Christ, witnesses to divine and catholic faith, yet they are also fallible (LG 25).

[9] The book of readings edited by Charles Curran and Richard McCormick, listed in the bibliography, provides a thorough discussion of the issue of dissent in the Church.

[10] Again "submission" is too strong an English translation of "obsequium" in this canon; see the comments on the preceding canon for more suitable expressions.

The authoritative teaching of bishops must be seen within the context of the primary subject of inerrancy within the Church, namely, the holy people of God, "the universal body of the faithful who have received the anointing of the holy one" (LG 12). Hence, the condition, expressed in the canon, that the bishops are "in communion with the head and members of the college." Their teaching is authoritative when in harmony with that of the whole Church.

The bishops' teaching authority must also be viewed in the context of the churches which they head. The canon says they are authoritative teachers of those "Christian faithful entrusted to their care." The bishop's witness to the faith is not separate from or over against the community's faith (though there are times when a prophetic challenge to the community is called for). The bishop is a believer among believers. He has no special source of revelation or inspiration. The bishop and all the other teachers and learners who assist him are all together reliant on the Holy Spirit. They seek and find the truth, under the Spirit's tutelage, in prayer, in study, and in conversation with one another. It is in this context that "the faithful ought to concur with their bishop's judgment concerning faith and morals which he delivers in the name of Christ" (LG 25).

This canon should be read along with canons 212, §1, 386, and 756, §2 on the teaching ministry of bishops.

After the council there was some controversy about the teaching authority of episcopal conferences. In light of this canon, the authentic and collegiate teaching role of the conferences in the Church's magisterium seems obvious.[11]

The Eastern code, in canons 600–606, provides an expanded treatment of these issues with rich detail and helpful nuance in its section on the teaching function of bishops.

Teaching by Decree

Canon 754 — All the Christian faithful are obliged to observe the constitutions and decrees which the legitimate authority of the Church issues in order to propose doctrine and to proscribe erroneous opinions, particularly those which the Roman Pontiff or the college of bishops puts forth.

This canon is an illustration of the juridicization of the teaching office. It is not derived from the Second Vatican Council, but it is a refurbished relic from the 1917 code (CIC 1324).

The canon, like its predecessor of 1917, speaks of constitutions and decrees. It refers to enactments like the dogmatic constitutions of the First Vatican Council (1870, Dei Filius on the Catholic faith and Pastor aeternus on the Church of Christ) and the decree of the Congregation of the Holy Office (1907, Lamentabili on the errors of the Modernists). But it also refers to the constitutions from the Second Vatican Council (1963, Sacrosanctum Concilium on the sacred liturgy; 1964, Lumen gentium on the Church; and 1965, Dei verbum on divine revelation and Gaudium et spes on the Church in the modern world), and its several decrees (e.g., on ecumenism, on the pastoral office of bishops, on the renewal of religious life, on the apostolate of the laity, etc.).

There is no language here of "the assent of faith" or of "religious respect of intellect and will" as in the foregoing canons. Here it is the language of law: the faithful are "obliged to observe constitutions and decrees" issued by legitimate church authority. The authorities in question are especially the pope and the college of bishops, but the canon has been expanded to include bishops acting individually or in conference, synod, or particular council (see preceding canon).

[11] As obvious as it might seem, an apostolic letter issued motu proprio by John Paul II on May 21, 1998, Apostolos suos (AAS 90 [1998] 641–658; Origins 28:9 [July 30, 1998] 152–158), circumscribed the teaching authority of episcopal conferences very narrowly. Bishops gathered in conferences are authentic teachers and instructors of the faith, but conferences may issue doctrinal declarations only when the bishops approve them unanimously or when the declarations have received the recognitio of the Apostolic See (par. 22 and art. 1).

The canon comes from an age when it was thought that truth could be imposed and error proscribed by edict. However, in 1965 the council taught that "truth imposes itself solely by the force of its own truth, as it enters the mind at once gently and with power" (DH 1).

The canon has no parallel in the 1990 Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches.

The Ecumenical Movement

Canon 755 — §1. It is above all for the entire college of bishops and the Apostolic See to foster and direct among Catholics the ecumenical movement whose purpose is the restoration among all Christians of the unity which the Church is bound to promote by the will of Christ.

§2. It is likewise for the bishops and, according to the norm of law, the conferences of bishops to promote this same unity and to impart practical norms according to the various needs and opportunities of the circumstances; they are to be attentive to the prescripts issued by the supreme authority of the Church.

The Catholic Church joined the ecumenical movement late, but did so with commitment and enthusiasm. The Decree on Ecumenism of the Second Vatican Council was a dramatic breakthrough; it signaled the Church's serious engagement in the movement toward Christian unity. This canon, derived from that decree (UR 4), is a canonical capsule of the Church's commitment. Its operative words are "foster... the ecumenical movement" and "promote... the restoration of unity among all Christians" because that is Christ's will.

By stark contrast, canon 1325, §3 of the 1917 code forbade Catholics to engage in debates or conferences with non-Catholics without the permission of the Holy See.

The canon indicates three levels of official responsibility for this positive promotion of Christian unity: (1) the college of bishops and the Apostolic See are to foster and direct it, (2) the bishops' conferences are to promote and issue practical norms for it, and (3) individual bishops are to do the same in their own churches.

The Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity in 1993 issued a "Directory for the Application of Principles and Norms on Ecumenism,"[12] which summed up and superseded previous guidelines. The document was compiled to help both pastors and people; it is an instrument at the service of the whole Church, intended to motivate, enlighten, and guide ecumenical activity.

The ecumenical movement sometimes appears to move with glacial speed, but great progress has been made since the Second Vatican Council. Local initiatives are responsible for some of the most encouraging forward motion, for example, the bilateral dialogues at the national level and innumerable joint projects, both symbolic and substantial, at the diocesan and parish levels. The work must press on for it is the Lord's will "that all may be one" (Jn 17:21).

The 1990 Eastern code devotes an entire title to "Ecumenism or Fostering the Unity of Christians" (CCEO 902–908), which encourages the movement in many ways, and specifically recommends that Christians cooperate in common projects whenever possible: works of social justice, charity, human rights, and peace should not be done separately but together (CCEO 908).

See also canons 11, 204–205, 256, §1, 364, 6°, 383, §3, 463, §3, 844, 874, §2, 933, 1124–1129, 1183, §3 of the 1983 code on matters related to ecumenism. A few bishops' conferences have issued norms on ecumenism for their territories (see LCE at c. 755 or Pamplona ComEng, Appendix III); the NCCB has not done so as yet, except in the area of mixed marriages.

[12] March 23, 1993, AAS 85 (1993) 1039–1119; Origins 23:9 (July 29, 1993) 129–160.

TITLE I
THE MINISTRY OF THE DIVINE WORD
[cc. 756–780]

The entire people of God share in the prophetic role of Christ (munus propheticum Christi), hence all participate in the ministry of proclaiming God's holy word. This fundamental teaching of the Second Vatican Council (cf. LG 12, 35, GS 41–42, DV 1, 7–10) rules the entire book on the Church's teaching office and, in particular, this section on the ministry of the divine word. In other words, the one absolutely compelling mandate is that the word of God be proclaimed. Who does it and how they carry it out are secondary considerations. All are responsible to see that it is done.

The "divine word" of the title must be understood in a large sense. It includes not only the written words of the Old and New Testaments, but also tradition, both the originating apostolic message and its subsequent ecclesial transmission and interpretation. Indeed, it means the very Word of God made flesh in the person of Jesus Christ. The divine word, then, is God revealing himself to humankind in ongoing ways through the power of the Holy Spirit.

The "ministry of the divine word" encompasses all the ways that the mystery of God's self-revelation is communicated to humanity, especially in and through the mission of the Church. In this title preaching and catechesis occupy center stage.

The six introductory canons (cc. 756–761), in general and sweeping terms, attempt to do two things: the first four assign responsibilities for the ministry and the last two describe the scope of the ministry.

The first four canons give an impression of completeness and symmetry. They describe the roles of pope, bishops, presbyters, pastors and other pastoral care-givers, deacons, religious, and laity. Everyone has a place in the ministry of the word.

The canons convey a further impression of theological symmetry: pope and bishops are entrusted with the munus (function) of announcing the gospel; it is proprium (proper) to presbyters, pastors, and others have the officium (office); deacons serve (inservire) in the ministry of the word; religious, because of their consecration to God, render testimony to the gospel in a special way and are appropriately (convenienter) called upon to help; and lay persons, in virtue of their baptism and confirmation, are witnesses (testes) to the gospel message and may be called upon (vocari) to cooperate in the exercise of the ministry with the bishop and presbyters. However, these various descriptive terms were not employed consistently in the council documents or in the code. They are simply attempts to describe the different roles, and the underlying theological rationale strains under the effort of trying to distinguish them. Some are distinctions without real differences.

The reality is that everyone in the Church has the radical duty and right to participate in the ministry of the divine word by virtue of their initiation (baptism, confirmation, Eucharist), communion, and possession of the Spirit of Christ (LG 11–14). Some have further rights and responsibilities in regard to this ministry by virtue of their share in the sacrament of orders and their ecclesiastical office. All must be able and qualified in order to exercise the ministry in the name of the Church. To put it negatively, the Church needs to have ways of indicating who is not able or qualified to minister in its name, whether it is a bishop, presbyter, deacon, or lay person. That is the purpose of this elaborate system of canonical distinctions.

These canons (756–761) stand alongside those at the outset of Book II, The People of God, specifically canons 204, §1, 211, 213, 225, §1, and 230, §3, as the first principles of this ministry. They are doctrinal and foundational, which gives them a certain juridic priority. They resemble constitutional provisions which take precedence over statutes.

Roles of the Pope and the Bishops

Canon 756 — §1. With respect to the universal Church, the function of proclaiming the gospel has been entrusted principally to the Roman Pontiff and the college of bishops.

§2. With respect to the particular church entrusted to him, an individual bishop, who is the moderator of the entire ministry of the word within it, exercises that function; sometimes several bishops fulfill this function jointly with respect to different churches at once, according to the norm of law.

The first paragraph is drawn both from the 1917 code (CIC 1327, §1) and from the Second Vatican Council (LG 23 and 25, CD 3 and 12). "The charge of announcing the gospel throughout the world belongs to the body of shepherds, to all of whom in common Christ gave the command and imposed a common office" (LG 23). It specifies the supervisory role of the pope and bishops within the ministry of the word which pertains to the whole Church, and it points to the direct teaching which is associated with the modern exercise of the Petrine office and with the college of bishops when gathered in council.

The second paragraph, from the same sources (CIC 1327, §2; LG 23 and 25, CD 3 and 12), speaks of the bishop's role as "moderator of the ministry of the word" in the diocesan church entrusted to him. Canon 386 further details the bishop's teaching duties, and canons 212, §1 and 753 ask the faithful to respect and obey his teachings. This paragraph, like canon 753, alludes to the legitimate and valuable proclamatory function of bishops teaching together, jointly in groupings, in state conferences, provinces, regions, nations, or ritual churches (sui iuris). For example, the bishops' conferences in the U.S., Canada, and other places have distinguished themselves by announcing the gospel in pastoral messages on many urgent issues.

This canon finds no parallel in the 1990 Eastern code.

Roles of Presbyters and Deacons

Canon 757 — It is proper for presbyters, who are co-workers of the bishops, to proclaim the gospel of God; this duty binds especially pastors and others to whom the care of souls is entrusted with respect to the people committed to them. It is also for deacons to serve the people of God in the ministry of the word in communion with the bishop and his presbyterate.

The canon firmly asserts the privileged responsibilities of presbyters and deacons "to proclaim the gospel of God" and "to serve the people of God in the ministry of the word." But in doing so, the canon attempts to build theologically artificial levels within the ministry of the word for bishops, presbyters, and deacons. Granted the supervisory or "moderating" role of the bishop, all three grades of holy orders have an innate duty toward the proclamation of the word. That is to say, it is "proper" (proprium) for all three to announce the gospel of God and serve the people in the ministry of the word.

To explain, all three orders, episcopate, presbyterate, and diaconate, fulfill the function of teaching in the person of Christ the Head (in persona Christi capitis munera docendi . . . adimplentes; cc. 1008 and 1009). In their ordination rites, all three are given explicit charges related to the ministry of the word. Surely all three are bound to serve the people of God in that ministry "in communion" with one another, bishops and presbyters no less than deacons. Deacons are co-workers (cooperatores) with bishops just as presbyters are. All three are sacred ministers, in proper and permanent grades of the "hierarchy," and all are strengthened by sacramental grace.

There may be disciplinary reasons to assert greater control over the public ministry of the word for deacons and for presbyters (cf. c. 764), but there is little theological justification for doing so. Indeed, it would seem, based on the foregoing, that all three grades of holy orders participate in the Church's magisterium, that is, in its official teaching office.

The canon calls attention to the special obligation of pastors and "others to whom the care of souls is entrusted," like chaplains, rectors of churches, and missionaries. It does not refer explicitly to those deacons, religious, and laity who are given the pastoral care of parishes in virtue of canon 517, §2 (because here the context indicates that the subject is presbyters), but those persons too share in this office (officium) and are bound by the duty to proclaim the gospel of God.

The canon is based on Lumen gentium 28 and 29, Christus Dominus 30, Presbyterorum ordinis 4, and canon 1327, §2 of the 1917 code. Canons 528, §1, 771, 773, and 794, §2 also speak of duties related to the ministry of the word.

The comparable canon (CCEO 608) in the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches makes it clear that for all three orders, bishops, presbyters and deacons, the ministry of the word of God is their first and foremost duty (primum munus).

Roles of Religious Women and Men

Canon 758 — By virtue of their consecration to God, members of institutes of consecrated life give witness to the gospel in a special way and the bishop appropriately calls upon them as a help in proclaiming the gospel.

Members of religious communities, individually and through the institutions they have sponsored, have made incalculable contributions to the ministry of God's holy word throughout history. Their dedication to teaching, missionary activity, catechetical formation, preaching, higher education, seminary instruction, research, and publication is a precious legacy and a continuing blessing for the people of God. The mention of community "family names" evokes the dimensions of their gifts: the ancient monastic groups (like the Benedictines), the medieval mendicant orders (Franciscan, Dominican, Carmelite, Augustinian), and more modern congregations and societies of apostolic life (Jesuits, Sisters of Mercy, Sisters of Charity, Redemptorists, Paulists).

This canon recognizes and promotes two distinct contributions which religious women and men make: (1) their lives witness to the gospel in a special way, and (2) they are enlisted to assist in the public proclamation of the gospel. Religious carry out both categories of activity in virtue of their consecration to God through their religious vows. This is in addition to their right and duty to share in the ministry of the word as lay persons or as sacred ministers.

The canon has both ancient and modern roots. The language used to describe the assistance which religious offer in proclaiming the gospel is drawn from the Fourth Lateran Council (a. 1215), and was echoed in the Council of Trent (a. 1563) as well as in the 1917 code (CIC 1327, §2). (However, those sources spoke only of men, viri idonei.) The teaching about the gospel witness of religious life comes directly from Lumen gentium 44.

Canons 591, 678, 680, as well as Perfectae caritatis 8–11 and Mutuae relationes 4 should be read in conjunction with this canon.

Roles of Lay Women and Men

Canon 759 — By virtue of baptism and confirmation, lay members of the Christian faithful are witnesses of the gospel message by word and the example of a Christian life; they can also be called upon to cooperate with the bishop and presbyters in the exercise of the ministry of the word.

> Lay people have their office and right to the apostolate from their union with Christ their head. They are brought into the mystical body of Christ by baptism, strengthened by the power of the Spirit in confirmation, and assigned (deputantur) to apostolic work by the Lord himself. (AA 3)

This canon is another expression of the full participation of the laity in the life and mission of the Church. Here it is in the area of the Church's continuation of Christ's prophetic role, the proclamation of the gospel. The canon expresses two quite distinct modes of lay activity: (1) the witness which lay persons give to the gospel message by their words and the example of their lives, and (2) their exercise of the ministry of the word.

The first of these has the larger scope: how Christian men and women embody their faith, hope, and love as they go about their family lives, their work, and their social and political involvements. They are empowered to do this effectively by their baptism and confirmation, by their ongoing nourishment at the tables of the word and Eucharist, and by the enlivening action of the Spirit.

Lay persons are radically enabled for the ministry of the word by the same forces. But now the element of being "called upon (vocari) to cooperate with the bishop and presbyters in the exercise of the ministry of the word" is introduced as an indication of the need for regulation and control of the Church's public ministry. In other words, someone needs to make judgments about the suitability of those who minister in the name of the Church.

The 1990 Eastern code expresses the lay role more clearly, but also more restrictively: the faithful are to take part willingly in this ministry, according to each one's aptitude, state of life, and received mandate (CCEO 608).

The conciliar sources for this canon (LG 33, 35, AA 3, 6, 10, 25, and AG 41) shed great light on it, and these canons should be read along with it: 204, 211, 225–231, and 766.

Purpose and Sources of the Ministry of the Word

Canon 760 — The mystery of Christ is to be set forth completely and faithfully in the ministry of the word, which must be based upon sacred scripture, tradition, liturgy, the magisterium, and the life of the Church.

This terse canon asserts the central goal and chief resources of the Church's ministry of the divine word. It gives a sense of focus, but it is so generic as to be unhelpful. It was omitted from the 1990 Eastern code.

The canon is based on two passages from the Decree on the Pastoral Office of Bishops (nos. 12 and 14) which describe the teaching responsibilities of bishops.

The "mystery of Christ" is a summary expression for the whole of salvation history of which Jesus Christ is the center. It does not imply a Christocentrism which downplays the roles of Father or Holy Spirit, or the responses of redeemed humankind.

To propound the Christian mystery "completely and faithfully" means to do so in a balanced and full manner, with regard for the "hierarchy of truths" (UR 11), and without distortion, exaggeration, or diminution. (For example, no minister of the word should fixate on a single moral or social teaching or one particular devotion to the neglect of the entire gospel message.)

The list of five sources or grounds upon which the ministry should be based is borrowed from the guidelines on catechetical instruction: the scriptures, tradition, liturgy, official teaching authority, and the life of the Church (which presumably includes the Code of Canon Law). The list is neither restrictive nor exhaustive; the canon simply suggests broad categories of reliable resources for the ministry.

Means for Carrying Out the Ministry

Canon 761 — The various means available are to be used to proclaim Christian doctrine: first of all preaching and catechetical instruction, which always hold the principal place, but also the presentation of doctrine in schools, academies, conferences, and meetings of every type and its diffusion through public declarations in the press or in other instruments of social communication by legitimate authority on the occasion of certain events.

The canon basically encourages the use of whatever means are available to proclaim the good news of Jesus Christ, but adds: never overlook preaching and catechesis.

The canon is an almost verbatim transposition from the Decree on the Pastoral Office of Bishops (CD 13). Transposed in this way, it does not provide useful guidance for the ministry. A clear list of recommended means of evangelization and catechesis, as provided in canons 777 and 1063, would have been more effective.

This canon was not included in the Eastern code.

The expression "Christian doctrine" is here suddenly substituted for "divine word," "gospel of God," and "gospel message," which were used in the other canons of this section. But the switch in terms has no significance; it is simply the language of Christus Dominus 13.

The insertion of the words "by legitimate authority" in reference to public declarations in the media (the words did not appear in CD 13) calls to mind the possible misunderstandings which can result from privately held media outlets which present themselves as authentically Catholic.

The canon emphasizes the importance of the two forms of the ministry of the word which are the subjects of the two chapters which follow, the preaching of the word and catechetical formation.

CHAPTER I
THE PREACHING OF THE WORD OF GOD
[cc. 762–772]

Preaching is the proclamation of the good news of salvation. It is the spoken announcement of the saving message of God carried on in the Holy Spirit. For Christians, Jesus Christ himself, the Word incarnate, epitomizes that message. The whole Christian community is engaged in retelling the story of Jesus. The purpose of preaching is to arouse the response of faith and conversion of life.

The Church's primary concern is that the word of God be preached and preached effectively. Important but secondary concerns revolve around questions regarding who does the preaching, in what contexts and circumstances, and with whose authorization.

Preaching as a Ministerial Priority

Canon 762 — Sacred ministers, among whose principal duties is the proclamation of the gospel of God to all, are to hold the function of preaching in esteem since the people of God are first brought together by the word of the living God, which it is certainly right to require from the mouth of priests.

The Church, which is made up of local communities of believers, is called together, formed, and built up by the preaching of the word of the living God. Because preaching is so vital to the health and growth of the people of God, it is preeminent among the forms of the ministry of the word. The unmistakable point of this canon is to emphasize the priority of preaching.

This claim about the effect of the preaching of the word of God on the Church is neither an empty platitude nor a mere abstraction. It is a verifiable reality. Local churches thrive on good, authentic preaching, and where the ministry of the word amounts to thin gruel, the local congregation becomes anemic and emaciated.

> There is such force and power in the word of God that it stands as the church's support and strength, affording her children sturdiness in faith, food for the soul, and an unfailing fount of spiritual life. (DV 21)

The subject of the canon is sacred ministers, that is, bishops, presbyters, and deacons. Proclaiming the gospel is their number-one priority and privilege. This does not mean that it is their exclusive prerogative. All the baptized who are in communion and possess the Spirit participate in the ministry of the word (cf. cc. 211, 225, §1, and 759), and now they have an explicitly acknowledged share in the preaching ministry (cc. 230, 766).

Even more important than the laity's rightful role in preaching is the right of everyone in the Church to hear God's holy word. This very basic right is clearly stated in canon 213. It is the correlative claim to this statement of ministerial priority.

The rhetorical insertion into the canon of words from the prophet Malachi about requiring "the word from the mouth of priests" (ex ore sacerdotum) should not mislead. The canon refers to the ministry of all the ordained, not only presbyters. Malachi spoke, of course, about the levitical priesthood of the Old Testament, and, in fact, found fault with their performance of the ministry of God's word (see Mal 2:1–9).

The sources for this canon are the rich teachings of the Second Vatican Council, namely Lumen gentium 25 and Presbyterorum ordinis 4. Canons 386, §1, 528, §1, 836, and 1008 should also be consulted.

The canon does not have a counterpart in the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches.

Bishops Can Preach Everywhere

Canon 763 — Bishops have the right to preach the word of God everywhere, including in churches and oratories of religious institutes of pontifical right, unless the local bishop has expressly forbidden it in particular cases.

All bishops, whether diocesan ordinaries, auxiliaries, or even retired, have the right to preach the word of God anywhere in the world. The canon thus recognizes that a bishop's right and duty to preach is based on sacramental ordination and communion (rather than on his jurisdiction or missio canonica), and that every bishop, as a member of the college of bishops, shares a responsibility for proclaiming the gospel in the Church universal (see LG 21, 24–25, CD 3–4, and c. 756, §1).

The bishop's prerogative extends to preaching in the churches and chapels of religious institutes, which is normally subject to authorization by the superior of the community (c. 765).

A bishop can be forbidden by the local diocesan bishop to exercise this right to preach within his diocese, but only in particular instances and for a serious reason, for example, that the bishop is known to be preaching error or folly. This provision recognizes that the diocesan bishop is the moderator of the ministry of the word in the church entrusted to him (c. 756, §2).

Diocesan bishops have the personal duty to preach frequently to their own people (c. 386, §1).

Presbyters and Deacons Can Preach Everywhere

Canon 764 — Without prejudice to the prescript of can. 765, presbyters and deacons possess the faculty of preaching everywhere; this faculty is to be exercised with at least the presumed consent of the rector of the church, unless the competent ordinary has restricted or taken away the faculty or particular law requires express permission.

With this canon the Church grants the faculty to all those ordained to the presbyterate or diaconate to preach anywhere in the world. The faculty is given on the basis of their sacramental ordination and their ongoing communion, not because of an office they possess or of a canonical mission they have been given. It applies to diocesan and religious clergy.

The Second Vatican Council taught that all sacred ministers, bishops, presbyters, and deacons share in the teaching mission of the Church and preach the gospel by virtue of their sacramental ordination (LG 28–29, CD 28, PO 4). This is in addition to their rightful role in the prophetic office of Christ that stems from their full incorporation into the Church, a role which they share with lay persons.

Presbyters and deacons do not share the same responsibility that the bishops have for the proclamation of the gospel to the whole Church (c. 756, §1), but they are co-workers (cooperatores) with their bishop in the diocese, and they are required to maintain communion with their bishop as well as with the presbyterate and diaconate in that diocese (as is implied in c. 757). The faculty to preach is not a personal privilege to be exercised in isolation from the ecclesial community.

Practical questions sometimes arise about the aptitude and actual ability to preach on the part of some of the ordained. Have they been adequately prepared for this esteemed ministry? Have they studied the scriptures and the tradition of the Church? Have they been trained in public speaking? Even if once able, are they still capable of preaching effectively?

Because the Church must be able to regulate the exercise of its ministry of preaching, the canon provides for four sources of limitations or restrictions on the faculty of presbyters and deacons to preach:

(1) A competent ordinary can restrict or remove the faculty. The "competent ordinary" includes the ordinary of the place where the presbyter or deacon is incardinated, the major religious superior of the institute to which he belongs, or the ordinary of the place where the presbyter or deacon resides or intends to preach. The restriction or withdrawal of the faculty can be temporary or permanent, partial or total. The action should be expressed in writing and should include the precise terms and conditions of the limitation as well as the reasons for it. Such action should not be taken without hearing the person whose faculty is being restricted (cf. c. 50). Any restriction of an ordained minister's faculty to preach is a serious matter, and as such requires serious reasons.

(2) Particular legislation may require a permission (licentia) to preach in addition to the faculty related to ordination. A bishops' conference, religious chapter, provincial council, or diocesan bishop (cf. c. 772, §1) could make rules requiring certain levels of preparation or qualification for this permission to preach.

(3) The person in charge (rector) of the local church, whose consent is required for a person to preach there, may refuse that consent. Pastors, chaplains, moderators of team ministry, and those entrusted with the pastoral care of parishes (c. 517, §2) all have a responsibility to see that the word of God is proclaimed to the people with integrity (c. 528, §1). Consequently, they have some authority over whoever preaches to their communities. The consent of those in charge, which presbyters or deacons may presume, may also be refused for a serious reason. (See also c. 561.)

(4) Religious superiors may refuse permission (licentia) for a presbyter or deacon to preach to their community in their own churches or chapels (c. 765). Again, this is a serious matter, and should be done only for serious reasons.

The central thrust of this canon is to enable and facilitate the preaching of God's holy word. Its limiting provisions are means to assure the quality of that preaching, not to impede or suppress it.

The canons use several different terms to express authorization to preach: a right (ius) of bishops, faculty (facultas) of presbyters and deacons, permission (licentia) given by rule-making authorities or religious superiors, consent (consensus) given by those in charge of local churches, permission (admitti possunt) for lay persons called upon to preach. Not too much should be made of these distinctions. They are simply positive canonical terms used in an effort to promote the effective preaching of the gospel while safeguarding its integrity. They might be compared to differently shaped handles which can be grasped in order to remove pots and pans from the stove.

The 1990 Eastern code makes similar provisions for the preaching ministry in canons 610–613. It notes that recourse against decrees forbidding someone to preach are made in devolutivo (as CIC 1340, §3 also provided), meaning that the ban remains in effect while the matter is under recourse.

Preaching to Religious

Canon 765 — Preaching to religious in their churches or oratories requires the permission of the superior competent according to the norm of the constitutions.

The canon respects the legitimate autonomy of religious institutes (c. 586), and requires presbyters and deacons to have the permission of the religious superior to preach to the members of his or her community. It refers to all religious, clerical or lay, female or male, of diocesan or pontifical right. A bishop (c. 763) and the community's own chaplain (c. 566, §1) do not require this permission.

Lay Preaching

Canon 766 — Lay persons can be permitted to preach in a church or oratory, if necessity requires it in certain circumstances or it seems advantageous in particular cases, according to the prescripts of the conference of bishops and without prejudice to can. 767, §1.

This canon provides a broad warrant for lay preaching. Its positive stance recognizes the fundamental capacity and radical responsibility for preaching shared by all who are fully incorporated in the Church.

The Second Vatican Council repeatedly asserted the participation of all the Christian faithful in the prophetic office (munus propheticum) of Christ and of the Church by virtue of their Christian initiation, maintenance of communion, and possession of the Holy Spirit (see LG 12, 17, 31, 33, 35, DV 10, GS 41, AA 2, 3, 6, 10, 25). This active participation in proclaiming God's message emerged in the code in several places, namely, canons 204, 211, 225, 228–230, 759. This canon's empowerment of lay preaching is one more instance of the impact of this rich vein of conciliar teaching on church discipline.

The canon does not view lay preaching as a substitute for clerical ministry, nor does it require that other ministers be lacking. There is no reason to describe this lay ministerial role as exceptional, abnormal, or extraordinary (as at least one commentator and a recent document have done[13]). It is a fully legitimate lay function which has now become commonplace in the Catholic Church. The same language could have been used for the preaching ministry as was used in the canons on other forms of the teaching office, e.g., canon 774, §1, "solicitude for catechesis belongs to all members of the Church according to each one's role," or canon 784 for lay missionaries.

The term "lay persons" includes religious women and men, in other words, all those who are not ordained. No distinction is made between men and women. There is no specification regarding age or training, but the ability and preparation to preach must naturally be considered.

Preaching takes many forms (e.g., instructions, exhortations, devotional or doctrinal sermons, explanations of biblical texts, mission talks, sacramental preparations, etc.), both within and outside of liturgical settings. This canon states the general principle of admissibility of lay persons to preach, while drawing attention to the single limitation regarding the homily stated in the following canon.[14]

The phrase "in a church or oratory" draws attention to the public and official nature of the preaching. In other words, qualified lay persons may be called upon to preach wherever preaching takes place.

The expression "can be permitted" (admitti possunt) implies that someone's permission is required. However, it does not imply the need for a canonical mission or mandate (see AA 24; CCEO 610, §4, by contrast, does call for a mandate for laity to preach). The permission or consent to preach could be presumed or implicit in an appointment to pastoral office, or it can be explicitly granted, for a given event, for a period of time, or permanently.

The diocesan bishop can give permission for lay persons to preach; he is the moderator of the [13] E.g., E. Tejero, Pamplona ComEng, 504. The instruction, "Some Questions Regarding Collaboration of Nonordained Faithful in Priests' Sacred Ministry," issued by the CFC (and signed by seven other curial offices) on August 15, 1997 (AAS 89 [1997] 852–877; Origins 27:24 [November 27, 1997] 397–409), also uses the unfortunate language of the "exceptional nature of such cases" (art. 2, n. 3).

[14] See the "Directory for Sunday Celebrations in the Absence of a Priest," CDWDS, June 2, 1988, Origins 18:19 (October 20, 1988) 301–307, and see art. 3 of the August 15, 1997, instruction mentioned in note 13, above.

ministry of the word in the diocese (c. 756, §2). However, pastors and others who are in charge of "churches or oratories" can also do so; they consent to the preaching of presbyters and deacons (c. 764), they are obliged to see that homilies are preached (c. 767, §4), and they have the responsibility to see that the word of God is proclaimed to the people (c. 528, §1). The religious superior named in canon 765 could permit a qualified lay person to preach to the members of the community. (Pastors, others in charge of churches or oratories, and religious superiors could have their ability to authorize lay preachers limited by diocesan or conference-wide regulations.)

The phrase "if necessity requires" implies circumstances when, for example, a parish or other local congregation has been entrusted to the pastoral care of a lay person or when no presbyters or deacons are available[15] or able to preach, e.g., because of language deficiency, inability to communicate with children, physical disability, or weariness at the end of a long weekend of ministry.

"If . . . it seems advantageous in particular cases" means simply that it seems useful or helpful for the people on this occasion to have a qualified lay person preach, e.g., a mother on Mother's Day, a visiting missionary, a representative of a social or educational apostolate.[16]

Diocesan bishops may issue norms or guidelines for preaching by lay persons and ordained persons for their diocesan churches (c. 756, §2, 772, §1), and many have done so. However, this canon assumes that each bishops' conference will draw up its own "prescripts." Many conferences have done so.[17] The bishops of the United States approved a set of "Guidelines for Lay Preaching" in November, 1988,[18] but they were not approved by the Holy See because they were not enacted as obligatory. Another set was formulated, but it failed to get the two-thirds vote required for passage in the conference. This delay may actually have been helpful. The agreed-upon guidelines were made publicly available to assist those seeking guidance, and moreover some of the "prescripts" passed by other conferences appear unduly restrictive, e.g., requiring annual deputation of lay preachers by the diocesan bishop. The extensive and positive experience of lay preaching in North America is creating a favorable climate which should make the eventual "prescripts" more realistic.

The quality and effectiveness of preaching is a central issue, whether performed by ordained or lay persons. The ministry is demanding and difficult. It requires thorough learning, especially in scripture and theology, Christian maturity and experience, communication and language skills, familiarity with the community, imagination, and time to prepare well. The word of God is living and powerful, and the Holy Spirit will stir the hearts of its hearers, but the preacher must work hard, using every talent and resource, to make the experience of the "preaching moment" effective.

The Homily

Canon 767 — §1. Among the forms of preaching, the homily, which is part of the liturgy itself and is reserved to a priest or deacon, is preeminent; in the homily the mysteries of faith and the norms of Christian life are to be explained from the sacred text during the course of the liturgical year.

§2. A homily must be given at all Masses on Sundays and holy days of obligation which are celebrated with a congregation, and it cannot be omitted except for a grave cause.

§3. It is strongly recommended that if there is a sufficient congregation, a homily is to be given

[15] "In some areas, circumstances can arise in which a shortage of sacred ministers and permanent, objectively verifiable situations of need or advantage exist that would recommend the admission of the nonordained faithful to preaching." August 15, 1997, instruction from the CFC et al., art. 2, n. 4.

[16] The first and obvious meaning of utilitas in the canon is "useful"; there is no reason to render it in English as "advantageous."

[17] See LCE at c. 766 or Pamplona ComEng, Appendix III.

[18] Origins 18:25 (December 1, 1988) 402–404.

even at Masses celebrated during the week, especially during the time of Advent and Lent or on the occasion of some feast day or a sorrowful event.

§4. It is for the pastor or rector of a church to take care that these prescripts are observed conscientiously.

The canon strongly asserts the eminent position of the homily among all other forms of preaching of God's word, and provides for its inclusion within virtually all public celebrations of Mass.

A homily is here described as the exposition of "the mysteries of faith and the norms of Christian life" from the sacred scriptures throughout the Church's liturgical cycle. This description is from the Vatican Council's Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (SC 52). A more complete description, given in a document implementing the constitution, includes the context of the celebration and needs of the congregation which hears the homily (IO 54). The excellent instruction issued by the U.S. bishops' conference, Fulfilled in Your Hearing: The Homily in the Sunday Assembly (1982), offers a fuller vision of the homiletic experience as a mutually interpretative event. The homilist is a mediator of meaning who enables the community to recognize God's active presence and to respond with more gospel-like lives.

The canon refers to homilies presented within eucharistic liturgies. This is clear from the text and its sources (see CLSA Com 553). This means that homilies in other liturgical contexts are not reserved to presbyters and deacons, at least not in virtue of this canon.

The reservation of the homily at Mass to priests and deacons has occasioned considerable discussion in the years since the code.[19] Because the homily is an integral part of the liturgical action, it is more than fitting that it should be preached by the one leading that celebration. The unity between word and sacrament is more clearly seen that way. The identity of chief celebrant and homilist is a liturgical norm and preference. Still, liturgical regulations permit exceptions, e.g., another priest or deacon (GIRM 42), or a lay person at Masses for children (DMC 24).

This reservation was further emphasized by a one-word negative response, given without explanation in 1987 by the Pontifical Commission for the Authentic Interpretation of the Code, to the question, "Whether the diocesan bishop can dispense from the norm of canon 767, §1, which reserves the homily to a priest or deacon?"[20] Normally a diocesan bishop can dispense from a disciplinary law for the spiritual good of his people, and this is a disciplinary law. Hence, the interpretation is enigmatic as well as laconic.

Some canonists (e.g., Provost, Huels, Fox, Fuentes[21]) argue that the canon is a constitutive law (one which contains the essential components of an institute), and thus is beyond the bishop's dispensing power for that reason (c. 86). They say that is what is implied in the commission's response. They allege, in other words, that the reservation to a priest or deacon is of the essence of a homily; if anyone else delivers it, it simply is not a homily, no matter the context or content. Call it an exhortation, a reflection, an explanation of the biblical text, and lay persons can be admitted to deliver it.

This opinion is unpersuasive and unlikely. It descends into sheer nominalism (i.e., the nature of a thing depends on what it is called). It would mean that lay persons could be invited to give homilies at the Eucharist at any time, as long as they were not called homilies. This kind of "semantic legerdemain" is probably not what the commission had in mind. Other indications that this is a purely disciplinary reservation and not a declaration of a constitutive law are the following: none of the source documents (e.g., SC, IO, GIRM, etc.) define the homily in terms of who preaches it; the canons of the code are not nor-[19] See, for example, art. 3 of the August 15, 1997, instruction of the CFC referred to in note 13, above.

[20] AAS 79 (1987) 1249.

[21] The works in which their opinions are expressed are cited in the bibliography at the end of Book III.

mally where liturgical rites are defined (c. 2); and in the 1990 Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches the reservation of the homily to priests or deacons is clearly separated from the description of the homily (CCEO 614, §1 and §4).[22]

The commission's restrictive response, denying the bishop's ability to dispense, was simply its way of reserving the dispensation to the Apostolic See (c. 87, §1; Urrutia and Wrenn share this opinion[23]), without giving any reason for it.

The reservation of the homily at the Eucharist to priests and deacons is a general rule which admits of exceptions. The bishop is one; surely bishops can give homilies! (Actually, the Latin word used in this canon for priests, sacerdotes, includes bishops.) Another exception, at Masses for children, was mentioned above. When the presider cannot speak, or speak adequately, the language of the assembled people, it is an obvious case of necessity. Infirmity, exhaustion, and old age on the part of the presiding priest can be other excusing causes for inviting some other qualified and prepared person to deliver the homily.

The rule that the liturgical president preaches the homily at Mass is a good one and is to be observed when reasonably possible (PO 4). However, as with other disciplinary norms, there is room for the application of pastoral discretion. Two criteria are suggested by the previous canon: "if necessity requires it in certain circumstances or it seems advantageous in particular cases." An occasional exception for good reasons does not constitute a violation for one who usually observes the rule conscientiously, i.e., the principle of substantial observance can be applied.

One must not lose sight of the primary value in all of this: the word of God must be preached to the people of God. It is the right of the people and the first duty of those ordained to serve them (cc. 213, 757, 762).

The second paragraph of the canon, taken from Sacrosanctum Concilium 52, is a strong reminder that a homily is to be preached at all Sunday and holy day Masses. It would be preferable to have a qualified preacher other than the presiding presbyter give the homily rather than to omit it.

The third paragraph (based on SC 42) urges that homilies be preached at all Masses celebrated with people present, and singles out some especially appropriate occasions.

The final paragraph assigns responsibility for seeing to it that homilies are presented. It rests with the one in charge of the local church, that is, the pastor, rector, chaplain, or one entrusted with pastoral care of a parish (c. 517, §2; see c. 528, §1 for the pastoral priority).

The Content of Preaching

Canon 768 — §1. Those who proclaim the divine word are to propose first of all to the Christian faithful those things which one must believe and do for the glory of God and the salvation of humanity.

§2. They are also to impart to the faithful the doctrine which the magisterium of the Church sets forth concerning the dignity and freedom of the human person, the unity and stability of the family and its duties, the obligations which people have from being joined together in society, and the ordering of temporal affairs according to the plan established by God.

Canon 760 outlined the chief sources for the ministry of the word. Canon 768 presents, in two [22] The (now named) Council on Interpretation of Legal Texts was a signatory to the August 15, 1997, instruction of the CFC (cited above in note 9). This was an obvious opportunity to clarify the reason for their 1987 decision. The instruction states that "the diocesan bishop cannot dispense from the canonical norm since this is not merely a disciplinary law but one which touches upon the closely connected functions of teaching and sanctifying" (art. 3, n. 1). This reasoning either rewrites or dismisses canon 87; it invents a new category of non-dispensable laws, i.e., more than disciplinary but less than constitutive.

[23] Their works can be found in the bibliography at the end of Book III.

paragraphs, a very brief synopsis of the content of Christian preaching.

The first paragraph, which is a revision of canon 1347, §1 of the 1917 code, is stated in sweeping generality with classic terseness and symmetry: proclaim what must be believed and done for the glory of God and the salvation of humankind. Preaching is to be salvific, not merely instructional.

The second paragraph, more prolix, focuses on the presentation of the Church's social teaching. It is derived from Christus Dominus 12 and Gaudium et spes 40–42, and those key sources should be consulted for a fuller context and more detailed description of this vital task.

Canon 616 of the Eastern code contains an improved summary of this same content.

Adapting Preaching to the Assembly

Canon 769 — Christian doctrine is to be set forth in a way accommodated to the condition of the listeners and in a manner adapted to the needs of the times.

The ministry of preaching must be attuned to its audiences. Abstract and generic "religionspeak" simply does not communicate. The language and idiom of the people, their culture and economic condition, their social and political setting, the present situation in this neighborhood—these factors must be among the preacher's first concerns.

This canon's admonition to accommodate the message to the hearers and the times may be self-evident. (Indeed it was not included in the Eastern code.) However, the sources, Christus Dominus 13, Presbyterorum ordinis 4, and Gaudium et spes 4, are eloquent in their concern for the concrete human condition and the need to speak to the actual needs, anxieties, and problems of the community. To this end the preacher must seek and promote dialogue with those among whom he or she lives (CD 13; the canon's use of the expression "Christian doctrine" is drawn from this same source). Canon 248 also speaks of the need for ministers to be able to announce the gospel to the people of their own time and in a manner suited to their understanding.

Special Forms of Preaching

Canon 770 — At certain times according to the prescripts of the diocesan bishop, pastors are to arrange for those types of preaching which are called spiritual exercises and sacred missions or for other forms of preaching adapted to needs.

The routines of human life need occasional variation. The "Sunday after Sunday" pattern of homilies needs to be supplemented sometimes by "special events" related to the ministry of the word. This canon suggests a pair of "old favorites," parish retreats and missions, but it really is a reminder to provide special types of preaching or parish renewal in response to local needs. Scripture discussion groups may be a more effective means than formal preaching events, but the two are not mutually exclusive.

Pastors of parishes and others in charge of local congregations are to see that it happens in their churches; the diocesan bishop is to issue directives about it, if that seems advisable.

Outreach

Canon 771 — §1. Pastors of souls, especially bishops and pastors, are to be concerned that the word of God is also proclaimed to those of the faithful who because of the condition of their life do not have sufficient common and ordinary pastoral care or lack it completely.

§2. They are also to make provision that the message of the gospel reaches non-believers living in the territory since the care of souls must also extend to them no less than to the faithful.

Here and elsewhere in the code (e.g., cc. 383, 528–529) pastoral care-givers and bishops are reminded of their responsibility for "the others," those Catholics who are not in church on Sunday, and those in their areas who are not believers. Reaching out to these diverse groups with God's word of life is not easy, but it is a high-priority duty for local congregations as well as their leaders.

The first paragraph envisions groups like migrants, exiles, refugees, travelers, vacationers, handicapped, disabled, military personnel, prisoners, nursing home patients, and those confined to their own homes. Bringing the good news of salvation to persons in such diverse circumstances is a challenge for local churches. Modern media of communications, e.g., telephone, radio, television, film, cassettes, Internet connections, compact disks, and the wide range of print media, all need to be used. But the organized ministry of one-on-one personal visitors may be even more effective and rewarding. The sources for this section are Christus Dominus 18 and Evangelii nuntiandi 52 and 56.

The second paragraph of the canon is a reminder that outreach to non-believers and the unchurched is also a serious pastoral concern. Evangelization is not just for "the young churches" in what are regarded as "mission lands." It is a mandate for all churches. A rich theological and pastoral context for this task can be found in the documents on which it is based: Sacrosanctum Concilium 9, Lumen gentium 16, Christus Dominus 13, Ad gentes 10 and 20, Evangelii nuntiandi 55 and 58.

The Apostle Paul's piercing questions still challenge our churches:

> How can they believe in him of whom they have not heard? And how can they hear without someone to preach? And how can people preach unless they are sent? As it is written, "How beautiful are the feet of those who bring the good news!" (Rom 10:14–15)

Norms for the Ministry of Preaching

Canon 772 — §1. In the exercise of preaching, moreover, all are to observe the norms issued by the diocesan bishop.

§2. In giving a radio or television talk on Christian doctrine, the prescripts established by the conference of bishops are to be observed.

Paragraph one reminds everyone that if the diocesan bishop issues norms for preaching within the diocesan church, they oblige everyone: presbyters, deacons, religious, and laity. The bishop as moderator of the ministry of the word has the authority to do so (cc. 756, §2, 386, §1, 392, §2). Since the preaching agenda is largely determined by the Lectionary and the lives of the people, one might think no other norms are needed. However, the preparations and qualifications for preachers, their continuing education, and their systematic evaluation are important matters, and some bishops have articulated such standards for their churches.

The second paragraph recognizes that radio and television broadcast across diocesan boundaries, that they have an immense influence, and that special talent and training are needed for effective ministry in these media. Hence, the canon suggests that the national bishops' conference can issue obligatory norms on such media presentations on "Christian doctrine." Several bishops' conferences have done so;[24] in 1984 the U.S. bishops said, "Until a study is completed, the NCCB authorizes diocesan bishops to establish guidelines for expounding Christian doctrine on radio and TV programs for their own dioceses."[25]

Two important instructions on mass media have been issued since the Second Vatican Council by what is now called the Pontifical Commission for Social Communications, Communio et progressio[26] and Aetatis novae.[27] Both provide valuable guidance.

[24] See Pamplona ComEng, Appendix III, or LCE at c. 772.

[25] NCCB Complimentary Norms (Washington, D.C.: NCCB, 1991) 7.

[26] May 23, 1971, AAS 63 (1971) 593–656; Catholic Mind 69 (Oct., 1971) 22–61.

[27] February 20, 1992, AAS 84 (1992) 447–468; Origins 21 (1992) 659–677.

CHAPTER II
CATECHETICAL INSTRUCTION
[cc. 773–780]

Catechetics, the other paramount form of the ministry of the divine word along with preaching, is the subject of this chapter.

Catechesis is that form of the ministry of the word which is directed to those who have heard the gospel message and responded in faith. It looks to making that faith living, explicit, and operative. Catechesis includes both the teaching of Christian doctrine in an organic and systematic way and the experience of Christian living; the desired result is an initiation into the fullness of Christian life. It is aimed at the faithful of all ages, from very young children to adults well on in years.

This ministry, like that of preaching, is one in which the teaching and sanctifying functions of the Church are joined.

> Catechetical formation . . . illuminates and strengthens faith, nourishes a life in harmony with the spirit of Christ, leads to a conscious and active participation in the liturgical mystery, and prompts to apostolic action. (GE 4)

The Church has issued several major documents since the Second Vatican Council which have helped to promote and shape this ministry, e.g., the General Catechetical Directory (1971), the apostolic exhortations Evangelization in the Modern World (1975) and Catechesis in Our Time (1979), the Catechism of the Catholic Church (1992), and the General Directory for Catechesis (1997). The NCCB published a national catechetical directory in 1979, Sharing the Light of Faith. These documents should be consulted, in conjunction with the following canons, for a more complete and accurate vision of the ministry.

The Catechism of the Catholic Church came, not as a result of any call from the council, but from a recommendation of the 1985 synod of bishops. It is intended as a "reference text" which bishops and publishers can use when writing local and regional catechisms. Pope John Paul II described it as "a statement of the Church's faith and of Catholic doctrine" and "a sure norm for teaching the faith."[28] It has no special canonical or doctrinal significance, that is, its use is not obligatory and it does not change the hierarchy of truths or level of certainty of Catholic teachings.

The General Catechetical Directory of 1971 was revised and updated, and it was issued by the Congregation of the Clergy on September 18, 1997, as the General Directory for Catechesis. This Directory is intended as a normative orientation, guide, and support for the evangelization efforts of the particular churches.

The 1990 Eastern code (CCEO 617–630) treats catechetical formation more fully and with some interestingly different provisions than these present canons.

Pastoral Responsibility

Canon 773 — It is a proper and grave duty especially of pastors of souls to take care of the catechesis of the Christian people so that the living faith of the faithful becomes manifest and active through doctrinal instruction and the experience of Christian life.

This initial canon makes it crystal clear that pastoral leaders, the bishop in the diocese and the pastor (or others to whom the care of local churches is entrusted) in the parish, have a grave duty to provide catechetical formation for their people. Everyone in the community has a role to play, but the "pastors of souls" must see that the job gets done. It is one of their most serious responsibilities. Canons 386, §1, 528, §1, and 843, §2 reiterate this obligation of bishops and pastors.

The canon is drawn from canon 1329 of the 1917 code, Christus Dominus 14, Gravissimum educationis 4, and Catechesi tradendae 1, 14–16, 24, 62–64; they provide powerful motivation and background for its provisions.

[28] Apconst Fidei depositum 3, October 11, 1992, AAS 86 (1992) 113–118; Origins 22:31 (January 14, 1993) 525–529.

The wording of the canon itself adds a valuable dimension to its conciliar sources. The goal of catechesis is that the living faith of the Christian faithful become "manifest and active," a real guiding force in their lives. The catechetical process accomplishes this end by means of "the experience of Christian life" as well as by doctrinal formation. This experiential learning comes from living and interacting with other committed Christians in family, neighborhood, school, and local church; it is powerfully formative, a paramount catechetical influence. Liturgical catechesis is an integral part of this ongoing formation in Christ.

Canon 617 of the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches focuses the catechetical task on the formation of the Christian disciple and a deepening of the commitment to the person of Christ.

A Concern of All Members of the Church, Especially Parents

Canon 774 — §1. Under the direction of legitimate ecclesiastical authority, solicitude for catechesis belongs to all members of the Church according to each one's role.

§2. Parents above others are obliged to form their children by word and example in faith and in the practice of Christian life; sponsors and those who take the place of parents are bound by an equal obligation.

Every member of the Christian community shares responsibility for the catechetical endeavor; it is vital to the health and vigor of the local church as well as the diocesan and universal churches. All the faithful participate in the prophetic function of Christ and his Church, of which catechesis is a major element (LG 12, 35, AA 10, CT 16, 63–70; cc. 211, 225, §1, 759).

Parents have the primary responsibility for the growth in faith and Christian life of those to whom they have given the gift of life. The canon emphasizes the priority of the parental role (prae ceteris), but it also adds that those who take the place of parents, like guardians, foster parents, or godparents, also share in this solemn duty.[29] Regarding the parental role, see also canons 226, §2, 776, 793, 851, §2, 872, 890, 914, 1136, 1366.

Facilitation of Catechetics and Catechisms

Canon 775 — §1. Having observed the prescripts issued by the Apostolic See, it is for the diocesan bishop to issue norms for catechetics, to make provision that suitable instruments of catechesis are available, even by preparing a catechism if it seems opportune, and to foster and coordinate catechetical endeavors.

§2. If it seems useful, it is for the conference of bishops to take care that catechisms are issued for its territory, with the previous approval of the Apostolic See.

§3. The conference of bishops can establish a catechetical office whose primary function is to assist individual dioceses in catechetical matters.

This canon details some of the responsibilities of diocesan bishops and bishops' conferences for the ministry of catechesis. It also asserts the controls over the ministry exercised by the Apostolic See.

The first paragraph lists three categories of duties or prerogatives of the diocesan bishop: (1) to manage or guide the ministry in the diocese by issuing regulations or guidelines, (2) to make catechetical materials and resources available for those performing the ministry, even to the extent of commissioning or writing a catechism, and (3) to promote and coordinate the catechetical enterprise in the diocese. These diverse activities are usually carried out by a diocesan office of religious education; they give vitally important assistance to Christian formation in the churches of the diocese. In all of this, the bishop is to observe the rules given by the Holy See.[30]

Diocesan bishops can approve for publication catechisms and other catechetical materials writ-

[29] Sources: LG 11, 35, GE 3, 6–8, AA 11, 30, GS 48, CT 16, 68.

[30] The Congregations of the Clergy and of the Doctrine of the Faith have competence (PB 94).

ten or published within their dioceses (c. 827, §1).

This first paragraph is based on the teachings of the Second Vatican Council and subsequent documents which provide very valuable background.[31]

The second paragraph grants to the national bishops' conferences the authority to issue catechisms for their entire territory (or territories, if several conferences were to do so jointly), if they think it would be useful. But if they do publish them, they must first obtain approval from the Holy See. This part of the canon comes from Catechesi tradendae 50 and the General Catechetical Directory 46, 119, 134.

The final paragraph simply suggests that episcopal conferences may set up catechetical offices to assist dioceses in the ministry of religious education (GCD 128).

The United States Catholic Conference has never published a national catechism nor has it established a national catechetical office, except for an office to promote the Catechism of the Catholic Church.

The counterpart canons in the Eastern code are 621 and 622.

Parish Catechetical Ministry

Canon 776 — By virtue of his function, a pastor is bound to take care of the catechetical formation of adults, youth, and children, to which purpose he is to use the help of the clerics attached to the parish, of members of institutes of consecrated life and of societies of apostolic life, taking into account the character of each institute, and of lay members of the Christian faithful, especially of catechists. None of these are to refuse to offer their help willingly unless they are legitimately impeded. The pastor is to promote and foster the function of parents in the family catechesis mentioned in can. 774, §2.

The canon specifies the responsibilities of pastors to lead the catechetical formation of the local church. This duty is one of the highest priorities of the pastoral office (cc. 528, §1, 761, 773). It pertains to pastors and others similarly situated, i.e., those entrusted with the pastoral leadership of local congregations (e.g., c. 517, §2). The canon challenges pastors to organize and coordinate the central ministry of religious education in their local church, or to assure its accomplishment by others, e.g., directors of religious education. (Such persons must be well prepared and justly remunerated; cf. c. 231.)

The canon names four categories of recipients of catechesis and three categories of persons to assist with the task.

The pastor is to provide for the religious formation of four groups: adults, young people, children, and parents who are responsible for their own "family catechesis." Each group has its special needs and requires a distinct catechetical approach (c. 777).

Three categories of "willing helpers" are suggested by the canon: (1) any and all bishops, presbyters, and deacons attached to the parish, (2) men and women religious, with due regard for the nature and mission of their communities, and (3) lay persons, especially trained catechists. So vital is this apostolate to the welfare of the local church that these persons should generously respond to the pastor's invitation to assist.[32]

Special Catechetical Needs

Canon 777 — Attentive to the norms established by the diocesan bishop, a pastor is to take care in a special way:

1° that suitable catechesis is imparted for the celebration of the sacraments;

2° that through catechetical instruction imparted for an appropriate period of time

[31] LG 25, 27, CD 2, 13–14, GE 2, GCD 106–109, 116–126, CT 63.

[32] The canon had precedents in the 1917 CIC, 1330–1334, but it is more proximately drawn from LG 28–29, CD 30, 35, PC 8, AA 3, 10, PO 4–9, EN 68–71, and CT 64–67. The corresponding canon in the Eastern code is 624.

children are prepared properly for the first reception of the sacraments of penance and the Most Holy Eucharist and for the sacrament of confirmation;

3° that having received first communion, these children are enriched more fully and deeply through catechetical formation;

4° that catechetical instruction is given also to those who are physically or mentally impeded, insofar as their condition permits;

5° that the faith of youth and adults is strengthened, enlightened, and developed through various means and endeavors.

The canon raises up several "catechetical moments" or groups with special formational needs, and states the pastor's duty to attend to them. The wording of the canon ("parochus curet" followed by a series of verbs in the passive voice) indicates that the pastor is to see that these things are done, not that he is required to do them all himself. The canon illustrates the close interrelation between the teaching and sanctifying offices in the Church; sacramental catechesis is one point at which the two coincide.

Five situations or categories of persons are mentioned.

(1) Catechesis for the celebration of the sacraments. The general principle of preparation for the sacraments is stated again in c. 843, §2. It encompasses all sorts of formative assistance, from a few words before Mass and again before Holy Communion each day to several months of preparation for the sacrament of matrimony (SC 14, GE 4, GCD 25, 56–59, CT 23).

(2) Preparation of children for first penance, first Communion, and confirmation. A suitable length of time should be devoted to catechetical formation before the first reception of these sacraments, surely a matter of weeks at least. Canons 913–914 and 890 reiterate the importance of this sacramental preparation (CD 30, GCD 79–81, 91, CT 37).

(3) Catechesis after the reception of first Communion. The formation of children in their faith must be fostered by all appropriate means after they have come to the eucharistic table of the Lord. Their religious development must continue alongside their growth and development as persons (see c. 795 as well as CT 38–40, 42, 45).

(4) Catechetical formation of the disabled or handicapped. Whether their disability, illness, or injury is mental or physical, and even though their numbers within the local church are few, the religious education of these members of the faithful must not be neglected. Obviously it will be adapted to their special situations (GCD 91, CT 41).

(5) Faith development of young people and adults. Adult religious education is of special importance because of the influence that mature Christians have on the entire local church. This category of pastoral action also includes matrimonial catechesis (cc. 1063–1064), which is a concern of the whole community (GCD 92–97, RCIA 19–20, 98–132, CT 39–45).

The Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches counterpart (CCEO 619) places the responsibility for catechetical formation on "the parish itself and every ecclesial community."

Catechesis in Institutions of Religious Women and Men

Canon 778 — Religious superiors and superiors of societies of apostolic life are to take care that catechetical instruction is imparted diligently in their churches, schools, and other works entrusted to them in any way.

Religious orders and congregations of men and women have distinguished themselves for the faith formation they have provided in their myriad institutions, e.g., grade and high schools, colleges, hospitals, parishes, missions, chapels, shrines, and information centers. This canon urges the superiors of those religious communities to see to it that such catechetical efforts are continued and fostered in every possible way. The focus here is on the institutional endeavors conducted by religious, rather than the personal assistance which their members often give to local churches (c. 776). The canon is based on Christus Dominus 35, Evangelii nuntiandi 69, and Catechesi tradendae 65.

Means of Catechetical Formation

Canon 779 — Catechetical instruction is to be given by using all helps, teaching aids, and instruments of social communication which seem more effective so that the faithful, in a manner adapted to their character, capabilities and age, and conditions of life, are able to learn Catholic doctrine more fully and put it into practice more suitably.

This canon echoes canon 761 by saying "use whatever means that are available to get the job done." There it was the more sweeping challenge of proclaiming the word of God; here it is the narrower yet huge task of the catechetical formation of the Christian faithful.

The stated goal is that the faithful learn Christian teaching and put it into practice. Whatever pedagogical methods or means of communication which are appropriate and effective should be utilized to accomplish that end, from good example to television programs, from catechisms to compact disks. The principle of adaptation must always be respected: the means are to be suited to the conditions of the readers, hearers, or viewers: their age, background, abilities, and social situation must always be factored in.[33]

Formation of Catechists

Canon 780 — Local ordinaries are to take care that catechists are duly prepared to fulfill their function properly, namely, that continuing formation is made available to them, that they understand the doctrine of the Church appropriately, and that they learn in theory and in practice the methods proper to the teaching disciplines.

This final canon draws attention to the need for initial and ongoing education for those who actually carry out the catechetical ministry. Local ordinaries (meaning vicars general and episcopal vicars in addition to diocesan bishops, c. 134) have the responsibility of seeing that this crucial level of formation is provided for their catechists. Both content and methods are included: knowledge of the Church's teaching as well as educational theory and practice.[34]

[33] Sources of the canon include IM 3, 6, 13–14, 17, CD 13–14, AG 26, GCD 116–124, EN 40, 45, CT 17, 22, 31, 46, 51, 55.

[34] The canon is drawn from CD 14, DV 25, AG 15, 17, GCD 108–115, EN 73, CT 15, 63, 66, 71.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bibliographical material for canons 747–780 can be found after the commentary on canon 833.

Title II
The Missionary Action of the Church
[cc. 781–792]

In the 1917 code, the norms regarding the missionary action of the Church were rather sparse and actually spread throughout that code, but a body of missionary law had been formed apart, especially through the so-called decennial missionary faculties and other sources. Many suggestions had been presented to the preparatory commission for Vatican Council II and eventually a tentative schema or draft on the missionary apostolate was drawn up. After many vicissitudes, eventually the decree Ad gentes, on the missionary activity of the Church, was duly promulgated on December 5, 1965, and brought into operation by Paul VI with the motu proprio Ecclesiae sanctae on August 6, 1966. In the aftermath of the council and the development of the missionary churches the present code in this section has happily brought together a number of important canonical principles governing the missionary action of the Church.

The canons in this title of the code are based not only on the long canonical tradition of the Church with regard to the missions but also on the conciliar documents, especially Lumen gentium and Ad gentes, as well as relevant papal and curial postconciliar documents.

A number of important documents have been issued since the promulgation of the code. They throw light, theological as well as ecclesial, on the missionary apostolate of the Church—especially the encyclical letter Redemptoris missio,[1] on the mission of Christ the redeemer and the permanent validity of the Church's missionary mandate, and the apostolic exhortation Ecclesia in Africa, on the Church in Africa and its evangelizing mission toward the year 2000,[2] both from John Paul II. The Catechism of the Catholic Church, published by order of John Paul II on October 11, 1992, has a section entitled "Mission—a requirement of the Church's catholicity" (nn. 849–856).

Canons 584–594 in the 1990 Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches, which correspond to canons 781–792 in the 1983 Code of Canon Law, are also of interest. In the first place, there is a special title XIV on "The Evangelization of Peoples," separate from the following title which deals with the magisterium. The canons themselves cover many of the matters dealt with in the 1983 code, but there are significant differences and even omissions, to some of which reference will be made in the appropriate place. The synod of bishops of the patriarchal churches or the council of hierarchs of the other sui iuris churches seem more involved than the conferences of bishops in the Latin church (CCEO 585, §2). However, it must be remembered that the Eastern code contains common norms for all the Eastern churches but each sui iuris church has also its own particular law.

All Share in Mission Activity

Canon 781 — Since the whole Church is by its nature missionary and the work of evangelization must be held as a fundamental duty of the people of God, all the Christian faithful, conscious of their responsibility, are to assume their part in missionary work.

Before leaving his eleven disciples, Christ gave them their mission: "Full authority has been given to me both in heaven and on earth; go, therefore, and make disciples of all the nations; baptize them 'in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit.' Teach them to carry out everything I have commanded you. And know that I am with you always until the end of the world" (Mt 28:18–20). This is the mandate which Christ left his Church; though it was given directly to the apostles, nevertheless it applies to the whole Church, which by its nature is missionary (AG 2), so that the work of evangelization is a basic duty of the people of God (AG 35). Not only is the universal Church missionary, but every particular church is also sent forth to the nations. The missionary mandate of the Church is not only as it were institutional or a matter for the Church's hierarchy and for those sent forth specifically "on the missions," but is personal "to all the Christian faithful who, conscious of their responsibility, are to assume their part in missionary work" (AG 35). What that part will be depends much on individual possibilities but certainly all are called upon to witness to the gospel and its values. In Redemptoris missio John Paul II notes that "the witness of a Christian life is the first and irreplaceable form of mission; Christ whose mission we continue is the 'witness' par excellence and the model of all Christian witness." The pope then goes on to detail means of witnessing in the Christian family, in the ecclesial community, and especially in concern for people, in charity towards the poor, the weak, and those who suffer (Redemptoris missio 42). The faithful may, indeed, also be called on to participate directly in missionary works of one kind or another or at least to help the work of the missions not only by their prayers but also by providing the necessary resources for the fulfilling of the missionary apostolate (cc. 791 and 1266).

[1] December 7, 1990, AAS 83 (1991) 249–340; Vatican English translation.

[2] September 9, 1995, AAS 88 (1996) 5–82; Vatican English translation.

Roles of Pope and Bishops in Mission Work

Canon 782 — §1. The Roman Pontiff and the college of bishops have the supreme direction and coordination of endeavors and actions which belong to missionary work and missionary cooperation.

§2. As sponsors of the universal Church and of all the churches, individual bishops are to have special solicitude for missionary work, especially by initiating, fostering, and sustaining missionary endeavors in their own particular Churches.

The Roman Pontiff, both personally and as the head of the college of bishops, has a very important role in proclaiming the gospel to the whole world, not only in teaching but also in his pastoral and missionary activities. The popes over the centuries have been very much aware of this and those especially of the present century have done much for the spread of the gospel message throughout the world.

Canon 1350 of the 1917 code, having said that local ordinaries and parish priests should regard non-Catholics residing in their territories as commended to their care in the Lord, then goes on in the second paragraph to assert that in other territories the entire care of the mission to non-Catholics is exclusively reserved to the Apostolic See. Vatican II in its constitution Lumen gentium determined that "the task of announcing the Gospel in the whole world belongs to the body of pastors (bishops) to whom, as a group, Christ gave a general injunction and imposed a general obligation, as Pope Celestine called to the attention of the Fathers of the Council of Ephesus. Consequently, the bishops, each for his own part, in as far as the due performance of their own duty permits, are obliged to enter into collaboration with one another and with Peter's successor, to whom in a special way the noble task of propagating the Christian name was entrusted" (LG 23). The decree Ad gentes likewise asserts that "all bishops, as members of the body of bishops which succeeds to the college of the Apostles, are consecrated not for one diocese alone, but for the salvation of the whole world" (AG 38). "Since the responsibility of preaching the Gospel throughout the whole world falls primarily on the body of bishops, then the synod of bishops . . . among matters of general importance, should pay special attention to missionary activity which is the greatest and holiest duty of the Church" (AG 29). In the different general assemblies of the synod of bishops the needs of the evangelization of peoples were many times expressed. The third general assembly in 1974 was devoted to the theme of evangelization in the modern world and resulted in the apostolic exhortation of Paul VI Evangelii nuntiandi. More recently the Holy Father has set about organizing special assemblies of the synod for different geographical areas of the Church. The Special Assembly for Africa was held in 1994 and the following year John Paul II published the previously mentioned apostolic exhortation Ecclesia in Africa, which is a rich mine of both mission theology and practice, attuned to the special needs of the particular churches in Africa. Special assemblies for the Americas (1997), Asia (1998), and Oceania (1998) have also taken place.

The pope exercises his function of direction and coordination of the missionary efforts of the Church with the aid especially of the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples, formerly known as the Congregation "De Propaganda Fide." Vatican II asked that "in a manner and according to norms which should be laid down by the pope, selected representatives of all those who are engaged in missionary work should have an active part in the direction of this congregation and also a deliberative vote: that is, bishops of the whole world, after consultation with episcopal conferences, and also the heads of institutes and pontifical agencies. These should all be called together at set times and, subject to the authority of the pope, should exercise supreme control over all missionary work."[3] The council also asked that the congregation "have a permanent body of consultors and experts" and that "institutes of religious women, regional missionary undertakings and lay organizations, especially those which are international, should be suitably represented."[4] Paul VI immediately implemented this decree of the council in his motu proprio Ecclesiae sanctae, laying down that "twelve Prelates from the missions; four from other regions; four Superiors of Institutes; four from the Pontifical Mission Societies be assigned to this Congregation to take part in the Plenary Sessions, with a deliberative vote." It also made provision for some others to be called with a consultative vote.[5] With the reorganization of the Roman Curia by John Paul II, the role of the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples remains paramount in the direction and coordination of the missionary apostolate but its function in other respects in missionary territories is somewhat diminished.[6]

The bishops individually are to have a special solicitude for missionary work, especially by initiating, sponsoring, and sustaining missionary endeavors in their own particular churches. As in the 1917 code, they must consider as commended to their apostolic zeal not only the brothers and sisters who are not in full communion with the Catholic Church, but also the non-baptized in their territories (c. 383, §§3–4). "Each Bishop too, as the Pastor of a particular Church, has a wide-ranging missionary duty. It falls to him as the ruler and center of unity in the diocesan apostolate, to promote missionary activity, to direct and coordinate it . . ."[7] These initiatives may indeed be diocesan, such as allowing some of his diocesan priests to undertake a Fidei donum[8] apostolate in a mission-field, or undertaking some work in favor of a missionary territory, "twinning" or other projects.[9] On the other hand, the initiatives or activities may be organized by other groups or individuals, in which case it pertains to the diocesan bishop, "not indeed to extinguish the Spirit,

[3] AG 29.

[4] Ibid.

[5] ES III, 15–16. An instruction was drawn up by the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith determining more fully the role of these newly associated members in the congregation and also of the consultors. This document, 2/26/1968, was not published in the AAS but can be found in X. Ochoa, Leges Ecclesiae, vol. 3 (Rome: Commentarium pro religiosis, 1995), n. 3633 and in CLD 7, 225–229.

[6] PB 85–92.

[7] Redemptoris missio 63.

[8] Pius XII, ency Fidei donum, April 21, 1957, AAS 49 (1957) 225; The Pope Speaks 4 (1957) 295.

[9] SCProp, instr Quo aptius, 2/24/1969, on the regulation of missionary cooperation of bishops relative to Pontifical Missionary Works as well as regarding particular diocesan endeavors for the benefit of the missions. AAS 61 (1969) 276–280; CLD 7, 839–845.

but to test all things and to hold fast to that which is good."[10]

The code does not assign a specific role to the conferences of bishops in regard to the missionary apostolate except in relation to the catechumenate (c. 788, §3) and hospitality for those coming from mission territories (c. 792). John Paul II, however, has exhorted bishops and conferences of bishops to act generously in implementing the norms regarding cooperation between particular churches and especially regarding the better distribution of clergy in the world.[11] Vatican II in the decree Ad gentes had assigned other functions or at least had made several other recommendations to conferences of bishops, but evidently it was decided not to enact laws on these points so as to respect the authority and discretion of the diocesan bishop.

Religious to Engage in Mission Action

Canon 783 — Since by virtue of their consecration members of institutes of consecrated life dedicate themselves to the service of the Church, they are obliged to engage in missionary action in a special way and in a manner proper to their institute.

From the early centuries, monks blazed the missionary trail: St. Augustine of Canterbury and his Benedictine companions to England in 597, St. Columbanus and other Celtic monks to various parts of the continent of Europe in the sixth century, St. Boniface to Germany in 719. With the rise of the various religious orders and congregations, right down to the present time, their members have provided a solid phalanx of missionary personnel.

Members of institutes of consecrated life are totally dedicated, by a new and special title, to God and his honor, to the building up of the Church, and to the salvation of the world.[12] How religious will engage in missionary activity depends on the nature of their institute. All religious will contribute to the missionary apostolate by the witness of their consecrated life of prayer and penance (c. 673). Contemplative religious, by the witness of their hidden lives of prayer, call down on the missionary activity of the Church the richest fruits of holiness and hidden apostolic fruitfulness (cf. c. 674). St. Thérèse of the Child Jesus, a contemplative Carmelite nun of Lisieux, was proclaimed patroness of the missions by Pius XI.[13] All religious, whether they belong to institutes dedicated to the direct missionary apostolate or not, do aid the missions by their prayers and other endeavors.

The popes and Vatican II have expressed the desire that institutes of contemplative life establish communities in mission territory, with the religious living their lives in a manner adapted to the genuine religious traditions of the people and bearing an outstanding witness among non-Christians to the majesty and love of God and to union in Christ.[14] Moreover, different forms of consecrated life should be promoted in the new churches, without, however, needless multiplication of institutes, so that the Church's religious tradition can be handed on in a manner in keeping with the character and outlook of each nation; account should be taken also of the traditions of asceticism and contemplation present in certain ancient cultures.[15]

On account of the missionary apostolate of institutes of consecrated life and its close connection with the consecrated life itself, the Holy Father has set up an inter-dicasterial commission of the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples and the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life.[16]

Missionaries

Canon 784 — Missionaries, that is, those whom competent ecclesiastical authority sends to carry

[10] LG 12.

[11] Redemptoris missio 64. SCC, Directive Norms, Postquam apostoli, March 25, 1980, AAS 72 (1980) 343–364; CLD 9, 760–787.

[12] LG 44; cf. c. 573, §1.

[13] SCRit, 12/14/1927, AAS 20 (1928) 147–148, and 3/13/1929, AAS 21 (1929) 195.

[14] AG 40.

[15] Cf. AG 18.

[16] Cf. PB 21, §2.

out missionary work, can be chosen from among natives or non-natives, whether secular clerics, members of institutes of consecrated life or of societies of apostolic life, or other lay members of the Christian faithful.

> Although the obligation of spreading the faith falls individually on every disciple of Christ, still the Lord Christ has always called from the number of his disciples those he has chosen that they might be with him so that he might send them to preach to the nations. So the Holy Spirit, who shares his gifts as he wills for the common good, implants in the hearts of individuals a missionary vocation and at the same time raises up institutes in the Church who take on the duty of evangelization, which pertains to the whole Church, and make it as it were their own special task.
>
> Those people who are endowed with the proper natural temperament, have the necessary qualities and outlook, and are ready to undertake missionary work have a special vocation, whether they are natives of the place or foreigners, priests, religious or lay people. Having been sent by legitimate authority they go forth in faith and obedience to those who are far from Christ, as ministers of the Gospel, set aside for the work to which they have been called.[17]

The council documents and the 1983 code have broadened the notion of missionary. While hitherto there was no specific canonical definition of the term missionary, nevertheless it was usually considered applicable in the strict sense only to priests working among unbelievers for the propagation of the faith, whereas the others—sisters, brothers, lay associates, etc.—were regarded as auxiliary missionaries.[18] The present canon indicates that to be a missionary one must be sent by competent ecclesiastical authority. In a generic sense, persons may be assigned to the missions by the Apostolic See or even by a diocese or by a missionary institute or organization, according to its approved norms, but juridically that person is assigned to missionary work by the competent ecclesiastical authority of the territory. To be a missionary means that the person is a herald of the gospel and laboring for the implantation of the Church (c. 786).

Missionaries may be diocesan clergy, bishops, priests, or deacons; not only may seminarists be recruited to join the clergy of a missionary circumscription but priests or deacons already incardinated in their home dioceses may be allowed to transfer by excardination/incardination to a missionary circumscription, or they may be permitted to spend even a prolonged period on loan to the missions, sometimes in association with a missionary institute. Indeed there have been some notable examples of bishops who on retirement from the pastoral care of a diocese have volunteered to work for a time as simple missionaries in a mission area.

The Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches has a norm regarding priests which has no counterpart in the Latin code, though the spirit is certainly there:

> CCEO 593 — §1. All the presbyters of whatever condition working in missionary territories and forming one presbyterate are to cooperate zealously in the work of evangelization.
>
> §2. They are to freely cooperate according to can. 908 with all other Christian missionaries so that together witness is given to Christ the Lord.

Missionaries may be members of religious or secular institutes or of societies of apostolic life. In the past the religious orders and congregations have been in the forefront of the missionary endeavor and have recruited members also from the area which they were sent to evangelize. Since the founding of the Paris Foreign Missionary Society in 1660, about twenty other such missionary societies of secular priests have been founded in different countries. These missionary societies include Maryknoll, Mill Hill, Quebec, Scarboro, St. Columban and St. Patrick Societies, and others recently established in mission territories and sending their members as missionaries even to other areas.

[17] AG 23.

[18] See Dictionnaire de Théologie Catholique, "Missions, personnel étranger" (J.-B. Piolet); Dictionnaire de Droit Canonique, "Missionnaire" (R. Naz).

A phenomenon of the twentieth century has been the participation of members of the laity in the direct missionary apostolate, sometimes as individuals, more often as belonging to some particular missionary group or as associates of a missionary institute. In recruiting lay persons for the missions, "stress should be laid on the sincere intention of serving the missions, on suitable preparation, professional specialization, as it is called, and on the need for spending a suitable period of time on the missions.... The social security of such lay persons should be assured"[19] (cf. c. 231).

In the past, only those who came from abroad to a mission territory were regarded as missionaries, but since the council and according to the code, missionaries may very well be persons from the mission territory itself who are committed to evangelizing their own people or, eventually, to going elsewhere to spread the gospel.

Catechists

Canon 785 — §1. Catechists are to be used in carrying out missionary work; catechists are lay members of the Christian faithful, duly instructed and outstanding in Christian life, who devote themselves to setting forth the teaching of the gospel and to organizing liturgies and works of charity under the direction of a missionary.

§2. Catechists are to be formed in schools designated for this purpose or, where such schools are lacking, under the direction of missionaries.

Catechists have had and still have a very important role to play in the missionary apostolate. Here we are dealing with lay members of the faithful who assist the missionaries in the important work of expounding the gospel message and organizing liturgical functions and works of charity. Especially in places where the missionary is a foreigner, the catechist who is one of the people, speaking their language and cognizant of their culture, can be a very important aid. Those selected for this office should be outstanding in their Christian life and must be properly instructed for the office which they are to fulfill. Vatican II suggested that "it would be desirable too, wherever it seems opportune, to confer the canonical mission on properly trained catechists in the course of a public liturgical celebration, so that in the eyes of the people they might serve the cause of the faith with greater authority."[20] It had, indeed, been suggested by some that an "instituted ministry of catechist" might be established; Paul VI decided to grant to conferences of bishops which request the faculty from the Holy See the power to institute new ministries which they shall judge to be truly necessary or very useful in their region, ministries which would be open to men and women.[21] However, nothing seems to have come of this suggestion.

Besides expounding the gospel message to the catechumens and to those already baptized, the catechist has an important role in organizing liturgical functions, especially in the absence of the missionary priest. Thus the catechist is indicated as minister of baptism (c. 861, §2) and may be designated as an extraordinary minister of the Eucharist (c. 910, §2) or to assist at marriages in the name of the Church (c. 1112) or, according to the Roman Ritual, to impart certain sacramentals or to preside at the funeral service. In particular, the catechist ought to organize prayer services or, in the absence of a sacred minister, a liturgy of the word on Sundays and holy days (c. 1248, §2).[22]

[19] ES III, 24.

[20] AG 17.

[21] CDWDS, October 27, 1977, CLD 9, 602–604.

[22] CDWDS, June 2, 1988, Directorium de Celebrationibus Dominicalibus Absente Presbytero (Typis Poliglottis Vaticanis, 1988).

The catechist, too, has a responsibility regarding charitable activity. Everything, however, is to be done under the direction of the missionary.

Catechists are to be well instructed so that they may be able to discharge their office properly. "Their training must be in accordance with cultural progress and such that as true co-workers of the priestly order, they will be able to perform their task as well as possible."[23] Normally, catechists should be formed in schools specially designated for the purpose, where "while studying Catholic doctrine with special reference to the Bible and the liturgy, as also catechetical method and pastoral practice, they would also model themselves on the lives of truly Christian people and tirelessly strive for piety and holiness of life."[24] By a decree of May 25, 1980, the Congregation for Catholic Education erected the Institute for Missionary Catechesis at the Pontifical University Urbaniana, Rome. In many mission regions there are schools for the preparation of catechists. Where it is not possible to found such schools, the catechists should be properly formed under the direction of the missionaries.

The council determined that "those who give themselves fully to this work [full-time catechists] should be assured by being paid a just wage, of a decent standard of living and social security"[25] (cc. 231 and 1286).

Missionary Action

Canon 786 — The Church accomplishes the specifically missionary action which implants the Church among peoples or groups where it has not yet taken root especially by sending heralds of the gospel until the young churches are established fully, that is, when they are provided with the proper resources and sufficient means to be able to carry out the work of evangelization themselves.

[23] AG 17.
[24] Ibid.
[25] Ibid.

There has long been discussion with regard to the final aim of missionary action. Certainly the apostles were told, "Go into the whole world and proclaim the good news to all creation" (Mk 16:15), but, as we see especially in the Acts of the Apostles and Pauline epistles, they established local churches to carry on their mission. In this canon, the specifically missionary activity by the heralds of the gospel is seen as arriving at its completion by the implantation of the Church among peoples or groups where it has not yet taken root, and this activity is to continue until the young churches are established fully.

Normally, a mission is initiated when the Holy See, under the juridical form of commissio,[26] entrusts to the care of a religious institute or society of apostolic life or, recently, a local church,[27] a [26] This system of commissio has long existed and an instruction of the Congregation of Propaganda, December 8, 1929 (AAS 22 [1930] 111–115 and CLD 1, 637–643), regulated the interrelationship between the missionary circumscription and the institute or society and the respective superiors. Vatican II envisaged the development of such missions and the termination of the commission (AG 32). Paul VI presupposed the continuance of the commissio in his mp ES I, n. 24. The instruction Relationes in territoriis of the CEP, February 24, 1969 (AAS 61 [1969] 281–287 and CLD 7, 845–851), determined that the juridical system of commissio or entrustment is abrogated as regards dioceses of mission territories but continues to obtain in missionary circumscriptions which have not yet been established as dioceses. PB explicitly refers to the congregation committing or entrusting mission territories to institutes (art. 89). More recently, questions were raised as to whether the norms of the 1929 instruction were still in force in vicariates and prefectures apostolic. A private reply of the CEP published in Omnis Terra (March 1992, 126–128), said that the system of commissio continues to be regulated fundamentally by the 1929 instruction, but a subsequent private reply of the PCILT affirmed that only those norms that are not contrary to the Code of Canon Law remain in force (January 19, 1994, in Roman Replies and CLSA Advisory Opinions, 1994, 6–10). In a matter of such importance in many missionary areas, a more authoritative declaration or a new instruction, taking account of the new code, would seem called for.

[27] PB 89; the prefecture Leticia, Amazonas in Colombia, was committed to the care of the diocese of Santa Rosa de Osos, March 4, 1989 (AAS 81 [1989] 711).

territory, erecting it into a missio sui iuris,[28] an apostolic prefecture, or vicariate and designates one of the members of the institute or society as superior of the mission or prefect apostolic or eventually a bishop as vicar apostolic, all of whom "govern it in the name of the Supreme Pontiff" (c. 371, §1).[29] At this stage the aim of all should be "that the new Christian community might grow into a local church which will, in due course, be ruled by its own pastor and have its own clergy, with a genuine laity existing and working alongside the hierarchy."[30]

When the Church has sufficiently developed in a given country or area, the Holy See erects the regular hierarchy of dioceses and provinces and the system of commissio ceases. Even then, however, the particular churches may not be autosufficient; they may not yet have fully developed nor reached their full maturity, with their own clergy and the necessary resources to carry on their mission; they may still depend heavily on the institute or society to which the territory was hitherto entrusted or other outside help for personnel and resources. With the cessation of the commissio, the religious working in the missions will do so according to suitable contracts or agreements according to canons 681, §2 and 790, §1, 2°.[31] Moreover, such "young" churches may well remain under the direction of the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples.

Vatican II expressed the desire that "in order that the missionary zeal might flourish among their fellow countrymen it would help greatly if the young churches took part in the universal mission of the Church as soon as possible and sent missionaries to preach the Gospel throughout the [28] This missionary circumscription is not mentioned specifically in the code but there are a number, mostly of quite recent erection, mentioned in the Annuario Pontificio, 1997, 1079–1080. The jurisprudence of the CEP applies basically the same norms as are applicable to prefects apostolic, servatis servandis, but excluding the prelatial insignia (cf. relevant particular decrees, CLD 3, 73–75); J. García Martín, "Origen de Las Misiones Independientes o 'Sui Iuris' y de sus Superiores Eclesiasticos," ComRelMiss 74 (1993) 265–324.

[29] When a mission territory is entrusted to the care of a particular institute or society, the practice of the CEP is to ask the superior general to submit a terna of names of suitable candidates for the office of ecclesiastical superior of the mission, whether as superior or prefect apostolic or vicar apostolic. Even after the erection of regular dioceses, if practically all the clergy are members of the institute or society, it may well continue the same practice. There is no reference to this practice in the code (cc. 364, 4° and 377, §3) nor in PB 89. However, Paul VI, in his mp Sollicitudo omnium ecclesiarum, of June 24, 1969, regulating the functions of the representatives of the Holy See, in VI regarding the appointment of bishops and other ordinaries, states that "the practice [retains its force] for proposing candidates for those ecclesiastical jurisdictions which have been entrusted to religious communities and are subject to the authority of the Congregation for the Evangelization of Nations" (AAS 61 [1960] 473 and CLD 7, 277–284); see also Council for Public Affairs of the Church, March 25, 1972, Norms for the Selection of Candidates for the Episcopacy in the Latin Church, art. 1, 2 (AAS 64 [1972] 386 and CLD 7, 366–373); V. Bartocetti, Ius Constitutionale Missionum (Rome, 1947); J. García Martin, "Las Relaciones entre Ordinarios del Lugar e Institutos Religiosos en las Misiones segun el Codigo de Derecho Canonico 1983," ComRelMiss 65 (1984) 121–166; M. Gerin, Le Gouvernement des Missions (Quebec, 1944); G. J. Lafontaine, Relations Canoniques entre le Missionnaire et Ses Supérieurs, Catholic University of America Canon Law dissertation #252 (Sherbrooke, Que., 1947); S. Masarei, De Missionum Institutione et de Relationibus inter Superiores Missionum et Superiores Religiosos (Rome, 1940); I. Ting Pong Lee, "Relationes inter Ordinarios Locorum et Instituta Missionalia," ComRelMiss 51 (1970) 34–54; idem, "De Iuridico Mandati Systemate in Missionibus," ComRelMiss 51 (1970) 151–167, 238–258; 52 (1971) 43–59, 167–187.

[30] AG 21, 32.

[31] AG 32. The instruction, Relationes, provided general norms regarding contracts or agreements between ordinaries of mission territories and missionary institutes, that is, orders, congregations, institutes, and associations of men or women which are working in the missions. It provides for the possibility of two types of contract or agreement, one where, at the request of the mission ordinary, the Holy See gives a mandate to the missionary institute for its particular work, or the other a simple contract or agreement between the diocesan bishop and the competent superiors. In fact, the CEP issued sample copies of both types (CLD 7, 852–861).

whole world, even though they are themselves still short of clergy."[32]

Missionary Dialogue

Canon 787 — §1. By the witness of their life and word, missionaries are to establish a sincere dialogue with those who do not believe in Christ so that, in a manner adapted to their own temperament and culture, avenues are opened enabling them to understand the message of the gospel.

§2. Missionaries are to take care that they teach the truths of faith to those whom they consider prepared to receive the gospel message so that they can be admitted to receive baptism when they freely request it.

Mission fundamentally concerns proclaiming the gospel message to those who "know not Christ." However, the missionaries, by witness of their life and their words, must endeavor to establish sincere dialogue with those whom they hope to evangelize. If this dialogue is to be fruitful, it must be done in great sensitivity and respect for the culture and temperament of those to whom they are sent, mindful that in many cases there is already a very ancient and rich culture. There must also be respect for the great religions of the world and also for the values of the traditional religions, which have remained in their original socio-cultural environment.[33]

The establishment of the local churches should be accompanied by suitable inculturation of the expression of the faith and its practice. Vatican II and various subsequent documents have called for this process.[34] "Through inculturation the Church makes the Gospel incarnate in different cultures and at the same time introduces peoples, together with their cultures, into her own community."[35] It will need knowledge of the culture and discernment as to how to integrate the gospel message within it. The possibilities of such inculturation will vary from culture to culture but certain areas are specifically referred to in conciliar or subsequent documents: theology or at least expounding the faith,[36] church life and structures,[37] the liturgy,[38] consecrated life,[39] marriage and the family.[40] The Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches emphasizes this point: "The evangelization of the nations should be so done that, preserving the integrity of faith and morals, the Gospel can be expressed in the culture of individual peoples, namely, in catechetics, in their own liturgical rites, in sacred art, in particular law, and, in short, in the whole ecclesial life" (CCEO 584, §2).

[32] AG 20.

[33] PCID, Letter to Presidents of Episcopal Conferences in Africa, Asia, the Americas, and Oceania, Nov. 21, 1993, L'Osservatore Romano (Engl.), 1/26/1994.

[34] GS 58; EN 62–63.

[35] Redemptoris missio 52–54; Ecclesia in Africa 59–64; Catechesi tradendae (October 16, 1979), 53.

[36] Paul VI, addressing bishops from all Africa gathered at Kampala, Uganda, for a symposium, July 31, 1969, dealt with this question and enunciated two principles: First, your church must be Catholic. "That is, it must be entirely founded upon the identical, essential, constitutional patrimony of the self-same teaching of Christ, as professed by the authentic and authoritative tradition of the one true Church.... To make sure the message of revealed doctrine cannot be altered, the Church has even set down her treasure of truth in certain conceptual and verbal formulas. Even when these formulas are at times difficult, she obliges us to preserve them textually. ...Granted this first reply, however, we now come to the second. The expression, that is the language and mode of manifesting this one Faith, may be manifold; hence it may be original, suited to the tongue, the style, the character, the genius and the culture, of the one who professes the one Faith. From this point of view, a certain pluralism is not only legitimate, but desirable. An adaptation of the Christian life in the fields of pastoral, ritual, didactic and spiritual activities is not only possible but even favoured by the Church" (AAS 61 [1969] 576–577).

[37] Ecclesia in Africa 62.

[38] SC 37–40; CDWDS, Instruction on the Roman Liturgy and Inculturation, January 25, 1994, AAS 87 (1995) 288–314; Origins 23 (1993–1994) 745–756.

[39] AG 18, 40; Joint Letter of SCRIS and SCProp on Religious Life in Africa, June 3, 1978, CLD 9, 273–280.

[40] In FC 10, two principles are enunciated: compatibility of the various cultures with the gospel and communion with the universal Church.

Those who are ready to receive the gospel message are to be instructed in the truths of the faith so that, if they freely request it, they may receive baptism (c. 865, §1). Freedom in embracing the Catholic faith has been a sacred principle from earliest times and was explicitly stated in canon 1351 of the 1917 code: Ad amplexandam fidem catholicam nemo invitus cogatur. Pius XII, in reaction to an accusation of "forced conversions," cited this canon and then went back to Lactantius (ca. 305–310): "There is no need of force or injury, for religion cannot be forced; to move the will words rather than blows are to be used.... And so we keep no one against his will—for one who lacks devotion and faith is useless to God.... There is nothing so voluntary as religion; for if the heart of the one who offers sacrifice is turned away, religion is gone, it is nothing..."[41] The Eastern code is even more severe as it asserts, "It is strictly forbidden to compel someone, to persuade him in an inappropriate way or to allure him to join the Church" (CCEO 586). Probably mindful of errors of history, that code also insists on the freedom of catechumens to join any sui iuris church (CCEO 588).

The Catechumenate

Canon 788 — §1. When the period of the precatechumenate has been completed, those who have made known their intention to embrace faith in Christ are to be admitted to the catechumenate in liturgical ceremonies and their names are to be inscribed in the book designated for this purpose.

§2. Through instruction and the first experience of Christian life, catechumens are to be initiated suitably into the mystery of salvation and introduced into the life of the faith, the liturgy, the charity of the people of God, and the apostolate.

§3. It is for the conference of bishops to issue statutes which regulate the catechumenate by determining what things must be expected of the catechumens and by defining what prerogatives are to be recognized as theirs.

The catechumenate, as a period of several months or sometimes even years of formation for entering into the Christian community, dates from the pre-Nicene period of the Church's history. In 1614, after the Council of Trent, Paul V issued the Rituale Romanum, which contained the rite of adult baptism. This rite did contain the various liturgical elements of different stages of Christian formation but all combined into the one liturgical service. Consequently, the catechumenate as such fell into desuetude. At the request of various local ordinaries especially from mission territories, John XXIII, by a decree of the Congregation of Rites on April 16, 1962, approved an Order of Baptism of Adults according to seven stages of the catechumenate. Vatican II in its Constitution on the Liturgy decreed, "The catechumenate for adults, comprising several distinct steps, is to be restored and brought into use at the discretion of the local Ordinary. By this means the time of the catechumenate, which is intended as a period of suitable instruction, may be sanctified by sacred rites to be celebrated at successive intervals of time" and also "both rites for the baptism of adults are to be revised, not only the simpler rite but also, taking into account the restored catechumenate, the more solemn rite."[42] The new Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults was promulgated by a decree of the Congregation for Divine Worship on January 6, 1972.[43]

The present canon considers two distinct periods, the precatechumenate and the catechumenate proper. The precatechumenate is regarded as having great importance and ordinarily is not to be omitted. It is a time of evangelization: in faith and constancy the living God is proclaimed, as is Jesus Christ whom he sent for the salvation of all mankind. Thus those who are not yet Christians, [41] Allocution to the Rota, October 6, 1946, AAS 38 (1946) 391–397; CLD 3, 650–657; W. H. Woestman, ed., Papal Allocutions to the Roman Rota 1939–1994 (Ottawa: St. Paul University, 1994) 39–45.

[42] SC 64, 66.

[43] CDW, Ordo Initiationis Christianae Adultorum, January 6, 1972, reimpressio emendata, 1974, AAS 64 (1972) 252; CLD 7, 596.

their hearts opened by the Holy Spirit, may believe and be freely converted to the Lord.[44]

Admission to the catechumenate takes place when the period of the precatechumenate has been completed and the candidates have been grounded in the basic fundamentals of the Christian life and teaching. The rite, as given in the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults, takes place in an assembly of the faithful. After the celebration of the rite, the names of those who have been admitted are entered in the register of catechumens, along with the names of the minister and sponsors and the date and place of admission.[45] The catechumens set out on a spiritual journey of deepening evangelization and of Christian living; it is a real apprenticeship through prayer and especially the liturgy, through the witness of their lives as an apostolate, and through the charity of the people of God.[46] The period of the catechumenate is divided into different stages, each with its own liturgical initiation and with a given specific purpose. The rite itself provides for suitable adaptation by the bishops' conference, the bishop, or the minister (RCIA 64–67). Vatican II declared, "In mission countries, in addition to what is furnished by the Christian tradition, those elements of initiation rites may be admitted which are already in use among some peoples insofar as they can be adapted to the Christian ritual."[47]

The council had said that "the juridical status of catechumens should be clearly defined in the new Code of Canon Law. Since they are already joined to the Church, they are already of the household of Christ, and are quite frequently already living a life of faith, hope and charity."[48] The code, however, did not go into this question at length but rather left it to the conference of bishops to lay down norms regarding the catechumenate, deciding what the catechumens are to do and what prerogatives they should enjoy. According to the code, catechumens may receive blessings (c. 1170) and also sacramentals publicly administered, as canon 1149 of the 1917 code was officially interpreted.[49] Catechumens are unbaptized and in the marriage law are treated as such; however, the postconciliar revised Marriage Rite contains a special rite for celebrating a marriage between a Catholic and a catechumen or a non-Christian.[50] In case of death, catechumens are counted as among the faithful in regard to funeral rites (c. 1183, §1).

There are various other areas where the canonical situation of catechumens might be regulated, such as the obligations of the catechumens, participation in parish life, membership in associations of the faithful, etc.

Those Newly Initiated

Canon 789 — Neophytes are to be formed through suitable instruction to understand the gospel truth more deeply and to fulfill the duties assumed through baptism; they are to be imbued with a sincere love for Christ and his Church.

After they have received the sacraments of Christian initiation, the neophytes are to be nurtured in the faith by being brought to a fuller understanding of the paschal mystery. Accompanied not only by their sponsors but also by the Christian community, they continue their meditation on the gospel and share in the Eucharist, in church life, and in the performance of works of charity.[51] A neophyte is impeded from receiving orders, unless, in the judgment of the ordinary, he has been sufficiently tested (c. 1042, 3°).

Vatican II insisted: "The ecumenical spirit should be nourished among neophytes; they must appreciate that their brothers who believe in [44] RCIA, Introduction, 9–11.

[45] RCIA, Introduction, 14–17.
[46] RCIA, Introduction, 18–26.
[47] SC 65, 37–40.
[48] AG 14.

[49] SCRit, March 8, 1919, AAS 11 (1919) 144; CLD 1, 557.
[50] Ordo Celebrandi Matrimonium, editio typica altera, March 19, 1990. Chapter 4, "Ordo celebrandi matrimonium inter partem catholicam et partem catechumenam vel non christianam."
[51] RCIA, Introduction, 37–40.

Christ are disciples of Christ, and having being reborn in baptism share in many of the blessings of the people of God."[52]

Diocesan Bishops in Mission Territories

Canon 790 — §1. It is for the diocesan bishop in the territories of a mission:

1° to promote, direct, and coordinate endeavors and works which pertain to missionary action;

2° to take care that appropriate agreements are entered into with moderators of institutes which dedicate themselves to missionary work and that relations with them result in the good of the mission.

§2. All missionaries, even religious and their assistants living in his jurisdiction, are subject to the prescripts issued by the diocesan bishop mentioned in §1, n. 1.

This canon indicates the rights and responsibilities of the diocesan bishop in mission territories. Its context is the establishment of regular dioceses in missionary territories.[53]

While vicars and prefects apostolic or even superiors of missiones sui iuris, according to the norms of canons 368 and 381, §2, are equivalent in law to diocesan bishops, nevertheless their relationship with the superiors of the religious institutes to which the given mission circumscription is entrusted is fundamentally regulated by the norms of the commissio or the proper Statuta[54] approved by the Holy See or whatever mutual agreements may have been entered into. In all cases, however, the principles of canon 790 are valid.

"It is the responsibility of the diocesan bishop, as head of the diocesan apostolate and its center of unity, to promote, guide, and coordinate missionary activity, so that the spontaneous zeal of those who engage in this work may be safeguarded and fostered."[55] The canon speaks of both new initiatives and already established works concerning missionary activity. On the missions as elsewhere, the diocesan bishop and those equivalent to the diocesan bishop ought to promote mission activity in close consultation with their missionaries and with the religious superiors (c. 678, §3), especially with the superiors of the institute or society to which the care of the mission may have been entrusted.

The council and canon 790, §1, 2° both speak of the necessity of proper agreements being drawn up between the head of the mission and the moderators of institutes engaged in missionary activity. The canon speaks of agreements, not necessarily of contracts, which might well require civil formalities and entail civil consequences (c. 1290). The Holy See has laid down some general principles regarding these agreements, whether with the so-called mandate or not,[56] and consultations between the bishops' conferences and the major superiors on the matter may be desirable. In any case, within the necessary parameters, agreements should be freely worked out between the bishop or other head of the mission and the competent major superior; neither the bishops' conference nor the bishops may impose one form of agreement. The aim of the agreements is to ensure clarity regarding the mutual rights and obligations of the ecclesiastical authorities and of institutes and their members and to contribute to the good of the mission. In an analogous case, canon 681, §2 asks specifically for a written agreement; certainly the agreement of canon 790, §2 should likewise be written. The content of the agreements is not specified in the code but the specimen agreements supplied by the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples gave good indications of what is required: clauses regarding the work un-

[52] AG 15.

[53] AG 30.

[54] Cf. CIC 296–297; W. Van der Marck, Statuta pro Missionibus Recentiora (Munster: Aschendorff, 1958).

[55] AG 30.

[56] SCProp, instr Relationes, Feb. 24, 1969, AAS 61 (1969) 281–287; CLD 7, 845–861; there are non-obligatory samples of agreements, one with the "mandate" and the other without.

dertaken, the personnel and their preparation, the respective roles of the diocesan bishop and of the religious superior, the matter of temporal goods, their ownership and administration, revenues, by whom expenditures are covered, etc. Especially if an institute has been a long time in the missionary territory, certain matters regarding the ownership of some properties may be very complex and must be regulated in a just and equitable manner.[57]

The question of the subjection of religious to the local ordinary in missionary activity has had a long history. In the last century, Leo XIII issued an apostolic constitution, Romanos Pontifices, on May 8, 1881, directly for England and Wales but later extended elsewhere; many of its norms were incorporated into the 1917 code. Vatican II in its decree Ad gentes (32) speaks of the submission of institutes and ecclesiastical associations of every kind to the local ordinary in all that concerns missionary activity. The canon speaks not only of the religious but also of their helpers residing in the territory; nowadays institutes or societies often recruit lay associates as missionaries to help in the apostolate.

Support for Missionary Activity

Canon 791 — To foster missionary cooperation in individual dioceses:

1° missionary vocations are to be promoted;

2° a priest is to be designated to promote effectively endeavors for the missions, especially the Pontifical Missionary Works;

3° an annual day for the missions is to be celebrated;

4° a suitable offering for the missions is to be contributed each year and sent to the Holy See.

While the preceding canon deals with the diocesan bishops in missionary territories, the present canon deals with fostering missionary cooperation throughout the universal Church.

1° – Vocations

As much as possible, a diocesan bishop is to foster vocations to different ministries and to consecrated life, with special care shown for priestly and missionary vocations (c. 385). The promotion of missionary vocations is a very important obligation of the diocesan bishop. In addition to encouraging such vocations, he might afford suitable help for educating and preparing people for these ministries. Vatican II even suggested "that bishops, being conscious of the grave shortage of priests which impedes the evangelization of many regions, would after proper training send to those dioceses which lack clergy some of their best priests who offer themselves for mission work, where at least for a time they would exercise the missionary ministry in a spirit of service."[58]

2° – A Priest to Promote the Missions

Paul VI, in implementing the conciliar decree Ad gentes, laid down that "a priest shall be appointed in each diocese to effectively promote the work of the missions. He will also take part in the pastoral council."[59] The code indicates that this priest should especially promote the Pontifical Missionary Works.

The Pontifical Missionary Works are: The Pontifical Work for the Propagation of the Faith, founded by Pauline Jaricot in 1819 to obtain prayers and modest alms for the missions; The Pontifical Work of the Holy Childhood, founded by Bishop Forbin Janson at the suggestion of Pauline Jaricot in 1843 to get children involved in the missionary apostolate; The Pontifical Work of St. Peter the Apostle for Native Clergy, founded also in France in 1889 by Stéphanie Cottin-Bigard and her daughter Jeanne. To these we may add The Pious Missionary Union of the Clergy, founded in [57] I. Ting Pong Lee, "De Bonis in Missionibus: Quaedam de bonorum assignatione in missionibus criteria crisi subiciuntur," ComRelMiss 57 (1976) 335–348; 58 (1977) 35–46, 137–148, 210–223, 346–355; 59 (1978) 38–49: G. Vromant, Ius Missionariorum, 6, De Bonis Temporalibus, 1953.

[58] AG 38.

[59] ES III, 4.

Italy in 1916 by Fr. Paolo Manna, encouraged by Bishop Guido Maria Conforti, who in 1898 had founded the Congregation of St. Francis Xavier for the Missions; originally intended for the clergy, this organization later opened membership to seminarians and to religious men and women and it is now simply known as the Pontifical Missionary Union. These four associations, which originated in private initiatives, flourished and were encouraged by successive popes.[60] Since the time of Pius XI, the "Pope of the Missions," they have been coordinated:[61] "The four Pontifical Societies would henceforth be set up as one Institution, depending on the Sacred Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples. However, each work, while keeping its identity and pursuing its own ends, should have its particular regulations, as well as its general secretariat and national secretariat.... In view of the great diversity of pastoral situations, structures and mentalities in the different Churches, the Pontifical Mission-Aid Societies will have to show flexibility in their organization and methods, so as to adapt to local conditions."[62] Vatican II desired that these works should be given first place because they are a means by which Catholics are imbued from infancy with a truly universal outlook, and also a means for instigating an effective collecting of funds for all the missions, each according to its needs.[63] Dioceses or missionary institutes may have other organizations for aiding the missions, but priority is to be given to the pontifical works and confusion among the faithful is to be avoided. The organization may vary from diocese to diocese and some dioceses may have a special office dedicated to this purpose. Preferably in each diocese one director will be appointed for all four Pontifical Works. Should the bishop designate a different priest as delegate for the missions, this person should give fullest support to the diocesan director of the Pontifical Works.[64]

3°– Day for the Missions

Pius XI established the Annual Mission Day for the second last Sunday of October.[65] While Mission Day is still generally celebrated on that day, nevertheless the conference of bishops or the bishop could fix another day. The Holy Father publishes a special message every year for Mission Day. The collection of funds for the Propagation of the Faith usually takes place on that day.

4°– Financial Aid for the Missions

The missions are to be supported not only by promoting the National Collection for the Missions (cc. 1266, 1267, §3) but also by subscribing over and above that collection of donations from the faithful, from diocesan and parochial funds (cc. 1271, 640).

Vatican II noted that "in their conferences the bishops should consider... the particular contribution, in proportion to its income, which each diocese will be obliged to make every year for the work of the missions."[66] Paul VI in Ecclesiae sanctae, III, 8, is more precise: "Since the voluntary offerings of the faithful for the missions are by no means adequate, it is recommended that as soon as possible a certain sum be fixed to be paid each year out of their own resources by the diocese itself and by the parishes and the other diocesan communities to be distributed by the Holy [60] S. De Angelis, De Fidelium Associationibus, 1959, II, nn. 688–695, 759–768. G. Vromant, Ius Missionariorum, 3, De Fidelium Associationibus, 1955, 135–151; new statutes for the Pontifical Works were approved by a decree of the CEP, June 26, 1980, cf. Bibliographia Missionaria 44 (1980) Quaderno 23, Text, 361–374, Commentary by J. López-Gay, 380–392.

[61] Pius XI, mp Romanorum pontificum, May 3, 1922, AAS 14 (1922) 321–330; mp Decessor noster, June 24, 1929, AAS 21 (1929) 342–349; Instruction of the Congregation of Propaganda, March 14, 1937, AAS 29 (1937) 476–477.

[62] Statutes of the Pontifical Missionary Societies, June 26, 1980, nn. 31, 29.

[63] AG 38.

[64] Statutes of the Pontifical Missionary Societies, chapter 2, art. 1, n. 6.

[65] SCRit, April 14, 1926, AAS 19 (1927) 23; P 16 (1927) 31.

[66] AG 38.

See, without diminution of the other offerings of the faithful."[67]

Welcome and Care for Those from Mission Lands

Canon 792 — Conferences of bishops are to establish and promote works by which those who come to their territory from mission lands for the sake of work or study are received as brothers and sisters and assisted with adequate pastoral care.

Vatican II expressed concern for immigrants from mission lands: "In order that immigrants from mission lands may be properly received and given appropriate pastoral care by the bishops of older Christian lands, cooperation with missionary bishops is necessary."[68]

[67] T. Scalzotto, "Contributo 'Ecclesiae sanctae,' origine del termine e presuppositi conciliari," Bibliographia Missionaria 41 (1977) Quaderno 20, 207–209.
[68] AG 23.

In most countries, especially in some urban centers, there may be numbers of immigrants, clerics, religious, or lay people, from mission countries. Some may come for a temporary stay for university studies, for health reasons, etc., while others may intend remaining indefinitely in the guest country for work or to build a new life; still others may be refugees, fleeing from persecution of one kind or another. For all, the local church must provide a fraternal welcome and adequate pastoral care. The pastoral needs can be very varied. The canon asks the conference of bishops to establish or promote works to assist these immigrants and help provide pastoral care. Cooperation with the missionary bishops of the places from which the immigrants come may be necessary in order to find priests who know the language and the culture of these immigrants to minister to them until they have become completely integrated into the guest country. The presence of immigrants from the mission countries may be a mutually enriching experience for the host church and for the immigrants.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bibliographical material for canons 781–792 can be found after the commentary on canon 833.

Sharon A. Euart, R.S.M.

Title III
Catholic Education
[cc. 793–821]

The first three canons in the revised code's treatment of Catholic education clearly reflect the conciliar teaching of the Declaration on Christian Education, Gravissimum educationis, in asserting the rights and responsibilities of parents regarding the education of their children in general and their Catholic education in particular. Likewise, the canons reflect an openness to the situation in the modern world. The introductory canons of title III contain basic principles of church teaching which inform the subsequent three chapters: "Schools" (cc. 796–806), "Catholic Universities and Other Institutes of Higher Studies" (cc. 807–814), and "Ecclesiastical Universities and Faculties" (cc. 815–821).

Parental Rights and Obligations

Canon 793 — §1. Parents and those who take their place are bound by the obligation and possess the right of educating their offspring. Catholic parents also have the duty and right of choosing those means and institutions through which they can provide more suitably for the Catholic education of their children, according to local circumstances.

§2. Parents also have the right to that assistance, to be furnished by civil society, which they need to secure the Catholic education of their children.

The first paragraph, based on Gravissimum educationis 3, 6, focuses on the rights and obligations of parents and those who legitimately take their place (e.g., guardians, foster parents, adoptive parents) to (1) educate their children and (2) select the most suitable means and schools for the Catholic education of their children. These two assertions of parental rights and responsibilities are fundamental, that is, primary and inalienable, in regard to the education of their children. Parallel provisions on the rights and duties of parents for the Christian education of their children are contained in canon 226, §2. Often identified as a foundational canonical provision in support for home schooling, canon 793, §1 recognizes the primary educational role of parents within the broad framework of Catholic education and suggests, as does the title of this section, that not all education that is Catholic need take place within the school setting.

Paragraph two asserts the right of parents to receive needed assistance from the State in order to ensure a Catholic education for their children. This assertion, while lacking specificity as to the responsibilities of the State or the nature of the assistance, encompasses religious education as an integral and essential component of Catholic education.[1]

Right and Duty of the Church

Canon 794 — §1. The duty and right of educating belongs in a special way to the Church, to which has been divinely entrusted the mission of assisting persons so that they are able to reach the fullness of the Christian life.

§2. Pastors of souls have the duty of arranging everything so that all the faithful have a Catholic education.

Paragraph one, based on Gravissimum educationis, Introduction, 3, grounds the Church's role in education in its divine mission to assist all men and women in their efforts to achieve the fullness of the Christian life. By means of education, the Church, working for the realization of God's plan, carries out its mission of evangelization to proclaim the mystery of salvation to all people and to renew all things in Christ.

[1] Cf. Dignitatis humanae 5; Congregation for Catholic Education, decl The Catholic School, March 19, 1977 (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1977) nn. 81, 82; Congregation for Catholic Education, instr "The Religious Dimension of Education in a Catholic School," April 7, 1988, Origins 18/14 (September 15, 1988) 213, 215–228.

Paragraph two assigns primary responsibility to pastors of souls (bishops and parish priests) for making arrangements so that everyone has the opportunity for a Catholic education. Although all members of the Christian faithful share in this responsibility, bishops and pastors are given the additional responsibility to serve as promoters and coordinators of the educational efforts. For the diocesan bishop, in particular, this duty includes the responsibility of coordinating educational undertakings throughout the diocese and ensuring that as many young people as possible have access to the Church's educational apostolate (c. 394, §1).

Goals of Education

Canon 795 — Since true education must strive for complete formation of the human person that looks to his or her final end as well as to the common good of societies, children and youth are to be nurtured in such a way that they are able to develop their physical, moral, and intellectual talents harmoniously, acquire a more perfect sense of responsibility and right use of freedom, and are formed to participate actively in social life.

Taken directly from the first paragraph of Gravissimum educationis, this canon reiterates the goals of education in the process of human formation and the individual's right to an education. It describes the educational process as a holistic undertaking, focusing on the formation of the whole person: developmental, promoting the growth and harmonious development in the various stages of the individual's physical, moral, intellectual, and spiritual life; and social, acknowledging the importance of the common good of society and the rights and duties that derive from responsible participation in society and the Church. Similar provisions are contained in canon 629 of the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches.

CHAPTER I SCHOOLS
[cc. 796–806]

Role of Schools

Canon 796 — §1. Among the means to foster education, the Christian faithful are to hold schools in esteem; schools are the principal assistance to parents in fulfilling the function of education.

§2. Parents must cooperate closely with the teachers of the schools to which they entrust their children to be educated; moreover, teachers in fulfilling their duty are to collaborate very closely with parents, who are to be heard willingly and for whom associations or meetings are to be established and highly esteemed.

The first paragraph singles out schools as the primary means of assisting parents in carrying out their duty to educate their children. In recognizing the role of schools, the canon exhorts all the Christian faithful to acknowledge their importance. Paragraph one is based on Gravissimum educationis 5, which describes in some detail the goals of a Catholic school. Catholic school educators and parents alike could benefit from assessing Catholic school education in the light of the source document.

The importance of Catholic schools is reaffirmed in the 1997 circular letter from the Congregation for Catholic Education, "The Catholic School on the Threshold of the Third Millennium,"[2] which situates the Catholic school, first and foremost, within the Church's evangelizing mission in the world and describes the Catholic school as "the privileged environment in which Christian education is carried out" (n. 11).

[2] Congregation for Catholic Education, littcirc "The Catholic School on the Threshold of the Third Millennium," December 28, 1997, L'Osservatore Romano 16 (April 22, 1998) 8–10.

Paragraph two is a call to mutual collaboration exhorting both parents and teachers to work together in the educational enterprise. Parents are admonished to cooperate with teachers, and teachers are urged to work closely with parents. This collaboration should be identified by a willingness on the part of teachers to listen to parents and the establishment of teacher associations.[3]

Freedom of Parents

Canon 797 — Parents must possess a true freedom in choosing schools; therefore, the Christian faithful must be concerned that civil society recognizes this freedom for parents and even supports it with subsidies; distributive justice is to be observed.

This canon is a strong affirmation of the true freedom of parents in the selection of schools for their children. It also contains an admonition to all the Christian faithful to ensure that civil governments recognize, promote, and safeguard this freedom. Civil authority must recognize the right of parents to choose with genuine freedom suitable schools for their children. Moreover, the principle of distributive justice should guide the State in the allocation of public subsidies so that parents are not penalized in exercising their right to select schools for their children in accord with their conscience.

The principal source of this canon is Gravissimum educationis 6. It also reflects the teaching of Dignitatis humanae 5.

Parental Responsibility for Catholic Education

Canon 798 — Parents are to entrust their children to those schools which provide a Catholic education. If they are unable to do this, they are obliged to take care that suitable Catholic education is provided for their children outside the schools.

This canon articulates the obligation of parents to ensure the Catholic education of their children. The Catholic school is one means through which a Catholic education may be provided.

The law presupposes a distinction between the officially sponsored Catholic school of canon 803 and other educational institutions that provide a Catholic education. Other educational alternatives that the law might envision are public, private, or state-funded schools where the Catholic faith is taught.

The canon contains no prohibition against the use of non-Catholic schools. Rather, it provides direction for parents who are unable to send their children to schools that provide a Catholic education. In such cases, parents are to see to it that the children receive an appropriate Catholic education outside of the school setting. The law does not identify reasons or conditions that might prevent parents from sending their children to Catholic schools. Some reasons might include availability, distance, cost, cultural or political conditions. Regardless of the reasons that prevent parents from sending their children to Catholic schools, they are obliged to see to it that the children receive a Catholic education outside of school. The Catholic school is viewed in the law as a means, not an end.

The canon does not suggest how this Catholic education might be attained. Nonetheless, the obligation that rests with parents is a serious one.

Parents, Society, and Religious Education

Canon 799 — The Christian faithful are to strive so that in civil society the laws which regulate the formation of youth also provide for their religious and moral education in the schools themselves, according to the conscience of the parents.

This canon recognizes the inalienable right of parents over the religious and moral education of [3] See The Catholic School, nn. 60–61, which extends the call for cooperation and collaboration to the entire school community. See also "The Catholic School on the Threshold of the Third Millennium," n. 20.

their children. It also urges the Christian faithful to ensure that civil society acknowledges and safeguards this right, particularly by promoting just legislation on educational matters for schools regulated by civil authority. While the canon does not suggest that all schools become Catholic schools, it does support the provision of religious and moral education in public schools or schools regulated by the State. Gravissimum educationis 7, the source of this canon, acknowledges the role and contribution of civil authority, with due regard for the pluralistic character of modern society, in ensuring "that the education of their children in all schools is given in accordance with the moral and religious principles of the family" (GE 7).

Establishment and Promotion of Catholic Schools

Canon 800 — §1. The Church has the right to establish and direct schools of any discipline, type, and level.

§2. The Christian faithful are to foster Catholic schools, assisting in their establishment and maintenance according to their means.

The first paragraph contains a strong assertion of the Church's right to establish and conduct any type of school at any grade level. Based on this claim the Church, i.e., the people of God, has the freedom to initiate and control educational ventures across a broad range that includes, for example, elementary and secondary schools, colleges and postgraduate schools, with academic, professional, or vocational curricula. The importance of the exercise of this right on the part of the Church, as expressed in Gravissimum educationis 8, the source for this canon along with canon 1375 of the 1917 code, is threefold: to preserve freedom of conscience, to protect the rights of parents, and to provide for the advancement of culture (GE 8).

Paragraph two identifies an important role for the Christian faithful in relation to the promotion of Catholic schools. The faithful are admonished to encourage Catholic schools and support them in accord with their resources. Based on Gravissimum educationis 8 and 9, the exhortation extends to all the faithful, not only to parents whose children attend Catholic schools. The assistance called for is not limited to financial aid; it can include moral support, volunteer work, assistance in promotion, recruitment, administration and development, continuing education for faculty, etc. The importance of the exhortation is more strongly stated in the conciliar source document which urges "pastors of the Church and all the faithful to spare no sacrifice" in their efforts to make Catholic schools more effective, especially in their concern for the poor, those without the benefit of family, and those who lack the gift of faith (GE 9).

In his 1987 address to Catholic educators in New Orleans, Louisiana, Pope John Paul II reaffirmed his support of Catholic schools. He stated:

> The presence of the Church in the field of education is wonderfully manifested in the vast and dynamic network of schools and educational programs extending from preschool through the adult years. The entire ecclesial community—bishops, priests, religious, the laity—the Church in all her parts, is called to value ever more deeply the importance of this task and mission, and to give it full and enthusiastic support.[4]

The bishops of the United States also reaffirmed the importance of Catholic elementary and secondary schools in their 1990 statement In Support of Catholic Elementary and Secondary Schools and called for an expansion of this "vitally important ministry of the Church."[5]

[4] John Paul II, "Catholic Education: Gift to the Church, Gift to the Nation," Origins 17/17 (October 8, 1987) 279.

[5] USCC, In Support of Catholic Elementary and Secondary Schools (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1990) 9. See also "The Religious Dimension of Education in a Catholic School" for its "enthusiastic encouragement" to dioceses and religious institutes wishing to establish new schools (41).

Religious Institutes and the Apostolate of Education

Canon 801 — Religious institutes whose proper mission is education, retaining their mission faithfully, are also to strive to devote themselves to Catholic education through their schools, established with the consent of the diocesan bishop.

Canon 801 is a new canon directed to religious institutes whose mission includes the apostolate of education. The canon commends religious institutes for retaining their commitment to education and, recognizing the long-standing contribution of countless women and men religious to the apostolate of Catholic education, encourages religious to continue this commitment. In response to the call for renewal by the Second Vatican Council, religious institutes initiated efforts to adapt their lives and works to the spirit of their founders and the needs of the time. In this process, some religious institutes moved into new apostolates and decreased their involvement in the Catholic school apostolate.[6] The canon urges religious to continue this valuable work in their own schools. The concluding admonition of the canon should be considered in the context of canons 673–683 on the apostolate of religious. Sources for the canon include Christus Dominus 35, Ecclesiae sanctae I, 29–30, 39, and the Declaration of the Congregation for Catholic Education, The Catholic School, 74–76, 89.

Schools with a Christian Spirit

Canon 802 — §1. If schools which offer an education imbued with a Christian spirit are not available, it is for the diocesan bishop to take care that they are established.

§2. Where it is expedient, the diocesan bishop is to make provision for the establishment of professional schools, technical schools, and other schools required by special needs.

The first paragraph states the direct responsibility of the diocesan bishop to establish schools imbued with a Christian spirit if they are lacking in his diocese. Based on canon 1379, §1 of the 1917 code, canon 802, §1 differs from the former law in two ways. Whereas canon 1379, §1 of the 1917 code refers to "Catholic elementary and secondary schools," this canon refers more generally to "schools which offer an education imbued with a Christian spirit." The more general description of schools in canon 802, §1 may allow the diocesan bishop to satisfy his responsibility in educational settings other than the Catholic school (e.g., cooperative ventures with ecumenical partners, released time arrangements, etc.). The second change in the law designates the diocesan bishop, rather than the more inclusive "ordinary of place," as the responsible agent.

Paragraph two exhorts the diocesan bishop to take into consideration the needs of the local situation before determining what kinds of schools should be established. The canon offers the examples of professional and technical schools, but leaves open the possibility that local and contemporary needs may require other schools as well. The source of both paragraphs of the canon is Gravissimum educationis 9.

What Makes a School "Catholic"?

Canon 803 — §1. A Catholic school is understood as one which a competent ecclesiastical authority or a public ecclesiastical juridic person directs or which ecclesiastical authority recognizes as such through a written document.

§2. The instruction and education in a Catholic school must be grounded in the principles of Catholic doctrine; teachers are to be outstanding in correct doctrine and integrity of life.

§3. Even if it is in fact Catholic, no school is to bear the name Catholic school without the consent of competent ecclesiastical authority.

[6] For a discussion of the involvement of religious in the school apostolate, see The Catholic School, 74–76, and "The Catholic School on the Threshold of the Third Millennium," 13.

Canon 803 addresses the specific character of the Catholic school, namely, what makes a school Catholic. The canon offers both extrinsic and intrinsic criteria. Paragraph one considers the school's juridic relationship to competent ecclesiastical authority. Under this extrinsic criterion, to be Catholic the school must be under the direction of church authority or a public juridic person (cf. cc. 113–123), or it must be recognized by church authority, through a written document, as a Catholic school.

Diocesan schools are supervised by the diocesan bishop or his delegate. Parish schools are under the supervision of the pastor who carries out his responsibilities "under the authority of the diocesan bishop" (c. 519). Schools established and operated by religious institutes are supervised by the sponsoring religious institutes which are by law themselves public ecclesiastical juridic persons (c. 634, §1). Yet such schools can be established only with the consent of the diocesan bishop (c. 801) and are subject to oversight by the diocesan bishop (c. 806, §1). Schools established by and operated under the sponsorship of the laity can be considered "Catholic" only after they have received a written document from competent ecclesiastical authority. The canon offers no criteria for a bishop's decision to grant or deny this designation to a school in the latter category.

Paragraph three provides further that no school, even if it is truly Catholic, can use the name "Catholic" without the consent of competent church authority. Authorization by competent ecclesiastical authority to use the name "Catholic" is a legal criterion, similar to the requirement of canon 216 concerning apostolic undertakings of the Christian faithful and canon 808 with regard to colleges and universities wishing to use the name "Catholic." Derived from Apostolicam actuositatem 24 on relations with the hierarchy, canon 803, §3 reflects the Church's concern that forms of the apostolate that assist the Church in fulfilling its mission be explicitly recognized by competent church authority (AA 24).

The juridic bond that exists between the diocesan bishop and the Catholic school, though essential to the Catholic identity of the school, is not in itself sufficient to guarantee the school's Catholic character. Paragraph two speaks of two intrinsic criteria, namely, the commitment to root the formational and educational experience in the principles of Catholic teaching and the expectation that teachers in Catholic schools be outstanding in their teaching of doctrine and their moral integrity.

Like the Latin code, the Eastern code requires both extrinsic and intrinsic criteria for determining a school's catholicity. The Eastern code, however, provides a fuller, more comprehensive description of the Catholic school. Canon 634, §1 of the Eastern code adopts the seminal definition of the Catholic school expressed in Gravissimum educationis 8, not incorporated into the Latin code. The canon highlights the importance of the "spirit of freedom and love" in the Catholic school community and an atmosphere conducive to the development of the Christian personality of each young person. It stresses the importance of integrating appropriate cultural development with knowledge illumined by a greater understanding of faith. The canon also, unlike the Latin code, calls for appropriate educational adaptations in situations in which non-Catholic students are present.

Vigilance for Catholic Religious Formation and Education

Canon 804 — §1. The Catholic religious instruction and education which are imparted in any schools whatsoever or are provided through the various instruments of social communication are subject to the authority of the Church. It is for the conference of bishops to issue general norms about this field of action and for the diocesan bishop to regulate and watch over it.

§2. The local ordinary is to be concerned that those who are designated teachers of religious instruction in schools, even in non-Catholic ones, are outstanding in correct doctrine, the witness of a Christian life, and teaching skill.

Paragraph one provides a framework for ensuring the distinctive Catholic character of the Catholic school. It clearly states that Catholic religious formation and education are subject to the authority of the Church, whether they are provided in Catholic schools or in any other type of school (quibuslibet) or by means of any form of social communication (e.g., films, recordings, telecommunications, print media, etc.). Responsibility is assigned to church authority at two levels: the episcopal conference for issuance of general regulations governing religious formation and education, and the diocesan bishop for vigilance and supervision of such educational efforts. The extension of this norm to any school whatsoever raises the issue of control and oversight of institutions and situations not subject to the governance of the diocesan bishop. Catholic religious education, however, is subject to church authority, in virtue of its teaching mission, and to those entrusted with responsibility for carrying out this mission. Religious education carried out in Catholic schools or in other educational settings, including a home-schooling setting, falls within the scope of this canon. The precise way in which the vigilance role is structured in non-Catholic situations should take into account local political and cultural circumstances.

Paragraph two focuses on one aspect of the religious education programs in Catholic and non-Catholic schools, namely, the quality of the teachers of religion. The responsibility of the diocesan bishop for vigilance and supervision of the religious education effort is shared in paragraph two with the local ordinary (cf. c. 134). The canon cites three areas in which teachers of religion are to be distinguished: the teaching of Catholic doctrine, the witness of their lives, and their skills as teachers. The expression of pastoral concern called for in the canon is not described. It is left to the judgment of the local ordinary to determine the appropriate form of expression in each local situation in accord with any national norms issued by the episcopal conference.

Approval and Removal of Religion Teachers

Canon 805 — For his own diocese, the local ordinary has the right to appoint or approve teachers of religion and even to remove them or demand that they be removed if a reason of religion or morals requires it.

This canon specifies the authority of the local ordinary and extends it to the right of appointing and removing teachers of religion. This authority can be delegated to others such as an episcopal vicar for education, superintendent, school administrator, etc. (cf. c. 134). The canon points to such a possibility in the use of "or approve" and "or demand that they be removed," suggesting that an intermediate level of authority might be involved in the appointment process in certain situations. Moreover, the 1981 Relatio confirms this suggestion and states that local practice should be respected: "It is to be noted that the canon looks to either nomination or approval as an appropriate equivalent where it is not the custom to nominate" (p. 180). The Eastern code in canon 636, §1 authorizes the eparchial bishop to name or approve teachers of Catholic religion as well as remove them or demand their removal for reasons of faith or morals.

Canon 805 roots the removal of religion teachers in the general reasons "of religion or morals." Practically speaking, offenses or deficiencies of faith and morals would have to be of a serious nature to warrant removal. In such cases, the need for appropriate protection of substantive and procedural rights of all parties involved should be respected and observed.

Vigilance and Visitation of Catholic Schools

Canon 806 — §1. The diocesan bishop has the right to watch over and visit the Catholic schools in his territory, even those which members of religious institutes have founded or direct. He also issues prescripts which pertain to the general regulation of Catholic schools; these prescripts are valid also for schools which these religious direct, without prejudice, however, to their autonomy regarding the internal direction of their schools.

§2. Directors of Catholic schools are to take care under the watchfulness of the local ordinary that the instruction which is given in them is at least as academically distinguished as that in the other schools of the area.

Paragraph one is a strong assertion of the diocesan bishop's right of vigilance over and visitation of Catholic schools in his territory including schools sponsored by religious institutes (cf. c. 803). By extending the right of visitation to schools operated by religious institutes, canon 806, §1 abrogates the privilege granted prior to the 1917 code which exempted the schools of some religious (regulars) from visitation by the diocesan bishop (CD 35, 4).[7]

In determining what schools fall under the bishop's right of visitation, the text of the canon, "Catholic schools," and the context of the norm, its placement in the chapter on elementary and secondary schools, provide some direction. Since the code distinguishes among schools, universities and institutes of higher studies, and ecclesiastical universities and faculties, and regulates the latter two groups elsewhere in the code, the application of the bishop's right of visitation as enunciated in canon 806, §1 is focused on elementary and secondary Catholic schools. This line of reasoning is consistent with that of the code commission as stated in the Relatio: "Universities and institutes of higher studies do not come under the chapter on schools" (p. 179). Internal schools of religious institutes which are open only to students belonging to the respective institute are excluded from the bishop's right of visitation by canon 683, §1 (cf. ES I, 39).

The canon does not provide guidance for the scope of the bishop's visitation, particularly as it concerns schools operated by religious. However, since this canon has to do with the bishop's responsibility and oversight for the quality of Catholic education provided in his diocese, his visitation should focus on those aspects of the program that affect the faith development of the students most directly.

Canon 806, §1 also authorizes the diocesan bishop to issue regulations governing the educational policies of Catholic schools described in canon 803, §1 as well as schools operated by religious institutes. These general regulations should not prejudice the legitimate autonomy religious have in directing their own schools (e.g., hiring of teachers and staff). Both sections of paragraph one are based on Christus Dominus 35, 4.

Paragraph two is directed to school administrators and focuses on the quality of the educational program in the school. It exhorts those responsible for the instructional program to see to it that the curriculum is as academically excellent as that of nearby schools. Though not explicitly stated, paragraph two reflects the ideals of Catholic education expressed in Gravissimum educationis 8–9.

CHAPTER II
CATHOLIC UNIVERSITIES AND OTHER INSTITUTES OF HIGHER STUDIES
[cc. 807–814]

The canons contained in this brief chapter are new. No parallel chapter existed in the 1917 code. Since the promulgation of the code, few, if any, sections of the revised law have received such attention, discussion, and scrutiny as have the canons on Catholic higher education. Canons 807–814 concern specifically Catholic universities and other institutes of higher education and are distinct from those dealing with Catholic schools (cc. 796–806) and ecclesiastical universities and faculties (cc. 815–821). Drawn principally from Gravissimum educationis 10, the canons in this chapter generally reflect the conciliar understanding of the university as a place of convergence between faith and reason, identify ways in which a university can be Catholic, acknowledge the importance of research and freedom of scientific inquiry, and specify the role of ecclesiastical authority in the preservation of doctrinal integrity.

[7] Cf. T. Bouscaren and A. Ellis, Canon Law: A Text and Commentary (Milwaukee: Bruce Publishing Co., 1946) 700–701.

At the time the code was promulgated it was well known among members of the hierarchy and the leadership of Catholic colleges and universities that a pontifical document on Catholic universities was being prepared by the Holy See. In the years immediately following the promulgation of the revised code, numerous drafts of the proposed document were prepared and reviewed by means of a highly consultative process involving the hierarchy and representatives of Catholic higher education throughout the world. The long-awaited apostolic constitution Ex corde Ecclesiae was issued by Pope John Paul II on August 15, 1990.[8] Thus, it is a lex peculiaris or special law governing Catholic institutions of higher learning. Ex corde Ecclesiae contains a strong affirmation of the value and importance of Catholic colleges and universities and a call to renewal and re-examination of Catholic higher education in light of the gospel and culture.

Essentially a teaching document, Ex corde Ecclesiae is intended to serve as "a sort of 'magna carta'" for Catholic universities (ECE 8). In addition to providing doctrinal and theological perspectives on Catholic universities, the apostolic constitution is also a legal document containing a series of "general norms" based on the Code of Canon Law and complementary church legislation governing Catholic universities (ECE, General Norms, article 1, §1).[9]

Since the appearance of Ex corde Ecclesiae, U.S. bishops and presidents of Catholic colleges and universities in the United States have worked together in a common effort to implement article 1, §2 of the general norms which requires episcopal conferences (and other assemblies of Catholic hierarchy in the Eastern Catholic churches) to apply the norms concretely at the local and regional levels. This effort has been marked by a level of cooperation and collaboration never before experienced between bishops and Catholic college and university presidents.

Following the promulgation of Ex corde Ecclesiae, Archbishop Daniel E. Pilarczyk, president of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops, appointed Bishop John J. Leibrecht, Bishop of Springfield-Cape Giradeau, to serve as chairman of the NCCB Ad Hoc Committee on the Implementation of Ex corde Ecclesiae.[10] He also appointed presidential consultants and resource persons to assist the committee.[11] The committee worked from February 1991 through November 1996 preparing ordinationes for the application of Ex corde Ecclesiae in the United States for submission to the U.S. bishops for approval and subsequent submission to the Holy See for the required recognitio in accord with canon 455, §2.

The first major draft of the proposed document was the focus of extensive consultation with members of the hierarchy, sponsoring religious

[8] John Paul II, apconst Ex corde Ecclesiae, August 15, 1990, AAS 82 (1990) 1475–1509; English translation published in Origins 20/17 (October 4, 1990) 265, 267–276.

[9] A few commentaries have been written on Ex corde Ecclesiae. See, for example, J. Provost, "A Canonical Commentary on Ex corde Ecclesiae," in J. Langan, ed., Catholic Universities in Church and Society: A Dialogue on 'Ex corde Ecclesiae' (Washington, D.C.: Georgetown University, 1993) 105–136; P. de Pooter, "L'Université catholique: Au service de l'Eglise et de la société," Ius Ecclesiae 4 (1992) 45–78.

[10] Other members of the committee include: Cardinals Adam Maida and James Hickey; Archbishops Oscar H. Lipscomb and Francis B. Schulte; Bishops James A. Griffin and James W. Malone.

[11] Appointed as presidential consultants were: Reverend William J. Byron, SJ (The Catholic University of America), Dr. Dorothy McKenna Brown (Rosemont College), Brother Raymond Fitz, SM (The University of Dayton), Dr. Norman C. Francis (Xavier University of Louisiana), Sister Karen M. Kennelly, CSJ (Mount St. Mary's College-Los Angeles), Reverend Edward A. Malloy, CSC (University of Notre Dame), Reverend J. Donald Monan, SJ (Boston College), and Dr. Matthew Quinn (Carroll College). Resource persons: Sister Alice Gallin, OSU (Association of Catholic Colleges and Universities), Monsignor Frederick McManus (The Catholic University of America).

bodies, learned societies, presidents, faculty members, and trustees of Catholic colleges and universities throughout the country. The various consultations helped identify key issues that called for continued dialogue between bishops and university officials. Among the more challenging issues facing the committee were the relationship between church authority and institutional authority, the scope and limitations of academic freedom, elements and visible expressions of Catholic identity in Catholic colleges and universities, and the meaning of the mandate of canon 812 for Catholic professors of theological disciplines in Catholic colleges and universities and its implications for Catholic postsecondary institutions in the United States.

Because the draft appeared to be unsatisfactory as too juridical, a final draft, more pastoral in character (containing three parts, each one with separate expository and normative sections) was submitted by the committee to the members of the episcopal conference in 1996.

In November 1996 the proposed document, "Ex corde Ecclesiae: An Application to the United States," a general decree requiring the affirmative vote of a two-thirds majority of the de iure members of the episcopal conference, was overwhelmingly approved by the bishops by a vote of 224 affirmative and 6 negative.

Immediately following the action of the bishops, the approved text was transmitted to the Prefect of the Congregation for Catholic Education for review and recognitio. In April 1997, Pio Cardinal Laghi, prefect of the Congregation for Catholic Education, wrote to Bishop Anthony M. Pilla, president of the NCCB, requesting that a further draft of the "ordinances" be drawn up in light of observations on the text from the Congregation for Catholic Education. In its general observations, the congregation indicated that the text lacked the "necessary juridical elements" for the effective functioning of the Catholic university as "Catholic"; that the ordinances were to have a true juridic character; and that the structure of the ordinances reflect more explicitly the essential elements required by the general norms. Cardinal Laghi also informed Bishop Pilla that the revised text, following approval by the Congregation for Catholic Education, would be forwarded to the Congregation for Bishops which is competent to grant the recognitio.[12]

The process for the development of the new draft was initiated with the appointment of a subcommittee of canonists, under the chairmanship of Anthony Cardinal Bevilacqua, to review the observations of the Holy See and to provide the text with appropriate canonical language and, specifically, to offer recommendations regarding the implementation of canon 812. The subcommittee's work will be presented to the Implementation Committee for its consideration and possible adoption. The Implementation Committee will present its text for approbation by the bishops and submission to the Holy See.

Right to Establish and Govern Universities

Canon 807 — The Church has the right to erect and direct universities, which contribute to a more profound human culture, the fuller development of the human person, and the fulfillment of the teaching function of the Church.

The first canon of this chapter provides a strong assertion of the Church's right to establish and operate institutions of higher education and offers a description of the purpose of such institutions. Catholic colleges and universities contribute to: (1) the advancement of human culture; (2) the development of the human person; and (3) fulfillment of the Church's teaching mission. The canon is drawn from Gravissimum educationis 10 which guarantees to the various disciplines in a Catholic university treatment that is consonant with their own principles and methods and carried out with freedom of scientific inquiry (c. 218).

[12] For the texts of "Ex corde Ecclesiae: An Application to the United States," Cardinal Laghi's letter of April 23, 1997, and the Observations of the Congregation for Catholic Education, see Origins 27:4 (June 12, 1997) 53–55.

The object of this impartial inquiry is to ensure that the Catholic university becomes, through a deeper understanding of the disciplines and attentiveness to changing circumstances and research, the place where faith and reason converge (GE 10). John Paul II speaks to this rationale for a Catholic university in Ex corde Ecclesiae:

> ... a Catholic university is distinguished by its free search for the whole truth about nature, man and God. The present age is in urgent need of this kind of disinterested service, namely of proclaiming the meaning of truth, that fundamental value without which freedom, justice and human dignity are extinguished. By means of a kind of universal humanism a Catholic university is completely dedicated to the research of all aspects of the truth in their essential connection with the supreme Truth, who is God. ... It is in the context of the impartial search for truth that the relationship between faith and reason is brought to light and meaning. (ECE 4, 5)

Use of the Title "Catholic"

Canon 808 — Even if it is in fact Catholic, no university is to bear the title or name of Catholic university without the consent of competent ecclesiastical authority.

This canon provides a legal distinction between colleges and universities that are in fact (reapse) Catholic and those that are authorized to use the title or name "Catholic."[13] The permission of competent ecclesiastical authority is required for a college or university to call itself "Catholic." Derived from Apostolicam actuositatem 24, the canon reflects the conciliar teaching on apostolic endeavors initiated by the laity and the relationship of the hierarchy to such enterprises, namely that no apostolic enterprise may claim the name "Catholic" without authorization from competent church authority. Although similar to canon 803, §3 on elementary and secondary schools, canon 808 does not describe precisely what a Catholic university is in the same way that canon 803, §3 describes a Catholic school. Ex corde Ecclesiae presents a classification of existing Catholic universities (ECE, art. 1, §3) as well as categories for the future establishment of Catholic universities (ECE, art. 3).

The application of this norm in practice, that is, the criteria used to grant or deny authorization, is not provided in the code. Interestingly, Ex corde Ecclesiae makes no explicit reference to this requirement. It does, however, provide guidance for its application in its enunciation of "essential characteristics" of a Catholic university as "Catholic":

> 1. A Christian inspiration not only of individuals but of the university community as such; 2. a continuing reflection in the light of the Catholic faith upon the growing treasury of human knowledge, to which it seeks to contribute by its own research; 3. fidelity to the Christian message as it comes to us through the Church; 4. an institutional commitment to the service of the people of God and of the human family in their pilgrimage to the transcendent goal which gives meaning to life. (ECE 13)[14]

The apostolic constitution summarizes Catholic identity in stating that "being both a University and Catholic, it must be both a community of scholars representing various branches of human knowledge, and an academic institution in which [13] See also canon 216 on apostolic endeavors and canon 300 on associations of the Christian faithful.

[14] For the source document of these characteristics, ECE cites "The Catholic University in the Modern World," the final document of the Second International Congress of Delegates of Catholic Universities, Rome, November 20–29, 1972, Section 1. For text, see A. Gallin, American Catholic Higher Education: Essential Documents 1967–1990 (Notre Dame, Ind.: University of Notre Dame, 1992) 37–57.

Catholicism is vitally present and operative" (ECE 14).

The Eastern code provides a more detailed explanation of the nature, purpose, and characteristics of Catholic universities. Several of the canons on Catholic universities in the Eastern code differ from the Latin code's canons in regard to the definition of the goals of Catholic universities (CCEO 640, §1), the pursuit of academic disciplines (CCEO 641), and the authority competent to establish or approve Catholic universities (CCEO 642). Eastern code canons 640, §1 and 641, based on Gravissimum educationis 10, are taken almost verbatim from the conciliar source. Eastern code canon 642 authorizes the higher administrative authority of a church sui iuris (e.g., patriarch with synod) to establish or approve a Catholic university following consultation with the Holy See. No explicit provision parallel to canon 808 is found in the Eastern code.

Right of Episcopal Conferences to Establish Universities

Canon 809 — If it is possible and expedient, conferences of bishops are to take care that there are universities or at least faculties suitably spread through their territory, in which the various disciplines are studied and taught, with their academic autonomy preserved and in light of Catholic doctrine.

Echoing the teaching of Gravissimum educationis 10, this canon is directed to the episcopal conference and obliges the bishops to see to the establishment of Catholic universities or Catholic faculties throughout the territory of their conference. The obligation takes into account local circumstances and applies only if it is possible and expedient. The purpose of these universities and faculties, though described briefly in the canon, is significant for the standard it sets for Catholic universities, namely, the preservation of academic autonomy with due regard for Catholic teaching.

Ex corde Ecclesiae speaks eloquently to the importance of this standard:

> Every Catholic university...possesses that institutional autonomy necessary to perform its functions effectively and guarantees its members academic freedom, so long as the rights of the individual person and of the community are preserved within the confines of truth and the common good. (ECE 12)[15]

Drawn from Gaudium et spes 59, the apostolic constitution expresses three elements which constitute the boundaries of academic freedom: respect for the rights of others (individuals and community); respect for the confines of truth; respect for the common good. While not enunciated in canon 809, they continue to serve as limitations on the exercise of academic freedom.[16]

As a goal to be achieved or a standard against which a Catholic university may be measured, the educational function described in canon 809 is difficult to particularize in practice. Practical judgments on the part of the appropriate authorities will have to be made, with due caution.

Responsibility for the Appointment of Teachers and Observance of Catholic Doctrine

Canon 810 — §1. The authority competent according to the statutes has the duty to make provision so that teachers are appointed in Catholic universities who besides their scientific and pedagogical qualifications are outstanding in integrity of doctrine and probity of life and that they are removed from their function when they lack these requirements; the manner of proceeding defined in the statutes is to be observed.

[15] See also ECE, General Norms, art. 2, §5. Paragraph 5 uses the terms "autonomy" and "freedom" in describing the nature of a Catholic university: autonomy to develop its identity and pursue its mission and freedom in research and teaching within the limits noted in n. 12 of the apostolic constitution. The phrase "academic autonomy" (scientifica autonomia) is not used in ECE.

[16] See also Gaudium et spes 62 which concludes the constitution's treatment of the development of culture and speaks as well about integrity and freedom of inquiry and expression by both lay and clerical theologians.

§2. The conferences of bishops and diocesan bishops concerned have the duty and right of being watchful so that the principles of Catholic doctrine are observed faithfully in these same universities.

Canon 810 defines the authorities competent to determine the quality of teachers appointed to Catholic universities and to watch over the observance of Catholic doctrine. It is intended to respect the legitimate autonomy of the academic institution, the Catholic character of the university, and the responsibility of competent ecclesiastical authority for the correct faithful observance of Catholic teaching in these same universities.

Regarding the appointment and removal of teachers in Catholic colleges and universities, the procedures specified in the statutes of the institution are to be carefully observed. The internal authorities of a Catholic university, in determining the suitability of candidates, are to take into consideration their "scientific and pedagogical qualifications" and their "integrity of doctrine and probity of life." Procedures for the removal of teachers lacking the same qualities should also be delineated in the statutes of the institution.

While paragraph one provides general guidance concerning acceptable norms for the appointment and removal of teachers in Catholic colleges and universities, specific criteria and procedures should be developed by the individual institutions to assist in the application of the norms. It is incumbent upon the administrative leadership of Catholic universities to ensure that the statutes of the institution embody standards of fairness and acceptable practice so as to avoid arbitrariness of judgment about the scholarship and personal witness of individual members of the faculty.[17]

Paragraph two places responsibility for vigilance over the observance of Catholic doctrine with episcopal conferences and diocesan bishops. Bishops, as successors of the apostles (c. 753), are authoritative teachers of the faith (c. 386, §1) and competent to make judgments concerning the observance of Catholic teaching. For Catholic colleges and universities, Ex corde Ecclesiae describes the role of the diocesan bishop if, in his vigilance, he determines that Catholic teaching is not being faithfully observed:

> Each Bishop has the responsibility to promote the welfare of the Catholic universities in his diocese and has the right and duty to watch over the preservation and strengthening of their Catholic character. If problems should arise concerning this Catholic character, the local Bishop is to take the initiatives necessary to resolve the matter, working with the competent university authorities in accordance with established procedures and, if necessary, with the help of the Holy See. (ECE, art. 5, §2)

Ex corde Ecclesiae describes the ius vigilandi of the diocesan bishop as a kind of pastoral oversight for the preservation and strengthening of the Catholic character of the institution. The diocesan bishop is not authorized to intervene directly into the internal matters of the Catholic university. In his role of vigilance, he is to work closely with the internal authorities, according to established procedures, to correct the situation. This process implies a relationship characterized by trust, mutual respect, and communication between the diocesan bishop and university officials. It suggests a spirit of cooperation and collaboration in the realization of the goals of the Catholic university.

Canon 810, §2 attributes to episcopal conferences the right and duty to exercise vigilance over the observance of Catholic teaching in colleges and universities. Ecclesiastical competence belongs to the individual diocesan bishop and to the episcopal conference. The canon provides neither procedures for intervention by the episcopal conference nor procedures for the resolution of possible conflicts that could arise between the bishop and the episcopal conference. Presumably, such procedures would have to be developed at the level of the episcopal conference and approved by the bishops of the territory.

[17] It is clear that the framers of §1 intended it to apply to university administrators as well as to teachers. See 1981 Relatio 182–183.

Provision for Theological Studies

Canon 811 — §1. The competent ecclesiastical authority is to take care that in Catholic universities a faculty or institute or at least a chair of theology is erected in which classes are also given for lay students.

§2. In individual Catholic universities, there are to be classes which especially treat those theological questions which are connected to the disciplines of their faculties.

Paragraph one urges ecclesiastical authority to see that educational opportunities for the study of theology are provided at Catholic colleges and universities, especially for lay students. Based on Gravissimum educationis 10, this canon offers three options for structuring a program of theology in Catholic universities: a faculty (i.e., a college, department, or the like), an institute, or a chair of theology. University officials, considering the particular local situation, are to determine the most appropriate form of theological presence. Here, as in other canons of title III, the competent ecclesiastical authority is left unspecified. It could be the Holy See, episcopal conferences, diocesan bishops, or certain religious superiors of sponsoring religious bodies.

The second paragraph of this canon reflects the concern that theological studies not be isolated from other academic disciplines in the educational enterprise. Drawn from Gravissimum educationis 10 and Gaudium et spes 62, paragraph two promotes efforts to harmonize faith and culture. Ex corde Ecclesiae, building on the conciliar teaching, describes the unique role of theology in the dialogue between faith and reason as serving all other disciplines in their search for meaning (ECE 19). At the same time, the interaction between theology and the other disciplines "enriches theology, offering it a better understanding of the world today, and making theological research more relevant to current needs" (ECE 19). The interaction inherent in such efforts to harmonize faith and culture challenges Catholic colleges and universities to seek new and more suitable means of communicating theological reflection and Catholic doctrine to the men and women of this age.

Ecclesiastical Authorization for Professors of Theological Disciplines in Catholic Colleges and Universities

Canon 812 — Those who teach theological disciplines in any institutes of higher studies whatsoever must have a mandate from the competent ecclesiastical authority.

Mandate

This canon requires ecclesiastical authorization for teachers of theological disciplines in Catholic institutions of higher learning. The canon and the notion of the mandate are innovations in the law of the Church on Catholic colleges and universities.[18] The intent of the canon is to preserve the orthodoxy of Catholic doctrine. The requirement of the mandate represents a juridical response to a potential danger to the faith and an effort to protect the rights of the faithful and the good of the Church.

Following promulgation of the revised code in 1983 there was considerable apprehension and concern in U.S. academe about the innovation of the mandate. This was due primarily to the perception that implementation of the mandate of canon 812 would mean new intervention on the part of church authority in Catholic higher education.

The precise meaning of the mandate (mandatum) is not clear. Early drafts of canon 812 required a canonical mission (missio canonica) for those who taught theological or related disciplines in any kind of institution of higher learning (1977 schema, c. 64). In the 1980 schema, the wording of this canon was the same as in the 1977 text. The 1981 Relatio, in response to concerns about the new requirement, contained two significant changes in the text of the canon: aut cum theolo-

[18] See also canon 229, §3 for reference to the mandate.

gia conexas was dropped and mandatum was substituted for missio canonica, the reasoning being that the ecclesiastical authorization under consideration was not fully equivalent to a true canonical mission.[19] No explanation was offered as to why "canonical mission" in this context would not be a "true canonical mission."

The notion of canonical mission (missio canonica) as applied to teaching in the Church is rooted in conciliar legislation of the Middle Ages concerning requirements for preaching. Condemnations against those who held positions that denied the necessity of ecclesiastical authorization for preaching were issued, for example, by the Council of Verona in 1184, the Fourth Lateran Council, the Council of Constance, and the Council of Trent.[20] Later, in the nineteenth century, canonical mission was applied more broadly to all public instruction with the federalization of schools and universities in Germany. The Church required all teachers of theology to have an ecclesiastical (canonical) mission from the bishop to ensure freedom from intervention by the state in the teaching of theology at all levels of education.[21]

In the 1917 code the term missio canonica was used to describe the principal means of acquiring the power of jurisdiction, a power that could be exercised only by clergy. Yet commentators on the 1917 code applied the term to liturgical preaching and to the entire ministry of teaching, including catechetical teaching. The basis of this usage was canon 1328 which used the term missio to describe the authorization needed for the ministry of preaching. The placement of canon 1328 in the 1917 code and the organization of the section in which the canon appeared supported the opinion that the missio required in the canons applied to the broader ministry of teaching, including catechetical teaching as well as preaching.

At the same time, the application of canon 1328 to the entire ministry of ecclesiastical teaching raised questions regarding the practical application of the missio to lay persons. While the missio of canon 1328 of the 1917 code was understood as ecclesiastical authorization to perform a special function, it was considered to be a form of authorization distinct from the missio canonica of the same code.

The requirement of a canonical mission for some form of public ecclesiastical teaching became an explicit part of universal law in the norms of the 1931 apostolic constitution Deus scientiarum Dominus governing ecclesiastical faculties and universities.[22] Among the requirements for faculty selection was the provision that each professor receive a "canonical mission" for teaching from the chancellor after having received the nihil obstat from the Holy See.

In 1979, the apostolic constitution Sapientia christiana was promulgated by Pope John Paul II. This document, replacing the previous norms regulating ecclesiastical faculties and universities, retains the requirement of a canonical mission for teachers of disciplines related to faith and morals; other teachers require permission to teach (venia docendi).[23]

The deletion of missio canonica and the insertion of mandatum in the final version of canon 812 of the revised code does not suggest that the [19] Communicationes 15 (1983) 105.

[20] See Concilium Veronense, C. 9, X de haereticis, V. 7; Concilium Lateranense IV, C. 3, X de haereticis, V. 7; Martinus V, bull Inter cunctas, February 22, 1418, art. 14; Concilium Tridentinum, sessio XXIII, de ecclesiastica hierarchia et ordinatione, c. 7. For references to Lateran Council IV and Council of Trent, see Tanner 1: 234–235 and II: 744, respectively. For texts of the Council of Verona and the bull Inter cunctas, see Denzinger, Enchiridion Symbolorum: Definitionum et Declarationum de Rebus Fidei et Morum (Freiburg: Herder, 1963) 761/402 and 1164/594, respectively.

[21] See, for example, H. Flatten, "Missio Canonica," in Verkundigung und Glaube: Festschrift für Franz X. Arnold, ed. T. Filthaut and J. Jungmann (Freiburg-Br.: Herder, 1958) 123–141; J. Haring, Das Lehramt des katholischen Theologie: Festschrift des Grazer Universität für 1926 (Graz: Meyerhoff, 1926).

[22] Pius XI, apconst Deus scientiarum Dominus, May 24, 1931, AAS 23 (1931) 252, art. 21, n. 5.

[23] John Paul II, apconst Sapientia christiana, April 15, 1979, AAS 71 (1979) 469–499, art. 27, §1.

drafters considered ecclesiastical authorization unnecessary. Rather, it would seem that the deletion of missio canonica simply reflected concern about the nature of the ecclesiastical authorization required for public ecclesiastical teaching. Since the missio canonica was not considered to be "fully equated with a true canonical mission," its deletion and its replacement with mandatum seems related to the association of missio canonica with jurisdiction and the conferral of ecclesiastical office.

The use of mandatum rather than missio canonica in the promulgated version of canon 812 indicates that the "mandate" is neither a delegation nor a granting of jurisdiction. It does not give the one mandated disciplinary authority over others in the Church. Nor does it confer an ecclesiastical office.

The distinction between missio canonica and mandatum has also been sought in the Second Vatican Council's Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity.[24] In article 24 of the decree the council fathers set forth differing degrees of relationship between the lay apostolate and the hierarchy, beginning with the more remote relationships and moving to closer relationships in which the laity are fully subject to the hierarchy. In so doing, the council taught that there are certain forms of the apostolate of the laity which the hierarchy joins more closely to its own apostolic endeavors without depriving the apostolate of the laity of its own nature, individuality, and initiative. This act of joining some forms of the apostolate of the laity to that of the hierarchy is called a mandatum.

The same article 24 refers to another form of relationship between the laity and hierarchy in which the hierarchy "entrusts" to the laity some functions that are more closely connected with the pastoral duties of the hierarchy. Such functions include the teaching of Christian doctrine, certain liturgical actions, and the care of souls. The decree uses the term missio to describe those "entrusted" functions that are fully subject to the direction of the hierarchy.

Although this distinction may provide some insight into the meaning of the mandatum of canon 812, it is not all that clear. From the earliest discussion of the Preparatory Commission on the Apostolate of the Laity it was obvious that no real clarity existed on the meaning of "mandate." The concept was confused with the notion of canonical mission and with other juridical meanings of "mandate." The Conciliar Commission for the Apostolate of the Laity made further attempts to clarify the distinction between mandate and canonical mission by appending lengthy explanatory notes to the 1963 schema.[25] One of the explanatory notes listed the areas of apostolic activity requiring a missio canonica, which included teaching Christian doctrine in a public manner.[26]

The final text of the decree was presented in 1965; it contained no changes in the distinction between mandatum and missio canonica. Further clarity in the application of the two notions was lost as a result of the Conciliar Commission's decision to delete the accompanying explanatory notes.

What does seem clear from the promulgated decree is that the council considered missio and mandatum to be two distinct concepts. Mission connotes entrusting to the laity certain tasks and certain offices which are considered to be proper to the hierarchy but which require neither the power of orders nor the power of jurisdiction for their lawful exercise. Mandate refers to those apostolic activities which remain activities proper to the laity in virtue of baptism, but which, at times, are joined more closely to the apostolic responsibility of the bishop. When acting pursuant to a mandate, a lay person acts, it would seem, on his or her own and in communion with the bishop, but not in the name of the bishop or the church hierarchy.

Based on the canonical history of the notions of missio canonica and mandatum, it seems that the two concepts are distinct and that the change from "canonical mission" to "mandate" in canon 812 is not without significance. It would also seem that the meaning of the term mandatum set forth in the Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity signifies a relationship between bishops and theologians in which theology is carried out in communion with church hierarchy and in a manner respectful of the proper roles of bishops and theologians.

[24] Apostolicam actuositatem, November 18, 1965, AAS 58 (1966) 837–864, art. 24.

[25] ActSynVat III, 4:677–678.

[26] Ibid., 681.

Ex corde Ecclesiae refers to the relationship between bishops and theologians as "interrelated" whereby bishops are to encourage the "creative work" of theologians and theologians are to respect the authority of bishops and "assent to Catholic doctrine according to the degree of authority with which it is taught" (ECE 29). The apostolic constitution characterizes the relationship between bishops and theologians as one of "dialogue" (ECE 29), a notion which is indispensable in acknowledging the unique role of each participant.

In terms of the purpose of canon 812, namely, to uphold the orthodoxy of Catholic teaching, it would seem that the mandate signifies that the theologian is within the full communion of the Catholic Church and possesses the qualities set forth in canon 810 for teachers in Catholic colleges and universities, namely, "integrity of doctrine and probity of life" (c. 810, §1).

Who Is Bound?

As a legal norm, canon 812 involves a "right-and-duty" situation, that is, the granting, withdrawal, or denial of a mandate for teachers of theological disciplines. The requirement is in the nature of a restriction upon the rights of those engaged in sacred disciplines to freedom of expression and prudent expression (c. 218).[27] As a restriction on the free exercise of rights, canon 812 should be interpreted strictly, that is, as narrowly as is consistent with the ordinary meaning of the words (c. 18). Therefore, wherever the text of canon 812 is subject to differing interpretations, the stricter or narrower meaning should be given because of the context of the canon as a restriction upon the free exercise of rights.

The opening words of canon 812 identify the subject of the ecclesiastical requirement. The canon imposes the direct legal requirement to obtain a mandate on individual persons who teach or intend to teach theological disciplines in Catholic institutions of higher education. This includes lay men and women as well as clergy and religious. Canon 229, §3 recognizes the capacity of lay persons who have the necessary credentials and competence to receive this mandate to teach the sacred sciences.

This canon applies to Roman Catholics of the Latin church in virtue of canon 11 and would not apply to non-Catholics who teach theology in Catholic colleges and universities. Ex corde Ecclesiae supports this understanding when it refers to "Catholic theologians" as those who fulfill a mandate from the Church (ECE, art. 4, §3).

Theological Disciplines

Precisely what "theological disciplines" means in canon 812 is not clear. As noted above, the insertion of this term was the result of a textual change during the revision process. Canons 64 and 767 of the 1977 and 1980 schemata, respectively, described the endeavors for which authorization was required as "lectiones theologicas aut cum theologia conexas." This wording was changed in the Relatio to "disciplinas theologicas."[28] The effect of the textual change was to narrow the scope of the required authorization to "theological disciplines," omitting reference to those disciplines "connected with theology."

The meaning of "theological disciplines" might be understood in light of article 51 of the norms for the correct implementation of the apostolic constitution Sapientia christiana issued by the Congregation for Catholic Education in 1979. Under the heading of "theological disciplines,"

[27] Related canons that affirm basic ecclesial rights of the Christian faithful are canon 211 on the duty and right of the faithful to spread the gospel and canon 216 which acknowledges the right of the faithful, in accord with each one's condition and state, to promote and support apostolic undertakings of their own initiative.

[28] Communicationes 15 (1983) 57–109.

article 51 lists the following topics: scripture, fundamental, dogmatic, moral, spiritual, and pastoral theology, liturgy, church history, patrology, archeology, and canon law.[29] In looking to parallel places for the meaning of "theological disciplines," care should be taken not to broaden the notion beyond the academic disciplines of Catholic theology or beyond the disciplines that are formally theological. Programs of study focusing on pastoral ministry, methodology of religious education, comparative religion, and history and sociology of religion, for example, would seem not to be considered "theological disciplines" in the strict sense and, therefore, would be beyond the scope of canon 812.

Competent Ecclesiastical Authority

Those who teach theological disciplines in Catholic colleges and universities are to receive a mandate from "competent ecclesiastical authority." Early drafts of the canon did not designate any source for the required authorization.[30] The words "competent ecclesiastical authority" were inserted in the 1981 Relatio. The canon does not indicate precisely what authority is competent to grant the mandate.[31]

Since the authority is not specifically identified, it would seem that the canon intends there to be more than one authority in the Church competent to grant the mandate. The Holy See is surely capable of granting the mandate (c. 331). Canon 810 assigns the duty and right of vigilance over Catholic doctrine in Catholic institutions of higher learning to conferences of bishops and diocesan bishops (c. 810, §2). It would follow that such authorities would also be competent to grant the required mandate to those who teach such doctrine. Additionally, it might be argued that religious ordinaries could also grant the mandate to members of their own institutes teaching in their own institutions.

The law does not restrict the granting of the mandate to bishops or religious ordinaries personally. Therefore, as an act of ordinary executive power, it would seem that the granting of the mandate may be delegated to others according to the norms of law, arguably to lay persons as well as clerics (c. 137, §1). The extent to which others besides the diocesan bishop and the conference of bishops may be competent to grant the mandate of canon 812 will depend on the extent to which the diocesan bishop or the conference of bishops chooses to delegate such responsibility.

Procedures for Granting or Withdrawing

The code does not specify any procedures for the granting or withdrawing of the required mandate of canon 812. It does, however, provide some guidance regarding which principles should be considered in the development of such procedures to ensure fairness in their application. As noted above, canon 812 is a legal norm in the nature of a restriction of the rights of those engaged in the sacred disciplines to freedom of inquiry and prudent expression (c. 218) and, as such, should be interpreted strictly. The concluding sentence of Gaudium et spes 62 also provides guidance by assuring a lawful freedom of inquiry, thought, and expression to those who dedicate themselves to theological studies.

Procedures for the application of the canon, that is, the granting or withdrawal of the mandate, should take into account the basic human right to one's good reputation (c. 220) and the foreseeable effects upon the reputations of those involved. Such procedures should also consider the juridical protection offered in the code for the individual to vindicate or defend his or her rights before a competent forum in the Church (c. 221).

Any procedure for the application of the mandate must respect the rights of both theologians

[29] Congregation for Catholic Education, Ordinationes ad Constitutionem Apostolicam 'Sapientia christiana' (Normae speciales), art. 51, AAS 71 (1979) 513. English translation in USCC, On Ecclesiastical Universities and Faculties (1979) 69–70.

[30] See canons 64 and 767 in the 1977 and 1980 schemata, respectively.

[31] See canon 312, §1 for an example of a listing of competent church authorities.

and bishops. As teachers of the faith, bishops are to provide episcopal supervision over the transmission of the faith and to safeguard the integrity of Catholic teaching (c. 753). When the right of the bishop to protect the rights of the Church and its members to receive the faith integrally and faithfully is in tension with the theologian's rights enumerated above, mutual trust, cooperation, and dialogue are placed in jeopardy unless a just and equitable resolution is sought. Concrete application of the norms of Ex corde Ecclesiae at the local and regional levels (ECE, art. 1, §2) should take into account the rights and responsibilities of all involved in order to "forestall disputes and if such disputes arise to promote their resolution for the good of the faithful."[32]

Pastoral Care of Catholic Students

Canon 813 — The diocesan bishop is to have earnest pastoral care for students, even by erecting a parish or at least by designating priests stably for this, and is to make provision that at universities, even non-Catholic ones, there are Catholic university centers which give assistance, especially spiritual assistance, to youth.

This canon explicitly assigns to the diocesan bishop pastoral responsibility for the pastoral care of Catholic students. Based on Gravissimum educationis 10, the pastoral concern extends to students attending both Catholic and non-Catholic colleges and universities. The canon specifies what it is that the diocesan bishop is to do. He is to establish a university parish for the students or at least assign priest chaplains on a stable basis for this ministry. "Catholic university centers" are also to be provided to assist students studying at Catholic and non-Catholic institutions. The Eastern code also expresses the pastoral responsibility of the hierarchs to care for the spiritual well being of students (CCEO 645). The Eastern canon speaks of "carefully chosen and prepared Christian faithful" as exercising the pastoral ministry.

Ex corde Ecclesiae refers to "pastoral ministry" as a "constitutive element of a Catholic university" (ECE 38), a part of the mission of the Church within the university, and an opportunity for all members of the university community to "integrate faith with life" (ECE 38). The apostolic constitution views this ministry as indispensable for Catholic students as they prepare themselves for "active participation in the life of the Church" (ECE 41). It urges close cooperation between the university and the local church in providing pastoral care for the university community and invites all members of the university community "to assist in the work of pastoral ministry and to collaborate in its activities" (ECE, art. 6, §2).

Application of Canons 807–813

Canon 814 — The prescripts established for universities apply equally to other institutes of higher learning.

This canon is a terminological canon. It simply clarifies that the application of the preceding canons extends not only to universities but to all institutions of higher studies.

[32] NCCB, Doctrinal Responsibilities: Approaches to Promoting Cooperation and Resolving Misunderstandings Between Bishops and Theologians (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1989) 2.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bibliographical material for canons 793–814 can be found after the commentary on canon 833.

CHAPTER III
ECCLESIASTICAL UNIVERSITIES AND FACULTIES
[cc. 815–821]

These seven canons—the last of which properly belongs in the preceding chapter—can best be understood as a very brief summary of the special or "peculiar" law governing postsecondary educational institutions which are ecclesiastical in status. Perhaps "papal" or even "canonical" would be more logical than "ecclesiastical." Popularly but not correctly, ecclesiastical faculties, programs, and degrees are often called "pontifical," but this is an honorific term only. It indicates the origin and dignity of an academic institution, but not its canonical status.

Ecclesiastical universities and faculties have their own Catholic ethos and are a species of Catholic academic institutions. (This is true also of seminaries, to the extent that they too have academic programs. Seminaries, however, are governed by canons 232–264 of Book II on "The Formation of Clerics" rather than by the canons of Book III; in addition, seminaries themselves may be or may possess ecclesiastical faculties.) Nevertheless, ecclesiastical faculties are carefully distinguished from the Catholic universities, colleges, and other institutions of the preceding chapter, canons 807–814. This nomenclature and distinction have only gradually become clear in the period since the 1917 code. That code embraced institutions at every level in the single title De scholis (CIC 1372–1383) and, in dealing with institutions of higher education, treated them as directly subject to the Apostolic See and as issuing academic degrees with effects at canon law (especially CIC 1376–1378). Today the meaning of "ecclesiastical" in this connection is carefully distinguished from "Catholic."

In the United States there are no ecclesiastical universities, and the very few ecclesiastical faculties are chiefly seminaries or theologates. The single exception is The Catholic University of America in Washington: this is a Catholic rather than an ecclesiastical institution, but it has three ecclesiastical faculties, i.e., the departments of theology and canon law and a school of philosophy.

The special law is found now in the apostolic constitution Sapientia christiana of 1979 prepared under Paul VI and promulgated early in the period of John Paul II, together with ordinances or norms of application issued by the competent dicastery of the Roman Curia.[1] This constitution remains in effect in virtue of canon 6, §1, 4° of the 1983 code. The background of the special law is an apostolic constitution of Pius XI, Deus scientiarum Dominus.[2] In 1931 this lengthy document radically raised academic standards, requirements, and expectations of higher educational institutions within the Church.

In its brief declaration on Christian education, Vatican II devoted an expository paragraph to the subject, followed by a mandate to ecclesiastical faculties:

> The Church has high expectations from the work of the faculties of the sacred sciences. For to them the Church confides the very serious task of preparing its own students not only for the priestly ministry but especially for teaching in seats of higher ecclesiastical studies, for advancing branches of knowledge by their own efforts, and for undertaking the more arduous challenges of the intellectual apostolate. It is also the responsibility of these faculties to explore the various areas of the [1] April 15, 1979, AAS 71 (1979) 469–499; the Ordinationes issued by the Congregation for Catholic Education, dated April 29 of the same year, follow directly, 500–521.

[2] May 24, 1931, AAS 23 (1931) 241–262; norms of application, SCSU, Sacra Congregatio, June 6, 1931, AAS 23 (1931) 263–284.

sacred disciplines so that day by day a deeper understanding of divine revelation will be developed, the treasure of Christian wisdom handed down by our ancestors will be more fully opened up, dialogue will be fostered with our separated brothers and sisters and with non-Christians, and responses will be found to questions raised by the development of doctrine.[3]

The council then mandated that ecclesiastical faculties revise their own statutes,[4] thus in effect asking for an updating of Deus scientiarum Dominus. Instead, the Congregation for Catholic Education (formerly the Congregations for Seminaries and Universities) took the initiative and, after interim steps[5] and extensive worldwide consultation, prepared the special law of the 1979 papal constitution and the accompanying ordinances.[6]

So far as the canon law of the Eastern Catholic churches is concerned, a brief article (CCEO 646–650) is substantially similar to the corresponding canons of the Latin code, but developed in different language. No application of any canons in the chapter on "Catholic Universities" (CCEO 640–645) is made to ecclesiastical universities and faculties, as is done in the Latin church's code.

Nature and Purpose

Canon 815 — Ecclesiastical universities or faculties, which are to investigate the sacred disciplines or those connected to the sacred and to instruct students scientifically in the same disciplines, are proper to the Church by virtue of its function to announce the revealed truth.

[3] GE 11.

[4] Ibid.

[5] In particular, Normae quaedam, March 24, 1974 (n. 113/66/F).

[6] For texts, see A. Gallin, ed., American Catholic Higher Education: Essential Documents, 1967–1990 (Notre Dame, Ind.: University of Notre Dame, 1992) 63–69, 87–127.

The assertion in canon 815 is abbreviated from Gravissimum educationis 11 (quoted above) so as to refer directly to the twin research and instructional roles of institutions which cover the so-called sacred sciences, themselves supportive of the Church's mission of proclaiming revealed truth. These "ecclesiastical" universities and faculties, as already mentioned, are formally distinguished from universities, colleges, schools, and other academic institutions called "Catholic," which themselves may (and indeed should) also include sacred or religious studies as well as more general disciplines such as arts and sciences or letters, physical sciences, and professional studies.

In these ecclesiastical academic institutions the sacred sciences and subjects or disciplines related to them are, in the first place, theology, canon law, and philosophy; related areas of study embrace biblical and catechetical studies, liturgical studies, church history, and the like. Certain social studies may be included among these disciplines, such as sociology and education. As of 1979 there were some twenty-seven kinds of ecclesiastical faculties, institutes ad instar, or specialized sectors within faculties or the like.[7] Faculties—ordinarily called schools, departments, or colleges in American usage—are the principal academic entities; several of them may constitute an ecclesiastical university.

The significant point is that the many "Catholic" universities which embrace non-ecclesiastical or non-sacred disciplines already mentioned, such as arts and sciences or letters, physical sciences, and professional studies, are not included in the category covered here. Understandably, this limits greatly the number of ecclesiastical universities.

Approbation and Statutes

Canon 816 — §1. Ecclesiastical universities and faculties can be established only through erection by the Apostolic See or with its approval; their higher direction also pertains to it.

[7] Ordinances, appendix II.

§2. Individual ecclesiastical universities and faculties must have their own statutes and plan of studies approved by the Apostolic See.

The first paragraph of canon 816 makes clear that the original constitution, erection, or establishment of ecclesiastical academic entities belongs to the Apostolic See in some cases, while in others their subsequent approbation by that Roman See is enough—whether this is by way of probationary approval or definitive inclusion among such bodies. In either case canonical governance belongs formally to the Apostolic See.

At the same time, paragraph two requires that every institution have its own internal statutes of governance as well as plans or programs of studies. Statutes and programs, drawn up in accord with the canons and the special law of Sapientia christiana, in turn require Roman approval.

In the Eastern churches, besides this kind of academic institution erected by the Apostolic Roman See itself, universities and faculties erected by the "higher administrative authority of a Church sui iuris" after prior consultation with the Roman See are also considered ecclesiastical by Eastern code canons 649 and 642, §1. In particular, "within the territorial boundaries of a patriarchal Church this higher authority is the patriarch with the consent of the synod of bishops of the patriarchal Church" (CCEO 642, §2).

Academic Degrees

Canon 817 — No university or faculty which has not been erected or approved by the Apostolic See is able to confer academic degrees which have canonical effects in the Church.

The preceding canons have determined the first two characteristics of ecclesiastical universities and faculties: first and most important, the defined areas of study, namely, sacred and related disciplines; second, papal or curial constitution or approbation. Canon 817 adds a third element, the conferral of appropriate academic degrees by authority of or in the name of the Apostolic See. This reservation or limitation of degree-granting power is confined strictly to institutions that are erected or approved by the Roman See. The degrees in question are the baccalaureate, the licentiate or license, and the doctorate or laurea.

The significance of this canon, in its reference to degrees which have canonical effects in the Church—as distinct from degrees which have effects or recognition in society at large—is demonstrated in the several canons that exemplify these canonical effects: 253, §1 (doctorate or licentiate for teachers of philosophical, theological, and juridical disciplines in seminaries); 378, §1, 5° (degrees or expertise in scripture, theology, or canon law for candidates for the episcopacy); 478, §1 (degrees or expertise in canon law or theology for vicars general and episcopal vicars); 1420, §4 (doctorates or at least licentiates in canon law for judicial vicars or adjutant judicial vicars); 1421, §3 (same requirement for judges); 1435 (same requirement for promoters of justice and defenders of the bond). In the cases where an equivalent expertise is mentioned in a canon, the requirement of a canonical degree may be readily satisfied, for example, by suitable experience.

The special law may make additional requirements: for permanent teachers in ecclesiastical faculties, for example, "a suitable doctorate or equivalent title or exceptional and singular scientific accomplishment."[8] The 1979 norms of application are in turn more specific: "If the discipline is sacred or connected with the sacred, the doctorate must be canonical. In the event that the doctorate is not canonical, the teacher will usually be required to have at least a canonical licentiate."[9]

Such canonical requirements for appointments are of course over and above the recognition that such degrees with canonical effects have in the church community. It is, moreover, usual and desirable for ecclesiastical institutions to seek and obtain civil recognition of the respective ecclesiastical degrees. This may be achieved through a civil charter or certificate of incorporation (usual in the United States) or by concordat; alternatively, again by way of a civil charter or the like, an institution may confer two degrees, one canonical, one civil, for completion of a single academic program of studies.

[8] SapC 25, §1, 2.

[9] Art. 17.

Application of Canons on Catholic Universities

Canon 818 — The prescripts established for Catholic universities in cann. 810, 812, and 813 are also valid for ecclesiastical universities and faculties.

Despite the distinctive status already mentioned, canon 818 applies three canons from the chapter on "Catholic Universities and Other Institutes of Higher Studies" to the ecclesiastical institutions of this chapter. At the very least this suggests the comparable nature of the different enterprises within church life.

Canon 810 is especially important because, in virtue of canon 818, it determines that the (ordinarily internal) "authority competent according to the statutes" will have, even in ecclesiastical faculties and universities, responsibility for appointment and removal of teachers (§1). Similarly, the immediate responsibility for vigilance "that the principles of Catholic doctrine are observed faithfully" pertains first to the respective conference of bishops and next to the diocesan bishop (§2). In neither case is the ultimate power of the Apostolic See mitigated, but the principle of subsidiarity is respected.

Next, the application of canon 812 to ecclesiastical universities and faculties creates a seeming contradiction in the law. On the one hand, the special law of Sapientia christiana demands that teachers of "disciplines concerning faith or morals must receive . . . a canonical mission from the chancellor or his delegate, for they do not teach on their own authority but by virtue of the mission they have received from the Church."[10] The original language of "canonical mission" in the draft of canon 812 was deliberately changed to "mandate" (without further qualification or elaboration) as a kind of mitigation or amelioration, since "canonical mission" was felt to be less appropriate. Whatever the difference between mandate and mission, it may thus appear that the stronger expression found in Sapientia christiana remains in effect, given the further demands of that special law for teachers in ecclesiastical universities and faculties (profession of faith, grant of mission by the chancellor or delegate, declaration of nihil obstat by the Apostolic See). It is nevertheless arguable and more logical that the present canon's incorporation of canon 812 by reference suppresses the institute or usage of canonical mission in Sapientia christiana, leaving only the mandate of canon 812 in force.

The inclusion of canon 813 is a less complex requirement, namely, that the diocesan bishop is to satisfy pastoral concerns in ecclesiastical universities and faculties as well as in other academic institutions by establishing a parish or assigning priests on a stable basis, as well as by providing centers for spiritual assistance.

The Eastern code omits entirely this kind of application to ecclesiastical universities and faculties and makes no cross-reference to its canons on Catholic universities (found in CCEO 640–645).

Students

Canon 819 — To the extent that the good of a diocese, a religious institute, or even the universal Church itself requires it, diocesan bishops or the competent superiors of the institutes must send to ecclesiastical universities or faculties youth, clerics, and members, who are outstanding in character, virtue, and talent.

The canon needs little commentary. It places the duty upon diocesan bishops and superiors of religious institutes to send qualified students to the institutions of learning that undertake the mission of the sacred sciences or disciplines. The conciliar documents on Christian education and on priestly formation use similar language but without specific reference to ecclesiastical universities and faculties.[11]

[10] Art. 27, §1.

Cooperation

Canon 820 — The moderators and professors of ecclesiastical universities and faculties are to take care that the various faculties of the university offer mutual assistance as their subject matter allows and that there is mutual cooperation between their own university or faculty and other universities and faculties, even non-ecclesiastical ones, by which they work together for the greater advance of knowledge through common effort, meetings, coordinated scientific research, and other means.

Again, the canon and its desirable goals—mutual assistance of faculties, cooperation with other institutions, including non-ecclesiastical ones, and coordinated scientific research—are clear in themselves. These kinds of relationships are urged both in Sapientia christiana and, for non-ecclesiastical Catholic academic institutions, in the 1990 apostolic constitution Ex corde Ecclesiae. More important, various kinds of cooperation were strongly urged by the fathers of Vatican II.[12]

[11] See GE 10; OT 18.
[12] See GE 12; GS 62.

Establishment of Other Institutes

Canon 821 — The conference of bishops and the diocesan bishop are to make provision so that where possible, higher institutes of the religious sciences are established, namely, those which teach the theological disciplines and other disciplines which pertain to Christian culture.

This canon was originally intended for the previous chapter about Catholic institutes of higher studies (canons 807–814), as is evident from its language, since the responsibility is stated as that of the respective conference of bishops and diocesan bishop. The institutes resulting from their efforts are not thought of as having ecclesiastical status. In particular, they do not enjoy constitution or approval by the Roman See as do the universities and faculties or the like which are addressed in the present chapter of canons. Moreover, they are not governed by canons 815–820 or Sapientia christiana but by canons 807–814.

The present relocation of the canon by the commission on revision on the grounds that institutes of this kind "ought to depend entirely on ecclesiastical authority, otherwise they inevitably produce serious disagreements"[13] may thus be misleading. Nevertheless, the anomalous placement of the canon, originally designed to follow canon 814, does not detract from the hope that such institutes will be set up for religious studies, namely, theological disciplines and other areas of study important for Christian culture in general.

[13] Rel 184.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bibliographical material for canons 815–821 can be found after the commentary on canon 833.

TITLE IV
INSTRUMENTS OF SOCIAL COMMUNICATION AND BOOKS IN PARTICULAR
[cc. 822 – 832]

The canons of this title represent the latest chapter in the Church's long relationship with the media. Almost since the invention of the printing press, the Church has tried to use the means of communications for its own evangelizing and teaching purposes, while at the same time trying to protect its members from harmful exposure to media which it judged to be dangerous. The printing press was invented about the year 1455; the first general legislation in the Church on the prior censorship of books was in 1487. A set of rules on the prohibition of books was issued just after the Council of Trent in 1564; the Congregation of the Index of forbidden books was established in 1571.

The prohibition of books and the Index were finally abandoned in 1966, just after the Second Vatican Council. In 1975 the rules on the prepublication censorship of books were radically revised, and these canons reflect that revision. After an initial canon on the promotion and use of all media in pursuit of the Church's mission, most of the canons are concerned with the prior censorship of a very narrow range of official or semiofficial publications, i.e., biblical and liturgical texts, prayer books, catechisms, religious textbooks, and literature distributed in churches. The imprimatur is now limited in practice to these categories of books.

These regulations on the use of the media must be viewed against the background of the fundamental rights and duties of the Christian faithful: to help with the communication of God's message of salvation (c. 211), to make their needs and opinions known (c. 212), and to be informed (Communio et progressio 119; see commentary on c. 822).

The Eastern code treats this material in canons 651 through 666.

The Church and the Media

Canon 822 — §1. The pastors of the Church, using a right proper to the Church in fulfilling their function, are to endeavor to make use of the instruments of social communication.

§2. These same pastors are to take care to teach the faithful that they are bound by the duty of cooperating so that a human and Christian spirit enlivens the use of instruments of social communication.

§3. All the Christian faithful, especially those who in any way have a role in the regulation or use of the same instruments, are to be concerned to offer assistance in pastoral action so that the Church exercises its function effectively through these instruments.

This first canon calls for the Church to use all of the modern means of mass communication for its own central tasks of announcing the gospel message and assisting humankind. It echoes the clarion call of the council's Decree on Mass Media:

> The Catholic church has been founded by Christ our Lord to bring salvation to all and is under an obligation to proclaim the gospel. It considers it part of its mission to spread the message of salvation through the media, and to instruct people on their proper use. (IM 3)

The three paragraphs of the canon ask for three different things: (1) for the bishops to be diligent in making use of the media for the Church's purposes, (2) for those same bishops to be sure the people know their duty to try to imbue the media with an ethos that is truly human and Christian, and (3) for the faithful, especially those persons who are themselves in the media, to lend a hand with those two media-related tasks.

The canon is the single most positive and clear encouragement in the code for the Church's engagement with the communications media (which includes film, radio, television, all forms of print, and newly developing electronic forms), but several other canons repeat the theme, e.g., 747, 761, 772, §2, 779, 804, §1, 823, §1, 831, §2, 1063, 1°.

Since the media pervade and shape contemporary cultures, for better or worse, it would be difficult to overstate the importance of this challenge for the Church. The real leadership and lion's share of this huge twofold apostolic effort has been and will be borne by lay women and men as well as men's and women's religious communities.

The canon is drawn from Inter mirifica 1–3, 13, and 16, but it should be read in conjunction with two subsequent instructions from what is now called the Pontifical Council for Social Communications, Communio et progressio,[1] and Aetatis novae.[2] The corresponding canon of the Eastern code is 651; it has a slightly different tenor.

Pastoral Vigilance over Writings

Canon 823 — §1. In order to preserve the integrity of the truths of faith and morals, the pastors of the Church have the duty and right to be watchful so that no harm is done to the faith or morals of the Christian faithful through writings or the use of instruments of social communication. They also have the duty and right to demand that writings to be published by the Christian faithful which touch upon faith or morals be submitted to their judgment and have the duty and right to condemn writings which harm correct faith or good morals.

§2. Bishops, individually or gathered in particular councils or conferences of bishops, have the duty and right mentioned in §1 with regard to the Christian faithful entrusted to their care; the supreme authority of the Church, however, has this duty and right with regard to the entire people of God.

The contrast between this canon and the one preceding it is dramatic. Here "the pastors of the Church," meaning the bishops and the pope, are called upon to safeguard their people from harm. There they were urged to use the media to proclaim the gospel and to motivate the laity to suffuse the media with a human and Christian spirit. Both are functions of the Church's teaching office, one defensive, the other positive.

This entire canon was taken nearly verbatim from the introduction to the Holy Office Instruction on Vigilance over Books, Ecclesiae pastorum.[3] The subject in the instruction was "writings," but the words "or the use of instruments of social communication" were inserted in the first paragraph of the canon.

The first paragraph specifies three sets of duties and rights assigned to the bishops: (1) to be vigilant lest harm come to the faithful through writings or the use of mass media,[4] (2) to demand that writings by the faithful on faith or morals be submitted to them for judgment before publication, and (3) to reprove writings which harm faith or morals. (The English word "condemn" is an unfortunate and exaggerated translation of reprobare; it should be "reprove" or at most "denounce.") All three rights and duties are bestowed in the interest of preserving the integrity of truth.

The second paragraph makes clear who the "pastors of the Church" are: bishops, individually or gathered in conferences or local councils, for those faithful entrusted to them, and the college of bishops together with the pope for the universal Church. The Congregation for the Doctrine of the [1] May 23, 1971, AAS 63 (1971) 593–656; TPS 16 (1971) 245–283.

[2] February 2, 1992, AAS 84 (1992) 447–468; Origins 21 (1991–1992) 669–677.

[3] March 19, 1975, AAS 67 (1975) 281–284; CLD 8, 991–996.

[4] Note that the "media" are included only here; the rest of the paragraph refers exclusively to "writings."

Faith, which exercises this responsibility on behalf of the pope (see PB 51), has issued a document related to this vigilance, Instruction on Some Aspects of the Use of the Instruments of Social Communications in Promoting the Doctrine of the Faith.[5] It restates, interprets, and supplements the discipline contained in these canons.

The assignment of these daunting responsibilities and corresponding prerogatives call to mind similar broad strokes of canons 749 and 756 on infallible teaching authority and the supervision of the ministry of the word.

The duties of the bishops do not excuse or exonerate the laity, religious, and other ministers from their rightful role in this part of the teaching office; they not only read the books, and see and hear the media, but they do most of the writing and producing of them as well. Many are well qualified and duty-bound to make judgments about them and their potential for good or ill.

The second set of duties and rights, that of demanding that writings on faith or morals be submitted for pre-publication review and judgment, would seem to imply that authors or publishers have a corresponding obligation to proffer their books for that purpose. But such is not the case. Only the narrow categories of publications given in the following canons (specifically cc. 825–828) are required to be submitted. The vast majority of writings, even those on theology and morality, are not subject to prior censorship in virtue of this canon. Canon 827, §3 recommends that some writings be voluntarily submitted to the judgment of the local ordinary, but hardly any diocesan bishops or bishops' conferences have required them to be submitted.

The submission of writings for scrutiny and the process of their denunciation are restrictions on the author's and publisher's free exercise of the right of expression (cc. 212, §2 and §3, 218), and therefore these rules must be strictly interpreted (c. 18).

Canon 652 in the Eastern code covers the same ground, but somewhat more positively.

[5] March 30, 1992, Comm 24 (1992) 18–27; Origins 22:6 (June 6, 1992) 92–96.

Competent Local Ordinaries; Meaning of Books

Canon 824 — §1. Unless it is established otherwise, the local ordinary whose permission or approval to publish books must be sought according to the canons of this title is the proper local ordinary of the author or the ordinary of the place where the books are published.

§2. Those things established regarding books in the canons of this title must be applied to any writings whatsoever which are destined for public distribution, unless it is otherwise evident.

This canon, which introduces the canonical scheme for the pre-publication censorship of certain writings, speaks of three distinct matters: (1) which local ordinaries are competent to make the necessary evaluation, (2) what constitutes a "book" in these canons, and (3) the distinction between permission and approval.

(1) Location determines competence, that is, the canonical residence of the author and the publisher specify the local ordinaries who may be asked to examine the book in question, and either grant or deny the required approval or permission. The rules on domicile are canons 102–107. The term "local ordinaries" includes vicars general and episcopal vicars as well as diocesan bishops (c. 134).

If a book has multiple authors and they have diverse domiciles, any of their local ordinaries are competent. If an author has more than one domicile or both a domicile and a quasi-domicile, then any one of the author's local ordinaries can be asked. Similarly, if a publishing house has more than one official location, e.g., New York and London, the ordinaries of all those places are competent.

Authors and publishers have a right to an answer to their requests for permission or approval to publish. If one ordinary denies permission to publish, another competent ordinary may be requested to grant it; however, the author or publisher is obliged to inform the second ordinary of the prior refusal, and the second ordinary should ascertain the reasons from the first (c. 65).

(2) The canon states that "books" means "any writings whatsoever which are destined for public distribution." The criteria are "writings" intended for general availability, whether by sale or free gift. The size of the publication does not matter, nor does the mode of print production, i.e., linotype, multilith, photocopy, facsimile, etc. Books include pamphlets, tracts, and booklets as well as books. Electronic "publication" was not envisioned by the canon, e.g., e-mail, servers, websites, CD-ROMs, other Internet or World Wide Web communications; they do not require submission for approval. Journals, magazines, periodicals, and newspapers are not required to have an imprimatur; for the most part they are not among the categories of publications which need prior approval, or the frequency of their issuance prevents effective prior review.

Publications which are private, with a restricted circulation, are not considered "destined for public distribution," e.g., a professor's class notes, internal documents, reports or drafts circulated within companies, organizations, or professional societies.

Other media, sound or visual, are also not included in this category of "books"; hence recordings, audio or video, cassettes, disks, or records are not subject to prior censorship.

(3) The canon mentions two terms for indicating a favorable judgment on a book submitted for pre-publication review, "permission" (licentia) and "approval" (approbatio). Unlike the corresponding Eastern code canon 661, this canon offers no definition or description of the terms. They are virtually indistinguishable. The canons use them interchangeably, e.g., in canon 827, §4. The Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith instruction of 1992 indicates that the two have exactly the same effects (n. 7.2). It is a distinction without a difference. Both terms express an essentially negative judgment: there is nothing objectionable, nothing contrary to the Church's authentic teaching authority on faith or morals.

Only those publications specifically mentioned in the canons which follow are required to be submitted for pre-publication censorship.

Books of the Sacred Scriptures

Canon 825 — §1. Books of the sacred scriptures cannot be published unless the Apostolic See or the conference of bishops has approved them. For the publication of their translations into the vernacular, it is also required that they be approved by the same authority and provided with necessary and sufficient annotations.

§2. With the permission of the conference of bishops, Catholic members of the Christian faithful in collaboration with separated brothers and sisters can prepare and publish translations of the sacred scriptures provided with appropriate annotations.

The scriptures are a most precious heritage of the Church and the churches. As such they must be made "available to all the Christian faithful" by means of "appropriate and correct translations made into different languages" (DV 22). The purpose of this canon is to safeguard that process.

Publication of the books of the scriptures, in their original languages or in translation, must be approved in advance either by the Apostolic See or by a conference of bishops. In practice, the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith has reserved to itself the approval of vernacular translations of the scriptures if they are to be used in the liturgy, e.g., as part of the Lectionary, in virtue of canon 838, §2. The congregation's 1975 instruction, Ecclesiae pastorum 2, permitted the local ordinary to authorize publication of versions or translations of the scriptures. With the code that authority was limited to the bishops' conferences, and, in effect, to the Holy See alone. Such is the process of centralization of authority and the erosion of subsidiarity.

A set of guidelines for the ecumenical preparation of biblical translations was published by the Secretariat for Christian Unity and the United Bible Societies in 1968 and revised in 1987.[6]

[6] November 16, 1987, Enchiridion Vaticanum, v. 10 (Bologna: Dehoniane, 1989) 2266–2319.

This canon is based on Dei verbum 22 and 25, as well as on Ecclesiae pastorum 2. The corresponding canon in the Eastern code is 655.

Liturgical Books and Prayer Books

Canon 826 — §1. The prescripts of can. 838 are to be observed concerning liturgical books.

§2. To reprint liturgical books, their translations into the vernacular, or their parts, an attestation of the ordinary of the place where they are published must establish their agreement with the approved edition.

§3. Books of prayers for the public or private use of the faithful are not to be published without the permission of the local ordinary.

These rules reflect the Church's concerns for the authenticity of the liturgical and devotional life of its members. The entire canon is derived immediately from the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith instruction Ecclesiae pastorum 3, but similar regulations were included in the 1917 code, canons 1257, 1390, and 1385, §1, 2°. The conciliar sources for the first paragraph demonstrate a concern for the adaptation and inculturation of the liturgy and other prayerful practices, as well as for their approval by competent authority.[7]

The first paragraph simply refers to canon 838 which designates the roles of the Apostolic See, episcopal conferences, and diocesan bishops in the supervision of the liturgy and the issuance of liturgical books.

The second paragraph specifies the duty of the local ordinary of the place of publication to attest that newly issued liturgical books or their vernacular translations accurately conform to the official texts. The judgment is expressed as concordat cum originali. The additional burdens of authorizations, permissions, copyrights, and royalty payments for liturgical publications are nicely summarized by J. M. Gonzalez del Valle in his commentary on canon 826.[8]

[7] SC 22.2, 36, 39, 40, OE 5, UR 15, AG 22, GS 58.

[8] Pamplona ComEng, 536.

The International Commission for English in the Liturgy (ICEL) prepares translations of liturgical texts for the Catholic churches of the English-speaking world.

The third paragraph illustrates the vital role of genuine Christian piety or popular religious practices and the Church's concern for their doctrinal and spiritual authenticity within the wide boundaries of the Church's many spiritual traditions (see cc. 214 and 839, and SC 12 and 13). The local ordinary is to give permission for the publication of prayer books, whether for public or private use. These include books or pamphlets of prayers or devotions, but not books on spirituality, meditation books, or aids in spiritual development.

Canons 656 and 657 of the Eastern code roughly correspond to this canon.

Catechisms, Textbooks, and Books Available in Churches

Canon 827 — §1. To be published, catechisms and other writings pertaining to catechetical instruction or their translations require the approval of the local ordinary, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 775, §2.

§2. Books which regard questions pertaining to sacred scripture, theology, canon law, ecclesiastical history, and religious or moral disciplines cannot be used as texts on which instruction is based in elementary, middle, or higher schools unless they have been published with the approval of competent ecclesiastical authority or have been approved by it subsequently.

§3. It is recommended that books dealing with the matters mentioned in §2, although not used as texts in instruction, as well as writings which especially concern religion or good morals are submitted to the judgment of the local ordinary.

§4. Books or other writings dealing with questions of religion or morals cannot be exhibited, sold, or distributed in churches or oratories unless they have been published with the permission of competent ecclesiastical authority or approved by it subsequently.

This canon requires an imprimatur for three distinct categories of books: (1) catechisms and other catechetical instructional writings, (2) textbooks in areas related to scripture, theology, and other sacred disciplines, and (3) writings on religion or morality which are displayed, sold, or given away in church. All three, like the liturgical books (c. 826) and collections of ecclesiastical decrees (c. 828), are the kinds of publications which people often consider or assume to be "official and reliable."

The categories must be narrowly construed because the requirement of submitting such books for censorship is a restriction of the right of expression (c. 18).

All four paragraphs of this canon are drawn from the 1975 Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith instruction Ecclesiae pastorum 4; the first three were more remotely derived from the similar but more sweeping categories required by canon 1385, §1, 2° of the 1917 code.

The ecclesiastical authority competent to grant the required approvals or permissions are the local ordinaries identified in canon 824, §1.

(1) Catechisms and other writings related to catechetical formation include things like workbooks, teachers' manuals, and similar materials, but not writings about catechetics or the teaching of religion. Translations of these writings require approval even though the originals were approved in order to assure that the translated texts are appropriately expressed for their new linguistic and cultural setting.

(2) Textbooks are those written and used for classroom instruction; they outline the course and provide the written material upon which it is based. Books of supplemental readings for reference or background purposes, even when used as required readings for courses, are not included under the canon. The textbooks requiring approval before or after publication are those on sacred scripture, theology, canon law, church history, and religious or moral disciplines. The great bulk of religious and theological publications are neither written nor used as textbooks. The canon refers to schools at all levels, from primary school through college, at least those which are officially Catholic (c. 803).

The third paragraph of the canon recommends that the foregoing categories of books and all those writings related to religion or morality, even though not textbooks, be voluntarily submitted to the judgment of the local ordinary. This sometimes occurs, since such approval might enhance the value of some kinds of books and provide assurance to concerned readers, but the practice is not widespread.

(3) Books and pamphlets dealing with matters of religion or morals which are displayed, sold, or distributed in church are to receive the approval of a local ordinary prior to or after publication. The prior permission (licentia) or subsequent approval (approbatio) mean no more here than elsewhere; that is, they are essentially negative judgments that the works are not harmful to faith or morals.

The 1990 Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches treats these same matters somewhat differently in canons 658, 659, and 665.

Collections of Acts or Decrees

Canon 828 — It is not permitted to reprint collections of decrees or acts published by some ecclesiastical authority unless the prior permission of the same authority has been obtained and the conditions prescribed by it have been observed.

The canon's prohibition is limited to *re*publication of collections of decrees (official legislative or administrative enactments) or acts (official proceedings). But it is broader than canon 1389 of the 1917 code on which it is based; that canon referred only to collections of decrees of the congregations of the Roman Curia. This one includes other ecclesiastical authorities, e.g., individual bishops, conferences of bishops, or chapters of religious congregations. It does not extend to purely historical documents.

The obvious concern is for the accuracy and completeness of such official rules and records.

However, there can also be issues of copyright and royalty payments.

The canon is a rather curious remnant of Pope Leo XIII's 1897 constitution[9] on the prohibition and censure of books on which the 1917 code's treatment of this whole area was based. This provision was not included in the 1990 Eastern code.

Permissions Limited to Original Texts

Canon 829 — The approval or permission to publish some work is valid for the original text but not for new editions or translations of the same.

When ecclesiastical approval for a publication is obtained, it applies only to the original text submitted for judgment, not to subsequent editions or translations of it. Those later texts could vary substantially from the original. However, a simple reprinting of the original work is not considered a new edition.[10]

Censors of Books

Canon 830 — §1. The conference of bishops can compile a list of censors outstanding in knowledge, correct doctrine, and prudence to be available to diocesan curias or can also establish a commission of censors which local ordinaries can consult; the right of each local ordinary to entrust judgment regarding books to persons he approves, however, remains intact.

§2. In fulfilling this office, laying aside any favoritism, the censor is to consider only the doctrine of the Church concerning faith and morals as it is proposed by the ecclesiastical magisterium.

§3. A censor must give his or her opinion in writing; if it is favorable, the ordinary, according to his own prudent judgment, is to grant permission for publication to take place, with his name and the time and place of the permission granted expressed. If he does not grant permission, the ordinary is to communicate the reasons for the denial to the author of the work.

This canon awkwardly describes the way that the process of prior censorship is supposed to work. It is derived almost verbatim from Ecclesiae pastorum 6, but there were similar provisions in canons 1393 and 1394 of the 1917 code. The scope of books subject to prior review is quite narrow (see cc. 824–828); hence the process is now relatively rare.

The canon speaks of four phases of the procedure: (1) how the censors are designated, (2) the criteria by which they are to make their judgments, (3) how they are to forward their opinion to the ordinary, and (4) what is involved in the ordinary's subsequent granting or denial of the requested permission.

(1) The first paragraph suggests three possible sources for those who are to review books before publication: (a) each local ordinary can do the work himself or entrust it to someone he approves, (b) the conference of bishops can compile and make available a list of censors it considers able to assist dioceses with this function, and (c) the conference can establish a board of censors which the local ordinaries could consult. A few conferences of bishops have taken action to assemble lists of censors; apparently none have established commissions of censors. The NCCB has done neither; there does not seem to be any need.

Censors, whether lay persons or ordained ministers, are to be "outstanding in knowledge, correct doctrine, and prudence." Obviously they should possess competence in the area in which they are asked to evaluate writings, and have a fair and balanced outlook.

(2) The second paragraph gives two criteria for censors to follow when judging a book. One is negative: not to be prejudiced by a predisposition toward the author, favorable or unfavorable. The judgment is to be made on the work submitted, not on the person of the author. All extraneous issues must be sedulously screened out.

[9] Officiorum ac munerum, Jan. 25, 1897, CIC Fontes III, 502–512.

[10] CDF 1992 "Instruction," 9; see c. 823 above.

The second criterion is positive: the Church's teaching on faith and morals as presented by its own teaching authority. The single category of "doctrine of the Church" does not imply that books must simply conform to everything taught by anyone in authority, regardless of its truth claim. It means that theological levels of teaching must be respected, e.g., distinguishing those things which are divinely revealed from those which are commonly accepted, freely disputed, etc. In other words, the "hierarchy of truths" (UR 11) must always be considered as well as the need for authors to be in dialogue with the cultures and voices of their age (GS 44, 54, 62, AG 22).

The judgment which the censor is called upon to make is whether this writing is or is not likely to be harmful to the faith or morals of the people (c. 823, §1). That is to say, the purpose of prepublication review of these "official" or seemingly official documents is a pastoral one. Can the faithful rely on them and not be endangered by them? The censor is not asked to answer other questions about the publication: Will it sell? Is it opportune? Will it make an effective textbook or catechism?

"The examination preceding the granting of permission calls for the greatest of care and seriousness, with consideration given both to the rights of the authors (c. 218) and of all the faithful (cc. 213, 217)."[11]

It is hyperbole to suggest that "ecclesiastical permission constitutes both a juridical and moral guarantee for the authors, publishers, and the readers" ("Instruction," 10.1), but that exaggerated evaluation of the permission does not diminish the high levels of seriousness and fairness required of the censor's examination.

(3) The censor gives his judgment of the work to the ordinary in writing, dated and signed. Obviously it should contain the reasons on which it is based, especially if it is a negative judgment. An affirmative evaluation by the censor is traditionally termed a "nihil obstat," there is nothing standing in the way of publication.

(4) The ordinary, if the censor's decision was favorable, then makes his own prudent judgment to grant the permission to publish ("imprimatur," it may be published). This implies that the ordinary's decision is an independent one, and may take in wider pastoral issues, e.g., opportuneness, but a negative judgment after a positive recommendation from the censor demands serious justification. If the censor's judgment was negative, the ordinary still has an independent decision to make; he can concur with the censor, but he must give the author the reasons for his denial of permission; or he can give the book to another censor or review it himself and then take favorable action.

Relations with authors should always be conducted in a constructive spirit of respectful dialogue and ecclesial communion.[12]

The permission to publish is to be given with the name of the ordinary and the date and place in which it was given. Permission to publish is not a blessing or praise of a book, nor does it imply agreement with the contents.

If the requested permission is denied, the author may ask it of another competent ordinary (cc. 65, §1, 824, §1) or have administrative recourse to the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith (cc. 1732–1739, "Instruction," 10.3).

The permission to publish can be conditioned, e.g., in a scholarly rather than popular journal, or for use only in colleges ("Instruction," 8.4), but this conditioned permission would appear to be both unusual and problematic.

The canon does not require that the permission (together with the name, date, and place of issuance) be printed in the published book, but the Commission for the Authentic Interpretation of the Code, in a response which extended the canon's provision, said that it should be.[13] The diocesan [11] CDF 1992 "Instruction," 10.2.

[12] "Instruction," 12.3; cf. also Cooperation Between Theologians and the Ecclesiastical Magisterium, ed. L. O'-Donovan (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1982).

[13] April 29, 1987, AAS 79 (1987) 1249. L. Wrenn, Authen- bishop could dispense from this requirement if there were a good reason.

Canon 664 of the Eastern code parallels this canon.

Writing in Unfriendly Journals; Radio and Television Programs

Canon 831 — §1. Except for a just and reasonable cause, the Christian faithful are not to write anything for newspapers, magazines, or periodicals which are accustomed to attack openly the Catholic religion or good morals; clerics and members of religious institutes, however, are to do so only with the permission of the local ordinary.

§2. It is for the conference of bishops to establish norms concerning the requirements for clerics and members of religious institutes to take part on radio or television in dealing with questions of Catholic doctrine or morals.

The canon treats of two very different things: (1) writing in newspapers or magazines which openly attack the Catholic religion or good morals, and (2) clerics and religious taking part in radio or television programs about Catholic teaching or morals.

The first paragraph comes directly from Ecclesiae pastorum 5.2, and is a modification of canon 1386, §2 of the 1917 code. It is a prohibition against cooperation with those who are manifestly inimical to the Church or to moral life; it is not about the content of one's writings. It speaks of publications which regularly, openly, and actively attack the Catholic religion or moral values, not those which might be perceived by some subtly to undermine those institutions. Of lay persons the canon asks that they not lend their name or presence to such publications, unless, in their own judgment, there is just and reasonable cause for doing so, e.g., refuting error or defending truth. Of ordained ministers or members of religious communities, because of their public identification with the Church, the canon asks that they obtain the permission of the local ordinary (c. 824, §1) to make such written appearances. The 1992 Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith "Instruction," 13, suggests that the local ordinary give careful consideration to such requests and the circumstances in which such permissions might be granted.

The second paragraph is a specification of canon 772, §2 on bishops' conferences' regulation of radio and television presentations of Christian teaching. Both canons recognize that radio and television transcend diocesan boundaries, have great influence, and therefore require more than local attention. This canon asks only for some norms regarding the media appearances of ordained ministers and religious women and men,[14] because these persons are perceived to be public representatives of the Church. The programmatic areas covered by the canon are "Catholic doctrine or morals," not, for example, history, culture, or politics.

Many conferences of bishops have enacted norms for such participation in radio and television programs, e.g., setting forth requisite qualifications and procedures for granting permissions.[15] The U.S. Conference of Bishops in 1984 issued a provisional decision authorizing individual diocesan bishops to issue guidelines for such participation.

The Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches covers the same ground in canons 660 and 653.

Publications of Religious Women and Men

Canon 832 — Members of religious institutes also need permission of their major superior accordtic Interpretations on the 1983 Code (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1993) 39–40, is of the opinion that the interpretation is simply declarative rather than extensive.

[14] Members of secular institutes and societies of apostolic life are not bound. Canon 18 requires a strict interpretation of "religious institutes."

[15] See LCE or Pamplona ComEng at c. 831.

ing to the norm of the constitutions in order to publish writings dealing with questions of religion or morals.

The canon is much narrower in scope than its predecessor, canon 1385, §3 of the 1917 code, but more demanding than Ecclesiae pastorum 5, which made it only a recommendation rather than a requirement. It is quite similar to canon 662, §2 of the Eastern code.

Women and men who are members of religious institutes[16] are included, and they are to follow their own constitutions regarding the appropriate major superior and the procedures for gaining the permission to publish. (The clerical members of personal prelatures and their affiliated lay persons are governed in this matter by their statutes.)

The canon simply states that the member of the religious institute needs the permission of his or her major superior, but the 1992 Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith "Instruction," 16 and 17, goes well beyond the canon. The instruction says that the religious superiors have the responsibility of granting permission for their members to publish writings dealing with questions of religion or morals. They should not do so, the instruction states, without obtaining the prior judgment of at least one reliable censor, and satisfying themselves that the work does not contain anything harmful to faith or morals. Since the congregation lacks legislative authority, the provisions of its instruction (see c. 34) which add duties not included in the canon are to be considered prudent counsel rather than canonical obligations.

It is clear that, by virtue of this canon, religious require permission to publish writings only in the areas of religion and morals, not in any other areas of learning, opinion, or culture.

[16] As in the previous canon, this does not extend to members of secular institutes or societies of apostolic life (c. 18).

TITLE V
THE PROFESSION OF FAITH
[c. 833]

Profession of Faith and Oath of Fidelity

Canon 833 — The following are obliged personally to make a profession of faith according to the formula approved by the Apostolic See:

1° in the presence of the president or his delegate, all those who attend with either a deliberative or consultative vote an ecumenical or particular council, a synod of bishops, and a diocesan synod; the president, however, makes it in the presence of the council or synod;

2° those promoted to the cardinalatial dignity, according to the statutes of the sacred college;

3° in the presence of the one delegated by the Apostolic See, all those promoted to the episcopate as well as those who are equivalent to a diocesan bishop;

4° in the presence of the college of consultors, the diocesan administrator;

5° in the presence of the diocesan bishop or his delegate, vicars general, episcopal vicars, and judicial vicars;

6° in the presence of the local ordinary or his delegate and at the beginning of their function, pastors, the rector of a seminary, and teachers of theology and philosophy in seminaries; those to be promoted to the order of the diaconate;

7° in the presence of the grand chancellor or, in his absence, in the presence of the local ordinary or their delegates, the rector of an ecclesiastical or Catholic university, when the rector's function begins; in the presence of the rector if he is a priest or in the presence of the local ordinary or their delegates, teachers in any universities whatsoever who teach disciplines pertaining to faith or morals, when they begin their function;

8° Superiors in clerical religious institutes and societies of apostolic life, according to the norm of the constitutions.

A profession of faith is a virtuous act, and here it is made a canonical obligation on the occasion of the assumption of certain duties or offices, most of which are related to the teaching function of the Church. The public manifestation of belief bears witness to the community that the person entrusted with a teaching role shares their authentic and apostolic faith. Such public recitals are an ancient part of the Church's life, e.g., at baptisms, eucharistic celebrations, ordinations, and the inception of some ministerial offices. This canon replaces canons 1406–1408 of the 1917 code.

The obligation to make a personal profession of faith falls directly on the person who has agreed to assume the office, dignity, or duty. The list of those obliged should be considered taxative; that is to say, the canonical obligation does not extend to any others, even though the list of persons includes only a tiny fraction of those in the Church who actually do the teaching of the faith.

The canon requires that the profession of faith be made "according to the formula approved by the Apostolic See." When the code was promulgated in 1983, that formula was a modified form of the ancient Nicene-Constantinopolitan creed which was issued in 1967 after the Second Vatican Council and well accepted throughout the Catholic world. However, in a hasty action on February 25, 1989,[17] the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith published in L'Osservatore Romano a new, theologically ambiguous, and controversial formula. The ensuing confusion over the meaning of the three final paragraphs of this new formula together with a delay in providing its approved vernacular translations has clouded the understanding and observance of this canon.

In the same action the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith added an entirely new canonical obligation: an extension of the duty to take an oath of fidelity upon the assumption of office to the categories of persons listed in subparagraphs five through eight of this canon. Since the Congregation lacks legislative authority, it obtained the requisite sanction of the pope to promulgate this new rule.[18]

An oath of fidelity, like a profession of faith, is a very serious religious act. In a promissory oath of this kind one calls upon God to witness the sincerity and reliability of one's promise to fulfill the duties of the office which is being assumed. It is similar to a bishop's oath of fidelity when assuming his office (c. 380), and there are other examples of such oaths in the code, e.g., in tribunals (c. 1454), by administrators of church property (c. 1283, 1°; cf. also cc. 1199–1204). But the new Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith formula for the oath takes it well beyond a promise faithfully to fulfill the duties of office and remain in communion with the Church; its sweeping final paragraphs make one swear to observe all ecclesiastical laws and to obey whatever bishops declare as authentic teachers or prescribe as leaders of the Church.

Unlike the provision of the 1917 code (CIC 2403) there is no canonical penalty for failing to make the profession of faith or the oath of fidelity. Nor does such a failure to make them prevent one from accepting an office or exercising one which has been assumed. In other words, the profession and oath are not qualifications for office which affect the validity of appointments.

When a diocesan bishop is convinced that it would be for the spiritual good of the faithful, he can, in particular cases, dispense from the obser-

[17] The new rules for the Roman Curia, which would have required review by the PCILT, were to go into effect four days later. PB 156, 158.

[18] Rescript from an audience, published by CDF on Sept. 19, 1989, AAS 81 (1989) 1169; the original texts of the profession of faith and oath of fidelity were published in AAS 81 (1989) 104–106; their English translation appears on pp. 1853–1854 of this volume.

vance of this canon (cc. 85, 87); for example, if the bishop were already fully assured of the faith and fidelity of the person and there was a truly serious difficulty in making the acts of professing and swearing in this instance, he could issue a dispensation.

The profession and oath-taking can either be witnessed in private or incorporated into a liturgical ceremony of installation.

This canon has no counterpart in the 1990 Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

(The material listed below serves as a comprehensive bibliography for Book III.)

Teaching Function

Arrieta, J. "The Active Subject of the Church's Teaching Office (Canons 747–748)." Stud Can 23 (1989) 243–256.

Blyskal, L. "Obsequium: A Case Study." J 48 (1988) 559–589.

Boyle, J. Church Teaching Authority: Historical and Theological Studies. Notre Dame: University of Notre Dame, 1995.

Burkhard, J. "Sensus fidei: Meaning, Role, and Future of a Teaching of Vatican II." Louvain Studies 17 (1992) 18–34.

———. "Sensus fidei: Theological Reflection Since Vatican II: I. 1956–1984 and II. 1985–1989." Heythrop Journal 34 (1993) 41–59 and 123–136.

Castillo Lara, R. "Le Livre III du CIC de 1983: histoire et principes." AC 31 (1988) 17–54.

CDF. "Instruction on the Ecclesial Vocation of the Theologian (Donum veritatis; May 24, 1990)." AAS 82 (1990) 1550–1570; Origins 20 (1990) 117–126.

Curran, C., and R. McCormick. Dissent in the Church. Readings in Moral Theology, No. 6. New York: Paulist, 1988.

Di Mattia, G. "Annuncio del messagio: Inadimpienze e tutela." Apol (1993) 251–272.

Eno, R. Teaching Authority in the Early Church. Wilmington: Glazier, 1984.

Errazuriz, C. "La Dimensione Giuridica del Munus Docendi nella Chiesa." IE 1 (1989) 177–193.

———. Il "Munus Docendi Ecclesiae": Diritti e doveri dei fideli. Milan: Giuffre, 1991.

Fagiolo, V. "Il Munus Docendi: I canoni introduttivi del Codex e la dottrina conciliare del Magistero autoritativo della Chiesa." ME 112 (1987) 19–42.

Fuchs, J. "Origines d'une trilogie ecclésiologique à l'époque rationaliste de la théologie." Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques 53 (1969) 185–211.

Gaillardetz, R. Witnesses to the Faith: Community, Infallibility, and the Ordinary Magisterium of Bishops. New York: Paulist, 1992.

———. Teaching with Authority: A Theology of the Magisterium in the Church. Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Press, 1997.

Gangoiti, B. "La Dottrina Sociale della Chiesa nel Codice di diritto Canonico del 1983." Angelicum 70 (1993) 255–278.

Ghirlanda, G., and F. Urrutia. "De Episcoporum Conferentia deque exercitio potestatis magisterii" (article, critique, and exchange). P 76 (1987) 573–667

Grant, T. "Social Justice in the 1983 Code of Canon Law: An Examination of Selected Canons." J 49 (1989) 112–145.

Green, T. "The Teaching Function of the Church: A Comparison of Selected Canons in the Latin and Eastern Codes." J 55 (1995) 93–140.

———. "The Church's Teaching Mission: Some Aspects of the Normative Role of Episcopal Conferences." Stud Can 27 (1993) 23–57.

Grisez, G., and F. Sullivan. "The Ordinary Magisterium's Infallibility." TS 55 (1994) 720–738.

Gruppo Italiano Docenti di Diritto Canonico. La Funzione di Insegnare della Chiesa. Milan: Glossa, 1994.

Henn, W. "The Hierarchy of Truths Twenty Years Later." TS 48 (1987) 439–471.

Metz, J.-B., and E. Schillebeeckx. The Teaching Authority of the Believers. Concilium 180. Edinburgh: Clark, 1985.

Nedungatt, G. "Magisterio ecclesiastico nei due Codici." Apol (1992) 313–328.

Örsy, L. The Church: Learning and Teaching. Wilmington: Glazier, 1987.

Sobanski, R. "Les canons 753 et 754: Problemes choisis." Stud Can 23 (1989) 285–298.

Sullivan, F. Magisterium: Teaching Authority in the Catholic Church. New York: Paulist, 1983.

———. "The Response Due to the Non-Definitive Exercise of the Magisterium (Canon 752)." Stud Can 23 (1989) 267–283.

———. Creative Fidelity: Weighing and Interpreting Documents of the Magisterium. New York: Paulist, 1996.

Urrutia, F. "Bibliographia de libro III C.I.C." P 76 (1987) 525–572.

———. "La réponse aux textes du magistère pontifical non infaillible." AC 31 (1988) 95–115.

Walf, K. "L'infaillibilité comme la voit le Code de droit canonique (canons 749–750)." Stud Can 23 (1989) 257–266.

Ecumenism

Green, T. "The Fostering of Ecumenism: Comparative Reflections on the Latin and Eastern Codes." P 85 (1996) 397–444.

———. "Changing Ecumenical Horizons: Their Impact on the 1983 Code." J 56:1 (1996) 427–455.

Griffin, B. "The Challenge of Ecumenism for Canonists." CLSAP 55 (1993) 17–38.

Manna, S. "Delimitations et elements de la formation oecumenique (canon 755)." Stud Can 23 (1989) 299–323.

PCPCU. "Directory for the Application of Principles and Norms on Ecumenism," March 25, 1993. Origins 23:9 (July 29, 1993) 129–160; also Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1993.

Preaching

CDW. "Directory for Sunday Celebrations in the Absence of a Priest," June 2, 1988. Origins 18:19 (Oct. 20, 1988) 301–307.

Feliciani, G. "La predication des laics dans le code." AC 31 (1988) 117–130.

Fox, J. "The Homily and the Authentic Interpretation of Canon 767.1." Apol 62 (1989) 123–169.

Fuentes, J. "Del Ministerio de la Palabra Divina." In Com Ex III/1, 74–158.

Hilkert, M. Naming Grace: Preaching and the Sacramental Imagination. New York: Continuum, 1997.

Huels, J. "The Ministry of the Divine Word (Canons 756–761)." Stud Can 23 (1989) 325–344.

———. "The Law of Lay Preaching: Interpretation and Implementation." CLSAP 52 (1990) 61–79.

———. More Disputed Questions in the Liturgy. Chicago: Liturgy Training Pub., 1996.

Martin de Agar, J. "Note sul Diritto particolare delle Conferenze Episcopali." IE 2 (1990) 593–632.

Norris, P. "Lay Preaching and Canon Law: Who May give a Homily?" Stud Can 24 (1990) 443–454.

Provost, J. "Brought Together by the Word of the Living God (Canons 762–772)." Stud Can 23 (1989) 345–371.

Robitaille, L. "An Examination of the Various Forms of Preaching: Toward an Understanding of the Homily and Canons 766–767." CLSAP 58 (1996) 308–325.

Schulz, W. "Problemi canonistici circa la Predicazione dei Laici nella normativa della Conferenza Tedesca." Apol 62 (1989) 171–180.

Urrutia, F. "Responsa Pontificiae Commissionis Codicis Iuris Canonici authentice interpretando." P 77 (1988) 613–628.

Wallace, J. "Reconsidering the Parish Mission." Worship 67:4 (July, 1993) 340–351.

Wrenn, L. Authentic Interpretations on the 1983 Code. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1993.

Catechetics

Barrett, R. "The Normative Status of the Catechism." P 85 (1996) 9–34.

———. "The Right to Integral Catechesis as a Fundamental Right of the Christian Faithful." Apol 67 (1994) 179–206.

Bertone, T. "La catechesi nel Codice di Diritto canonico." ME 112 (1987) 43–52.

The Catechetical Documents: A Parish Resource. Chicago: Liturgical Training Pub., 1997.

Fuentes, J. "The Active Participants in Catechesis and Their Dependence on the Magisterium (Canons 773–780)." Stud Can 23 (1989) 373–386.

Marthaler, B., ed. Introducing the Catechism of the Catholic Church: Traditional Themes and Contemporary Issues. New York: Paulist, 1994.

Passicos, J. "Le statut des instruments de catechese dans le Code." AC 31 (1988) 147–156.

Missionary Action

García Martin, J. L'Azione Missionaria della Chiesa nella Legislazione Canonica. Rome: Ediurcla, 1993.

———. "Las relaciones entre Ordinarios del Lugar e Institutos en las Misiones segun el Codigo de Derecho Canonico 1983." ComRelMiss 65 (1984) 121–166.

———. "De Religiosorum Regimine in Missionibus." ComRelMiss 65 (1984) 283–304; 355–378.

Greco, J. "De ordinatione activitatis missionalis." P 55 (1966) 289–314.

Henkel, W. "I destinatari della Missio ad gentes." Euntes Docete 44 (1991) 225–239.

Huels, J. M. The Catechumenate and the Law. Chicago: Liturgy Training Pub., 1994.

Jacqueline, B. L'Organisation de la coopération missionnaire après le Concile Oecuménique Vatican II. AC (1974) 125–142.

Lopez-Gay, J. "Ecclesiology in the Missiological Thinking of the Post Conciliar Years." Bibliografia Missionaria 46 (1982) 371–381.

Lombardia, P. "El estatuto juridico del catecumeno segun los textos del Vaticano II." IC (1966) 529–562.

Martimort, G. A. "Catéchuménat et initiation chrétienne des adultes." Notitiae 21 (1985) 382–393.

Nebreda, A. "The Mission of the Church and Missionary Activity." Teaching All Nations (1972) 163–177.

Quitugua, D. C. The Vicar Apostolic in the 1983 Code of Canon Law. Rome: St. Thomas University, 1995.

Reuter, A. "De novis rationibus iuris missionalis a Concilio Vaticano II inductis vel indictis." Euntes Docete (1975) 293–315.

———. "The Missions in the New Code of Canon Law." Bibliografia Missionaria 46 (1982) 361–370.

———. "Religious and Missions according to the New Code of Canon Law." Bibliographia Missionaria 47 (1983) 367–376.

———. "The Missionary Activity of the Church (Canons 781–792)." Stud Can 23 (1989) 387–407.

Rossignol, R. "Vatican II and the Missionary Responsibility of the Particular Church." Indian Theological Studies (1980) 34–46.

Ting Pong Lee, I. "De Actione Ecclesae Missionali in Novo Codex Iuris Canonici." ComRelMiss 64 (1983) 97–106.

Urrutia, F. J. "Catechumenatus iuxta Concilium Oecumenicum Vaticanum Secundum." P 63 (1974) 121–144.

———. De Ecclesiae Munere Docendi. Rome: PUG, 1983.

Catholic Education

Beal, J. "Where's the Body? Where's the Blood? The Teaching Authority of the Diocesan Bishop and the Rights of Catholic School Teachers." CLSA Proceedings 30 (1995) 91–128.

CCE. The Catholic School, March 19, 1977. Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1977.

———. "The Religious Dimension of Education in a Catholic School." Origins 18 (September 15, 1988) 213, 215–228.

———. "The Catholic School on the Threshold of the Third Millennium," December 28, 1997. L'Osservatore Romano 16 (April 22, 1998) 8–10.

Conn, J. Catholic Universities in the United States and Ecclesiastical Authority. Analecta Gregoriana 259. Rome: Editrice Pontificia Università Gregoriana, 1991.

Cusack, B. A Study of the Relationship Between the Diocesan Bishop and Catholic Schools Below the Level of Higher Education in the U.S.: Canons 801–806 of the Code of Canon Law. Canon Law Studies #525. Ann Arbor, Mich.: University Microfilms, 1988.

Deeley, R. The Mandate for Those Who Teach Theology in Institutes of Higher Studies. JCD dissertation at the Gregorian University. Rome: Tipografia di Patrizio Graziani, 1986.

Euart, S. Church-State Implications in the United States of Canon 812 of the 1983 Code of Canon Law. Canon Law Studies #526. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1988.

———. "Theologians and the Mandate to Teach." Origins 23/27 (December 16, 1993) 465, 467–472.

Gallin, A., ed. American Catholic Higher Education: Essential Documents 1967–1990. Notre Dame, Ind.: University of Notre Dame, 1992.

Langan, J., ed. Catholic Universities in Church and Society: A Dialogue on 'Ex corde Ecclesiae.' Washington, D.C.: Georgetown University, 1993.

NCCB. "Bishops and Theologians: Promoting Cooperation, Resolving Misunderstandings." Origins 19 (June 29, 1989) 97–110.

Örsy, L. The Church: Learning and Teaching. Wilmington, Del.: Michael Glazier, 1987.

Morrisey, F. "The Rights of Parents in the Education of Their Children (Canons 796–806)." Stud Can 23/2 (1989) 429–444.

O'Brien, D. From the Heart of the American Church: Catholic Higher Education and American Culture. Maryknoll, N.Y.: Orbis, 1994.

Peters, E. Home-Schooling and the Code of Canon Law. Mt. Royal, Va.: Christendom College, 1988.

Provost, J. "Approaches to Catholic Identity in the Law." Concilium 5 (1994) 15–25.

———. "A Canonical Commentary on Ex corde Ecclesiae." In Catholic Universities in Church and Society: A Dialogue on 'Ex corde Ecclesiae,' ed. J. Langan, 105–136. Washington, D.C.: Georgetown University, 1993.

———. "The Canonical Aspects of Catholic Identity in Ex corde Ecclesiae." Stud Can 25/2 (1991) 155–192.

Urrutia, F. "Ecclesiastical Universities and Faculties." Stud Can 23/2 (1989) 459–469.

Valdrini, P. "Les universités catholiques: exercise d'un droit et contrôle de son exercice (canons 807–814)." Stud Can 23 (1989) 445–458.

Media and Books

Baura, E. "Il Permisso per la Publicazione di Scritti." IE 1 (1989) 249–256.

CDF. "Instruction on Some Aspects of the Use of Instruments of Social Communication in Promoting the Doctrine of the Faith," March 30, 1992. Comm 24 (1992) 18–27; Origins 22:6 (June 6, 1992) 92–96.

"Congregazione della Dottrina della Fede. Istruzione circa alcuni aspetti degli strumenti de communicazione sociale nella promozione della dottrina della fede, 30 Marzo 1992. Con nota di C. J. Errazuriz." IE 5 (1993) 365–380.

Coriden, J. "The End of the Imprimatur." J 44 (1984) 339–356.

Profession of Faith

Betti, U. "Professione di fede e giuramento di fedeltà: Considerazioni dottrinali." Notitiae 25 (1989) 321–325.

CDF. "Professio fidei, Iusiurandum fidelitatis," March 1, 1989. AAS 81 (1989) 104–106; "Rescript Approving the Formula of the Profession of Faith and the Oath of Fidelity." AAS 81 (1989) 1169; Comm 21 (1989) 22–34, 112–118.

CTSA. Report of the CTSA Committee on the Profession of Faith and the Oath of Fidelity, April 15, 1990. Washington, D.C.: CTSA, 1990.

De Fleurquin, L. "The Profession of Faith and the Oath of Fidelity: A Manifestation of Seriousness and Loyalty in the Life of the Church (Canon 833)." Stud Can 23 (1989) 485–499.

Jukes, J. "Profession of Faith and the Oath of Fidelity: Some Questions of Canonical and Practical Interest." CLS-GBIN 81 (1990) 12–17.

Keenan, J. "Compelling Assent: Magisterium, Conscience, and Oaths." Irish Theological Quarterly 57 (1991) 209–227.

McManus, F. "The Profession of Faith and the Oath of Fidelity." CLSAP 53 (1991) 190–220.

Örsy, L. The Profession of Faith and the Oath of Fidelity: A Theological and Canonical Analysis. Wilmington, Del.: Glazier, 1990.

Page, R. "Le document sur la profession de foi et le serment de fidélité." SC 24 (1990) 51–69.

Schmitz, H. "'Professio Fidei' und 'Iusiurandum fidelitatis'—Glaudensbekennis und Trueid: Wiederbelebung des Antimodernisteneides?" AkK 157 (1988) 353–429.

Thils, G. "La nouvelle 'Profession de foi' et Lumen Gentium, 25." Revue Théologique de Louvain 20 (1989) 336–343.

Urrutia, F. "Iusiurandum fidelitatis." P 80 (1991) 559–578.

BOOK IV
THE SANCTIFYING FUNCTION OF THE CHURCH
[cc. 834–1253]

INTRODUCTION

Frederick R. McManus

The canons of the fourth book of the code govern the liturgical life and celebrations of the Latin church. These include above all the celebration of baptism and Eucharist and the other sacraments, together with sacramentals and the ecclesial prayer. A small number of canons refer to other religious and devotional practices of the Christian community; these practices are understood to be closely related to the liturgy, but they are not a formal part of the Church's public and official corporate worship.

Although Book IV itself may be seen as a very selective collection of liturgical laws, that term is generally reserved, somewhat more narrowly, for the juridic norms that govern the actual celebration of the sacraments and other services of Catholic worship. This is the sense of canon 2: for the most part the code does not define or determine the rites themselves, and all the liturgical laws falling outside the code retain their full canonical force—unless they are contradicted, and thus abrogated, by the code.

The liturgical laws common to the universal Latin church are to be found chiefly in the official Roman liturgical books, both in their introductions or prenotes (praenotanda) and in the rubrical directives which describe the rites and accompany the appointed texts. They are also in related juridic documents, e.g., apostolic constitutions and letters.[1] Particular liturgical laws are found in the corresponding official liturgical books of various nations and regions, as well as in decrees and statutes of dioceses and of groups of particular churches which follow the Roman rite.

In addition, although the code does not advert to this distinction, there are non-Roman rites of the Latin church, the most notable now being the Ambrosian rite of Milan.[2] Such non-Roman Western rites, whether of particular churches or of religious orders,[3] were preserved in the post-Tridentine reform of the Roman liturgical books, provided they had at least two hundred years' standing. Today, although diminished in number and in influence, these rites too may have their own liturgical books and laws. Together the Roman rite and the non-Roman rites of the Latin church are called the Latin rites, and all these are equally governed by the code.

The norms of Book IV, unlike the much larger body of uncodified liturgical legislation, are more often concerned with the liturgy from the viewpoint of its extrinsic discipline, e.g., canonical requirements for ministers or recipients of sacraments or for proper times or places of celebration. In other words, the canons are generally not ritual regulations and are distinct from them. As is evident, however, such a distinction can be made only imperfectly, and many canons of Book IV do affect liturgical celebrations directly (as did corresponding parts of CIC).[4] Such canons are usually somewhat basic norms or foundational doctrine rather than rubrical directions. When an individual chapter within the title on a given sacrament is called "The Celebration" of the respective sacrament, the canons are relatively few and general; most of the liturgical discipline itself is found outside the code, as canon 2 determines once for all.

[1] The source material for existing, postconciliar liturgical legislation of the universal Latin church is collected and translated into English in ICEL, Documents on the Liturgy, 1963–1979: Conciliar, Papal, and Curial Texts (Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1982), from which translations below are taken. Cited as DOL, with the number of the corresponding sections into which each of the 554 documents are divided.

[2] See A. A. King, Liturgies of the Primatial Sees (Milwaukee: Bruce, 1957).

[3] See A. A. King, Liturgies of the Religious Orders (Milwaukee: Bruce, 1955).

[4] CIC is used in this commentary to refer to the 1917 Codex Iuris Canonici. Canons which are referred to without CIC are those of the present, revised code of 1983.

To put the distinction differently, matters that are proximately liturgical or sacramental are considered to be subjects of the liturgical law, while matters affecting the celebrations remotely or less directly are dealt with in the code's discipline. In the twentieth century the respective competencies of certain dicasteries or departments of the Roman Curia have reflected such a distinction. Since March 1989 it may be recognized in the two sections of the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments, a division based on this distinction.

The distinction also explains why Book IV does not deal with all parts of the liturgy. Such significant elements as the church year, music, and art are not directly touched, nor is there any effort to give a balanced or proportionate treatment of each sacrament or other rite. Because the canons do not include the body of liturgical laws, the commentary that follows offers some guidance to such norms, so that the canons themselves may be understood in their broader context. It must always be understood that the liturgical law is an integral part of the canon law, with the same weight and force as the rest of the law, but with its own special characteristics.

The New Eastern Code of Canon Law

In the Code of Canons of the Eastern (Catholic) Churches promulgated by John Paul II in 1990, title XVI ("Divine Worship and Especially the Sacraments") corresponds to Book IV of the Latin church's code, but has only about half the number of canons. In the Eastern code, canons 667–895 are divided into chapters on the seven sacraments—with chapter 6 on sacred ordinations divided into four articles and chapter 7 on marriage divided into eight articles. In a pattern similar to that of the Latin code (below), these chapters are followed by chapter 8: "Sacramentals, Sacred Times and Places, Veneration of the Saints, Vow and Oath," again in five articles.

As would be expected, there are many differences in discipline, given the different historical, theological, cultural, and canonical traditions of the Eastern churches as a whole and the particular, autonomous (sui iuris) churches of the East. This is evident in instances of liturgical laws that reflect the several liturgical rites that are a part of the patrimony of the several churches. In many places there is a close dependence of the Eastern code upon the earlier code of the Latin church, but a major effort was always made to respect the disciplinary traditions of the East and to strengthen further diversity in particular law.

The Eastern canons were supplemented by a significant document in 1996: "Instruction for Applying the Liturgical Prescriptions of the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches."[5] This is an expository expansion based upon the canons, with constant emphasis upon the preservation of Eastern liturgical traditions and a return to those usages whenever possible—certainly in preference to the usages of the Latin church, however much some principles and norms of the conciliar constitution on the Roman rite, "in the very nature of things, affect other rites as well."[6] At times the instruction emphasizes the differences strongly; a major example is in number 82:

> It should be noted that the obligation of the sacred rite, and thus of the priestly blessing, for the validity of the Marriage is specific to Eastern law. In the Latin Church, simply the presence of the local Ordinary, or the parish priest, or a priest or deacon delegated by either of them is required. In the Eastern tradition, the priest, in addition to assisting, must bless the Marriage. To bless means to act as the true minister of the sacrament, in virtue of his priestly power to sanctify, so that the spouses may be united by God in the image of the flawless nuptial union of Christ with the Church and be consecrated to each other by sacramental grace.

[5] CEC, January 6, 1996 (Rome: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1996).

[6] SC 3.

Comparison with the 1917 Code of Canon Law

Book IV is a radical departure from the corresponding Book III of the 1917 code, not so much in the content of the canons themselves as in their selection and especially their arrangement. This difference is essential to an understanding of the present law.

Following the medieval categories of canon law, which treated persons and things separately, Book III of the 1917 code (CIC 726–1551) dealt with such diverse "things" as simony, sacraments, sacred places (including funeral rites) and sacred times, divine worship, the Church's teaching office, benefices, and church property. The revised codification employs instead the categories accepted by Vatican II, namely, the munera or functions of (1) teaching (now Book III), (2) sanctifying (Book IV), and (3) ruling (Book II, principally in part two); the canons on church property now constitute Book V.

This pattern confines Book IV to the church order that affects the full liturgical and sacramental life of the Christian people.

Book IV also reflects a major simplification in the quantity as well as in the substance of the canons; it reduces about six hundred canons of the 1917 code to little more than four hundred.

Much of this simplification has been achieved by the elimination of minute prescriptions and by leaving to the liturgical laws outside the code (and/or to particular law) matters not necessary in the codification. Sometimes the reduction in the number of canons suggests the lesser significance of the matter treated or the changed circumstances of Christian life. For example, canons on indulgences have been reduced from twenty-six (CIC 911–936) to six (cc. 992–997); the eight canons on the reservation of the absolution from sins in the sacrament of penance (CIC 893–900) have been suppressed.

In general, the revision of the canons has been influenced by the decrees of Vatican II, by the revised liturgical books or Ordines of the 1960s and 1970s and other implementing documents of the postconciliar period, and by the pastoral and other principles which governed the whole reform of the Roman liturgy.[7] The most significant departure from the 1917 code, however, is the rearrangement or reordering of canons.

Sequence of the Canons of Book IV

The sequence of canons in the 1917 code treated the seven sacraments of the Church not as the mysteries celebrated by the Christian community in the liturgical assembly but almost exclusively as the means of sanctification given by God through the ministry of the ordained ministers or clergy. Thus it was only after the canons on the sacraments (and sacred places and times) that divine worship itself was taken up (beginning with CIC 1255).

A similar sequence was originally planned for the revised code. In the first schema circulated for comment by the episcopate (1975), the seven sacraments were again treated as in the 1917 code.[8] An initial canon identified them as "the principal means of sanctification and salvation" but made no reference to their being liturgical acts of cult or worship of God. Another schema, for sacred places, sacred times, and divine cult (1977), again retained the sequence (and orientation) of the former code.[9]

In the light of comments regarding these schemata and, even more significant, the explicit teaching of Vatican II, the sequence was reversed. The liturgy is first treated as a whole, then (1) "The Sacraments" (cc. 840–1165), (2) "Other Acts of Divine Worship" (cc. 1166–1204), and (3) "Sacred Places and Times" (cc. 1205–1253). These three headings constitute the three parts of Book IV.

[7] "Principia Quae Codicem Iuris Canonici Recognitionem Dirigant," Comm 1 (1969) 77–85.

[8] ComCICRec, Schema documenti pontificii quo disciplina canonica de sacramentis recognoscitur (Vatican City: Typis Polyglottis Vaticanis, 1975).

[9] ComCICRec, Schema canonum libri IV de Ecclesiae munere sanctificandi (Vatican City: Typis Polyglottis Vaticanis, 1977).

This order flows from Vatican II's critical correction and amplification of the earlier teaching of Pius XII on the liturgy. In the 1947 encyclical Mediator Dei, the liturgy was defined principally in terms of the public worship offered to the Father by the Church, that is, by Christ and his members.[10] The 1963 conciliar constitution on the liturgy, Sacrosanctum Concilium—which along with the 1964 dogmatic constitution Lumen gentium and the 1965 pastoral constitution Gaudium et spes (for the canons on marriage) mainly influenced Book IV—enlarged this definition. The liturgy embraces both the sanctification of humankind by God and the ecclesial acts of cult offered by Christ the Head and his members, all within an understanding of the basic nature of liturgical acts as "signs perceptible to the senses."[11]

In addition, the council formally redefined the seven sacraments not only as signifying the divine grace which they impart by the action of Christ (ex opere Christi) but as sacraments of faith, which "make people holy, build up the Body of Christ, and give worship to God." They were described as celebrations (as well as ministrations) which "most effectively dispose the faithful to receive this [divine] grace in a fruitful manner, to worship God rightly, and to practice charity."[12]

This development is reflected in the fundamental doctrinal canons of Book IV, 834, §1 and 840, which are derived from Sacrosanctum Concilium 7 and 59 respectively. It is reflected to a lesser degree in the title of Book IV, "The Sanctifying Function of the Church." While this phrasing may at first glance appear to restrict the canons to the action of God through the Church and the Church's ordained ministers upon the rest of the faithful, the canons themselves include both sanctification and worship or cult—that is, the totality of public liturgy. The Latin expression in the title (munus sanctificandi) is intended to include the entirety of the Church's "exercise of the priestly office of Jesus Christ." This ecclesial function or office of sanctifying, which is regularly mentioned in conciliar documents along with the function of teaching and the function of ruling, has itself a twofold meaning: sanctificare means both "to make holy" and "to glorify the Holy One [God]" and was thus considered a suitable term for the divine liturgy as defined by Vatican II. In the title of Book IV, as well as in the arrangement and content of the canons, sanctification is thus understood to include worship or cult.

Nature of Liturgical Law

In recent years there has been considerable discussion, especially among English-speaking commentators, about the nature (or style) and weight of the liturgical law. In part this is a response to the greater flexibility and openness to adaptation and variation that have been written into the liturgical norms themselves; in part it reflects the pastoral situation canonized in the conciliar texts and especially the style of the 1963 constitution on the liturgy—and the twentieth-century liturgical renewal or movement which the constitution embodies.

First of all, it is clear and certain that the canons (including the seminal c. 2, which indicates that liturgical laws, though outside the codification, continue in full canonical force) and the liturgical books themselves consider such norms to be an integral and preceptive part of the ecclesiastical or canon law. The ordinary canonical principles of promulgation and interpretation, for example, and the canonical institutes such as custom and dispensation are equally applicable to the liturgical laws. At the same time, many of the liturgical laws may be categorized in traditional terms as non-preceptive or directive only (or even as simply descriptive of rites) or as facultative, that is, as offering choices and options. Their great number and diversity—one reason why they are not easily subject to codification or inclusion in the code of the Latin church—require, even more than other parts of canon law, an appreciation of the comparative weight of the form they take: all the way from a conciliar constitution to minor instructions and even simple declarations of an authoritative kind.[13] These forms seem to go far beyond the relatively simple forms determined in the general norms in the titles of the code on laws (cc. 7–22), custom (cc. 23–28), and general decrees and instructions (cc. 29–34). This is especially true because of the characteristic form of the liturgical books, their introductions (praenotanda) and rubrics.

[10] November 30, 1947, AAS 39 (1947) 528–529.
[11] SC 7.
[12] SC 59.

Thus the liturgical law may sometimes be considered almost radically different from other parts of canon law, both in the matters affected and in style. This is suggested by the titles of important postconciliar studies: New Liturgy, New Laws by R. K. Seasoltz[14] and Liturgical Law: New Style, New Spirit by T. Richstatter.[15]

The liturgical celebrations of sacraments and other services are public and communal actions implicating the whole person of each member of the Christian assembly. They are matters of the most intimate faith and piety, which are articulated communally. The norms that govern them are as often aesthetic and artistic as they are juridic or canonical. Since the celebrations are to be the authentic worship of the Church as it is gathered in a particular place at a particular time, accomplished in forms and words that are both personal and impersonal, individual and common, the liturgical norms easily come into conflict with actual situations. The constitution on the liturgy followed the traditional pattern of expository and doctrinal introductions which precede the dispositive norms, and the norms mandating the reform were sometimes hortatory and broadly stated.

[13] F. R. McManus, "Liturgical Law and Difficult Cases," W 48 (1974) 347–366.

[14] Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1980.

[15] Chicago: Franciscan Herald Press, 1977. See also W. Kelley, "The Authority of Liturgical Laws," J 28 (1968) 397–424; J. M. Huels, "The Interpretation of Liturgical Law," W 55 (1981) 218–237.

This pattern has been followed in the new liturgical books which the constitution decreed should be revised and promulgated. Thus, along with the historical, ecclesiological, and theological reappraisal of the Church's liturgy, it was inevitable that a different spirit would inform the liturgical laws themselves.

Whether the axiom lex orandi, lex credendi is taken in its traditional sense to mean that the liturgy is a norm of faith—as it is surely a principal theological source—or is taken to mean, according to Pius XII, that the law of belief should determine the liturgical text and rite,[16] it is evident that the liturgy is a fit subject for authoritative legislation: at every point it involves the Christian faith which it proclaims; it is a touchstone of the communion of churches and of the congregations of the particular or local church; it is the preeminent social and public action of the Christian community; it has the nature of rite or ritual, with recurring forms and patterns that are evidently subject to canonical discipline and normative custom.

In summary, while the liturgical celebration is not easily governed or moderated because it is ultimately the celebration of the mysteries in the Spirit, the laws affecting this celebration are urged with all the force of the rest of canon law. The rationale is sometimes the same as that of the rest of canon law, sometimes different. The rationale for liturgical law involves the public order and common good sought in the services and celebrations, the communion of the churches and Christian communities which celebrate the liturgy, and the manifestation of the common Christian faith, as just mentioned. It involves as well the important relationship of liturgical presidency to the pastoral office of those who govern the liturgy and, finally, the special matter of the quality and style of actual celebration.

The renewed tone and spirit that infuse the laws and the relative weight of their demands in the face of conflicting pastoral expectations have led to a legitimate openness. This recognizes the religious value of diversity and is an invitation to cultural adaptation or liturgical inculturation. All these factors must be kept in mind in the interpretation of the canons themselves and all other kinds of liturgical law, with a special concern not only for the immediate text and context but also for the larger context of celebration.

[16] Mediator Dei, AAS 39 (1947) 540–541.

Liturgical Books

The recurrent sources listed for the canons on sacraments and divine worship in the 1917 code were the Roman liturgical books "restored by decree of the holy council of Trent and issued by command of" several popes after that council. The norms of those modern liturgical books became in some instances the canons of the 1917 code. After the promulgation of the code, it became necessary to revise the prenotes of the Roman Ritual in instances where canon law had been changed; this was done in an edition of the ritual in 1925. The process for the 1983 codification now in force was similar. The Roman liturgical books, this time as "restored by decree of the holy ecumenical council of Vatican II and promulgated by authority of Pope Paul VI" (or, later, of John Paul II) are a major source for the canons of Book IV. Papal and curial documents issued during the period beginning in 1964 were also used as sources.

The post-Tridentine liturgical books, exclusive of the books of chant such as the Roman Gradual and the Roman Antiphonal, were formally enumerated in 1946 as the Roman Breviary, Roman Missal, Roman Ritual, Roman Pontifical, Roman Martyrology, Ceremonial of Bishops, Memoriale Rituum (for smaller churches), Octavarium (for the offices of local octaves), and the collection of decrees, Decreta Authentica, of the Congregation of Sacred Rites.[17] Of these, the Roman Missal for the Eucharist (1570), the Roman Pontifical (1596) and Roman Ritual (1614) for the other sacraments and rites, and the Roman Breviary for the daily prayer of the Church (1568) were the most important and basic.

These major Roman liturgical books, with the exception of the ritual, were imposed as binding upon the whole Latin church. An exception, to preserve the other venerable rites of the West such as Ambrosian, Mozarabic, and Gallican, as well as the "uses" of many particular churches and religious orders, was made in cases in which a different rite had been followed for at least two hundred years.

Aside from the considerable increase in the number of saints' feasts, the four principal Roman liturgical books of the post-Tridentine period were not greatly altered until the beginning of the twentieth century. Even then, in the reform initiated by Pope Pius X, the revisions were principally by way of the simplification of regulations and the strengthening of the temporal cycle of the church year. No significant ritual changes were made in the celebrations which the liturgical books govern by their texts and rubrics.

The reform was taken up again by authority of Pius XII with the establishment of a commission for this purpose in 1948, and a series of revisions resulted in the publication of several sections of liturgical books, including the reformed rites of Holy Week in 1951 and 1955. After John XXIII announced the convening of Vatican II, he placed the unfinished work of the reform commission on the conciliar agenda when he authorized a new code of rubrics in 1962. Finally, in the 1963 conciliar constitution a reform of all the Roman liturgical books was formally decreed. It mandated specific norms and principles for that reform and included laws governing further adaptation of the liturgy, especially in the light of cultural and other diversity in the different nations and regions, once the Roman revision could be completed.[18]

The several parts of the Roman liturgical books were prepared by the Consilium for the Implementation of the Constitution on the Liturgy (1964) and promulgated by authority of Paul VI, [17] SCRit, decr, August 10, 1946, AAS 38 (1946) 371–372.

[18] SC 21–40.

in decrees of the Congregation of Sacred Rites (until 1969), later by the Sacred Congregation for Divine Worship (1969–1975), and still later by the Congregation for Sacraments and Divine Worship. In the latest curial reform promulgated in 1988, effective the following year, competence over the Roman books belongs to the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments.

The revised Roman Missal appeared in three parts: the Order of Mass (promulgated April 6, 1969), the Lectionary for Mass (order of readings, May 25, 1969; second edition, January 21, 1980), and Missal (presidential prayers or sacramentary, April 3, 1969; second edition, March 27, 1975). The Roman Calendar, for both the Eucharist and the liturgy of the hours, was promulgated March 21, 1969.

The Roman Ritual includes several parts (formerly called "titles" in the one-volume ritual of 1614): Rite of Marriage (March 19, 1969; second edition, March 19, 1990), Rite of Baptism for Children (May 15, 1969), Rite of Funerals (August 15, 1969), Rite of Religious Profession (February 2, 1970), Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (January 6, 1972), Rite of Anointing and Pastoral Care of the Sick (December 7, 1972), Holy Communion and Worship of the Eucharist outside Mass (June 21, 1973), Rite of Penance (December 2, 1973), and the Book of Blessings (May 31, 1984).

The Roman Pontifical includes the Ordination of Deacons, Priests, and Bishops (August 15, 1968; second edition, called Ordination of Bishops, Presbyters, and Deacons, June 29, 1989), Rite of Consecration to a Life of Virginity (May 31, 1970), Rite of Blessing an Abbot or Abbess (November 9, 1970), Rite of the Blessing of Oils, Rite of Consecrating the Chrism (December 3, 1970), Rite of Confirmation (August 22, 1971), Rite of Institution of Readers and Acolytes, etc. (December 3, 1972), and Dedication of a Church and an Altar (May 29, 1977). A related volume, the Ceremonial of Bishops (September 14, 1984), is no longer counted among the liturgical books, since it does not contain liturgical texts used by the ministers.

The Liturgy of the Hours according to the Roman Rite (The Divine Office) was promulgated April 11, 1971 and replaced the Roman Breviary.

Corresponding liturgical books in English and in the other languages have been published. Those in English are ordinarily prepared by the International Commission on English in the Liturgy, established in 1963 by a joint commission of Catholic bishops' conferences.[19] The "typical" edition of each vernacular liturgical book has the approbation of the conference of bishops for its territory and the confirmation (review or recognitio) of the Apostolic See.

Liturgical Laws and the Code

The contents of the liturgical books have their own canonical significance because of their inclusion of liturgical laws. They provide, moreover, interpretative background for the pertinent canons of the code which have been revised in the light of the new liturgical books or which are derived from them. Since their contents do not ordinarily follow the style of canons, they are able to provide, sometimes at length, the ratio or rationale for the laws. This includes doctrinal, catechetical, pastoral, historical, and other information and, according to circumstances, may be important in understanding the canons of Book IV.

There is a theoretical question about the possible conflict between the liturgical laws outside the code, particularly those in the liturgical books recently revised by decree of Vatican II, and the canons of Book IV. Such a question of conflict must be resolved in the individual case, but the principles are relatively simple.

First, the liturgical laws (in the liturgical books and other sources, including the documents of Vatican II and postconciliar legislation) retain their force, in accord with canon 2, unless clearly abrogated by a contrary prescription of the code.

[19] See F. R. McManus, "ICEL: The First Years," in Shaping English Liturgy, ed. P. C. Finn and J. M. Schellman (Washington, D.C.: Pastoral Press, 1990) 433–459.

Second, a later law (in this hypothetical instance, a prescription of a canon) abrogates or derogates from an earlier law, in accord with canon 20, in three instances: if it expressly so states (which does not occur in the canons of Book IV), if it is directly contrary to the earlier law (which must be established in the individual case), or if it entirely rearranges the subject matter of the earlier law (which does not occur in Book IV in relation to uncodified liturgical laws).

Third, in the examination of an instance of apparent conflict or contradiction, the presumption is in favor of the continuance of the existing liturgical law. In accord with canon 21, in a case of doubt the revocation of an existing (liturgical or other) law by a subsequent canon or other law is not presumed: the later law is to be related to the former and, to the extent possible, harmonized with it. Thus the resolution of conflicts between the norms of the liturgical books will be made, in case of doubt, in favor of the liturgical law. So far as the liturgical books themselves are concerned, a list of variations made necessary by the promulgation of the code was issued in a decree of September 12, 1983, a few weeks before the new code became effective.[20] Some of the emendations were substantive; most merely brought the language, numbering, and references of the praenotanda into formal conformity with the code.

[20] SCSDW, decr Promulgato Codice Iuris Canonici, N 19 (1983) 540–555. English translation, "Emendations in the Liturgical Books Following upon the New Code of Canon Law" (Washington, D.C.: ICEL, 1984).

Canons and Commentary

Introductory Canons
[cc. 834–839]

Six introductory canons govern Book IV as a whole, which includes sacraments, other acts of divine worship, and sacred places and times. The six canons are both explanatory or doctrinal and normative: they include (1) a definition of the liturgy (c. 834); (2) liturgical offices and ministries (c. 835); (3) the responsibility of the ordained to arouse the faith that is necessary for the exercise of the common priesthood (c. 836); (4) a norm of preference about communal celebration of the liturgy (c. 837); (5) a determination of the ecclesiastical authorities who have power to moderate or regulate the liturgy (c. 838); and (6) the responsibility for non-liturgical practices (c. 839).

These canons replace the basic norms of canons 1255–1264 of the 1917 code, which were the introductory canons of the title on divine worship. Certain of those canons, those which do not appear here or elsewhere in the codification, are simply abrogated. In particular this is true of the old canons on the desirability of the separation of women and men in church or at sacred rites[21] (women with heads covered, men bareheaded),[22] and the rule that women religious permitted to sing in church not be visible to the congregation.[23] On the other hand, canons 1261, §1 (concerning abuses in divine worship) and 1264, §1 (concerning improper music in church) of the 1917 code, while formally and canonically abrogated, continue to oblige morally, quite apart from positive ecclesiastical law.

There is a considerable lacuna at this point in the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches. The heading of title XVI of that code (CCEO 667–895) and in particular its introductory canons (CCEO 667–674) embrace the entirety of divine worship and especially the seven sacraments. Yet there is nothing in the preliminary canons like the Latin code's definition of the liturgy, the role of ordained ministers and the liturgical assembly as a whole, the location of regulatory power over the liturgy, non-liturgical exercises, and the like—even though such matters are a concern of the Church universal, both East and West, as clearly intended by Sacrosanctum Concilium 3–4. Some of these matters are partially addressed in other contexts of the Eastern code.

[21] CIC 1262, §1.
[22] CIC 1262, §2.
[23] CIC 1264, §2.

Definition of the Liturgy

Canon 834 — §1. The Church fulfills its sanctifying function in a particular way through the sacred liturgy, which is an exercise of the priestly function of Jesus Christ. In the sacred liturgy the sanctification of humanity is signified through sensible signs and effected in a manner proper to each sign. In the sacred liturgy, the whole public worship of God is carried out by the Head and members of the mystical Body of Jesus Christ.

§2. Such worship takes place when it is carried out in the name of the Church by persons legitimately designated and through acts approved by the authority of the Church.

The text of paragraph one, which has no precedent in the 1917 code, is derived from Sacrosanctum Concilium 7. It is slightly rephrased from the conciliar constitution on the liturgy to make it serve as an explanation of the way in which the ecclesial function or office of sanctifying is accomplished, namely, in the liturgy. Since the latter does not exhaust the entire life of the Church[24] nor is it the entirety of ecclesial sanctification (which includes other prayers and devotional exercises not strictly assimilated to the official liturgy),[25] the liturgy is said to fulfill this office of the Church in a special way, indeed in an entirely special way that "far surpasses any other."[26] This concept is explained by Vatican II: the liturgy is "the summit toward which the activity of the Church is directed; at the same time it is the fount from which all the Church's power flows."[27]

The definition of the liturgy from Sacrosanctum Concilium 7 is partially derived from Pius XII (Mediator Dei), as already noted, but it has been considerably modified and amplified, especially to include the sacramental concept of signs and the action of divine sanctification as well as worship offered to God by and in Christ. Although the explanation of signs perceptible to the senses, as signifying and bringing about sanctification, is primarily applicable to the seven sacraments, the statement is made of the liturgy as a whole, which has innumerable signs over and above those central to the seven sacraments.

The language of paragraph two occurs in canon 1256 of the 1917 code, but in a rather different context. There it was a definition of public cult (other than sacraments) offered to God and the saints, as opposed to private cult. Here, however, paragraph two provides instead a canonical distinction between liturgical services and other cultic activity of the church community or of individual Christians. There are two elements to the distinction.

First and of less practical significance, in order to be considered liturgy the activity must be "carried out in the name of the Church by persons legitimately designated." This designation comes primarily from baptism and is enjoyed by all the faithful; it is the sharing in the common priesthood mentioned in canon 836 and described by Vatican II: "The faithful are deputed by the baptismal character to the worship of the Christian religion."[28] In this primary sense, the canon means that the liturgy is carried out by the baptized members of the Christian community.

[24] SC 9.
[25] See c. 839.
[26] SC 13.
[27] SC 10.
[28] LG 11; SC 14.

At times this element has been understood as referring only to the presidency of an ordained minister that is requisite for certain but not all liturgical celebrations. In other instances, it has been understood as referring to the liturgical presidency of the non-ordained, who may be designated, in a manner not determined by the canon, for this purpose.[29] Examples of the latter include the non-ordained who lead services of the word of God, assist at marriages, preside at funeral services, etc.

A particular question has arisen in the past about the liturgical nature of the private praying of the liturgy of the hours by a person who does not possess the explicit deputation or mandate given to the ordained, to religious, etc. This question has been effectively resolved by the conciliar decision that all lay persons should be encouraged to celebrate the liturgical office of prayer, preferably "with the priests, or among themselves, or even individually."[30] This decision has been formally incorporated in the revised liturgy of the hours[31] and is a specific application of the deputation to (public) cult of all the baptized (above). See also canon 1174, §2.

The second element of the distinction in canon 834, §2 is more useful as a canonical means to identify and determine liturgical actions, namely, that these be "approved by the authority of the Church." The usual but not exclusive means of approbation is by way of inclusion of rites in official liturgical books, as determined in canon 838, §§2 and 3. Thus it is possible to define as liturgical, in the sense of this canon, any rite which appears in an approved liturgical book and to define as non-liturgical or extra-liturgical all other prayers and devotional practices.

Nonetheless, since such other practices may themselves have various degrees of ecclesiastical approbation, it may be expected that the competent authority will indicate whether a rite, approved but not included in an official book, is formally recognized as part of the public, corporate liturgy of the Church. As indicated in canon 839, the non-liturgical devotional life of the Church may include both private and communal practices, the latter being considered either pious or sacred services.

It is important to add that the revised liturgical books of the Roman rite themselves incorporate by reference various services the specific elements of which (texts, order of parts) may not be formally prescribed or described. This inclusion, as a means of approbation, makes such services properly liturgical. Examples are certain penitential services, for which the Rite of Penance gives examples, and the services of the word of God on the occasion of the visitation of the sick or exposition of the Blessed Sacrament. Another instance of inclusion in the liturgy by reference is found in Sacrosanctum Concilium 98: the approved short offices of religious and other institutes, which are obligatory for the members, satisfy the requirements of being "the public prayer of the Church."[32]

Liturgical Offices and Ministries

Canon 835 — §1. The bishops in the first place exercise the sanctifying function; they are the high priests, the principal dispensers of the mysteries of God, and the directors, promoters, and guardians of the entire liturgical life in the church entrusted to them.

§2. Presbyters also exercise this function; sharing in the priesthood of Christ and as his ministers under the authority of the bishop, they are consecrated to celebrate divine worship and to sanctify the people.

§3. Deacons have a part in the celebration of divine worship according to the norm of the prescripts of the law.

§4. The other members of the Christian faithful also have their own part in the function of sanctifying by participating actively in their own way in liturgical celebrations, especially the Eu-

[29] SC 35, §4.

[30] SC 100.

[31] General Instruction of the Liturgy of the Hours, February 2, 1971, nn. 20–32, DOL 3450–3462.

[32] DOL 98.

charist. Parents share in a particular way in this function by leading a conjugal life in a Christian spirit and by seeing to the Christian education of their children.

This canon, with the exception of the final clause of paragraph four, was inserted from the proposed but never promulgated Fundamental Law of the Church (1980).[33] It is doctrinal rather than preceptive or prescriptive. The explanation of the role of the ordained ministers in paragraphs one through three reflects a more tentative statement in the conciliar constitution on the Church, Lumen gentium: "The divinely instituted ecclesiastical ministry is exercised in different orders by those who, already in antiquity, are called bishops, presbyters, and deacons."[34] The canon itself might have been placed more logically after canons 836–837 (the latter derived from SC 26–27), in which the total Church is understood as celebrating the liturgy. It should be clear that, in accord with canon 834's definition, radically and fundamentally it is the whole community of the faithful, the Church itself, which celebrates the liturgy in union with its Head, the Lord Jesus, and that the common priesthood of all the baptized, to be mentioned in canon 836, is logically prior to the ordained, ministerial priesthood.

In paragraph one of canon 835 the sanctifying role of the bishop, most evident when he presides at the liturgy and especially at the eucharistic liturgy, is seen to extend to his authoritative governance of the liturgy as director, promoter, and guardian. This responsibility is rooted in his sacramental ordination. On the one hand, Vatican II formally taught that "episcopal consecration bestows the fullness of the sacrament of orders... the high priesthood, the summit of the sacred ministry."[35] Thus it put an end to theories which challenged the sacramentality of episcopal ordination and saw the episcopate only as the highest degree of the ordinary or simple priesthood of presbyters.[36] On the other hand, the conciliar fathers saw the sacramental ordination or consecration (the terms are interchangeable) of a bishop as the source or root of the "offices of teaching and governing" as well as of sanctifying, while insisting that these other functions, "of their very nature, can be exercised only in hierarchic communion with the head of the college and its members."[37]

The (diocesan) bishop is described as the director of the entire liturgical life of the particular church, an expression used in the liturgical books as well,[38] because the direction or regulation of the liturgy belongs to him. He is described as the promoter of the liturgy,[39] whether directly or through commissions and other means. He is described as guardian, or custodian, of the liturgy in that he safeguards its integrity and authenticity within the particular church. This canonical responsibility in turn is founded on the liturgical presidency of the diocesan bishop.

Again following the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, paragraph two sees the members of the presbyterate as participants in the (special, ordained, or ministerial) priesthood but dependent upon the bishop: the members of the order of presbyters are seen as having "a limited share of the full priesthood [of the bishops]: episcopal consecration is the primary and comprehensive instance of sacramental ordination to office."[40] (The Latin texts are generally careful to use presbyter for presbyters or priests of the second order, sacerdos in reference to both bishops and presbyters. In English the context often permits the word "priests" to be used and understood as referring either to members of both orders or to presbyters alone; the canonical usage in English is now to follow the Latin distinctions with precision.)

The bishops, as "sharers in [Christ's] consecration and mission... in turn have lawfully handed [33] LEF 67.

[34] LG 28.
[35] LG 21.

[36] See Vorgrimler 1:193.
[37] LG 21.
[38] E.g., RPenance, n. 9, DOL 3074.
[39] In the sense of SC 14–19, 41–46.
[40] Vorgrimler 1:193.

on to different individuals in the Church [namely, presbyters and deacons] in varying degrees a participation in this ministry."[41] In direct reference to the principal liturgical role of presiding at the Eucharist, the Roman Missal explains: "Every authentic celebration of the eucharist is directed by the bishop, either in person or through the presbyters, who are his helpers."[42]

In the liturgical constitution, the content of paragraphs one and two is expressed in more expansive terms that are critical to an understanding of the liturgy as the principal manifestation of the Church and also of the relation of the two offices of liturgical presidency, episcopate and presbyterate:

> The bishop is to be looked on as the high priest of his flock, the faithful's life in Christ in some way deriving from him and depending on him.
>
> Therefore all should hold in great esteem the liturgical life of the diocese centered around the bishop, especially in his cathedral church; they must be convinced that the preeminent manifestation of the Church is present in the full, active participation of all God's holy people in these liturgical celebrations, especially in the same eucharist, in a single prayer, at one altar at which the bishop presides, surrounded by his college of presbyters and by his ministers.
>
> But because it is impossible for the bishop always and everywhere to preside over the whole flock in his Church, he cannot do otherwise than establish lesser groupings of the faithful. Among these the parishes, set up locally under a pastor taking the place of the bishop, are the most important: in some manner they represent the visible Church established throughout the world.[43]

With regard to the order of deacons, paragraph three uses only the most general language, quite different from the preceding paragraphs which extol the orders of bishops and presbyters. It leaves to the liturgical books the determination of specific parts to be taken by the deacons of the Church. The functions proper to deacons had already been defined (and enlarged) by Vatican II, not only in connection with the restoration of the permanent diaconate but also in reference to all deacons,[44] who share in > the diaconia of liturgy, word, and charity. Insofar as competent authority assigns them [i.e., either in the law generally or in the case of the individual deacon], the [liturgical] duties of the deacon are to administer baptism solemnly; care for the eucharist and give holy communion; assist at and bless marriages in the name of the Church; carry viaticum to the dying; read the Scriptures to the people and exhort and instruct them; preside over worship and prayer; administer sacramentals; officiate at funeral and burial rites.[45]

See canon 1169, §3 for a formal limitation upon the liturgical office of deacons that was introduced after Vatican II.[46] It is understood, moreover, that deacons preside at the liturgy only in the absence of the bishop and presbyter.

The rest of the Christian faithful, by active participation in celebrations of the liturgy, have their own part in the office of sanctification. The concept participatio actuosa is ultimately derived from a statement of Pius X in 1903 about the primary and indispensable source of the Christian spirit, namely, "active participation [la partecipazione attiva in the original and authentic text] in the sacred mysteries and in the public and

[41] LG 28.

[42] GIRM 59, DOL 1449.

[43] SC 41–42. The language is revised in part from Saint Ignatius of Antioch.

[44] Commission for Interpretation of Decrees of Vatican II, March 26, 1968, AAS 60 (1968) 363, DOL 2547.

[45] LG 29.

[46] Commission for Interpretation of Decrees of Vatican II, November 13, 1974, AAS 66 (1974) 667, DOL 2592.

solemn prayer of the Church."[47] This concept is the recurring theme of the constitution on the liturgy and all the liturgical books. In the context of canon 835, §4, the other members of the Church are contrasted with the ordained ministers in the preceding paragraphs and their role is said to be carried out in their own manner or mode (suo modo).

In the first place, the role of the faithful is that of the members of the praying people assembled in a congregation; their common or congregational parts are defined in the liturgical books, both in principle and in particular instances. Canon 836 gives the fundamental principle in virtue of which all the faithful (including the ordained) share, namely, the common priesthood; canon 837 enlarges somewhat upon communal participation. The phrase "in their own way" in canon 835, §4 thus refers to the hierarchic and communal nature of the liturgy in the full assembly of the Church.

In addition, there is indirect reference (as there is direct reference in c. 837, §1) to special liturgical roles or ministries which some of the faithful, other than the ordained, may and should carry out. These include those for which liturgical institution is required (at present only the lay ministries of reader and acolyte in the Latin church, mentioned in c. 230, §1; other lay ministries with formal liturgical institution were originally contemplated); those for which some deputation or commission is expected (such as the ministry of reader on a less stable basis, as in c. 230, §2); and the many specific ministries referred to in the introductions to the liturgical books, both during the liturgical rites themselves and in preparation for them.[48]

A new document was issued on August 15, 1997, by the Roman Curia: "Instruction on Certain Questions Regarding the Collaboration of the Non-ordained Faithful in the Sacred Ministry of Priests." It is unique in bearing the signatures of the responsible officials of eight distinct dicasteries of the Apostolic See; as an instruction it is also most exceptional in its approval "in specific form" by John Paul II rather than with the common approval and authorization to publish that are ordinarily granted by the Roman Pontiff. Nevertheless, in accord with canon 34, §2, the new instruction does not alter or in any way derogate from the canons and other laws to which it refers. Several articles among the "practical provisions" of the instruction deal with the lay exercise of ministries related to canon 835, §4 (and c. 837, §1): the homily (art. 3), liturgical celebrations (6), presidency at Sunday celebrations (7), eucharistic ministers (8), other sacraments (9–11), and funerals (12). The thrust of the instruction is to restrict narrowly the occasions and pastoral circumstances in which lay persons exercise ministries ordinarily performed by priests, but this is always done without instituting any change in the existing laws about lay ministries.

The final clause of paragraph four, which did not appear in the drafts of the Fundamental Law of the Church from which the canon is derived, deals with a very different if related matter: the sanctifying function of parents in relation to their children, both through the Christian style of their married life and through the Christian upbringing of the children that they undertake. (See also c. 774, §2.) In this context the clause may appear to be out of place; it can best be understood as a single and significant illustration of the breadth of the sanctifying function which every Christian believer enjoys in relation to others (children to parents and to their sisters and brothers, spouse to spouse and to other family members, neighbor to neighbor, worker to worker, etc.), not only in the liturgical celebrations of the Church but in every dimension of Christian living.

Responsibility of Ordained Ministers

Canon 836 — Since Christian worship, in which the common priesthood of the Christian faithful is carried out, is a work which proceeds from faith and is based on it, sacred ministers are to take care to arouse and enlighten this faith diligently, especially through the ministry of the word, which gives birth to and nourishes the faith.

[47] Mp Tra le sollecitudini, November 22, 1903, AAS 36 (1903–1904) 329–339.

[48] E.g., for the Eucharist, GIRM, nn. 67–70, DOL 1457–1460; for initiation, RCIA, nn. 41–48, DOL 2368–2375.

The canon, without direct precedent in the 1917 code, first expounds the need for faith for the exercise of the common (general, universal, primary) priesthood of the Christian faithful, then enjoins the ordained to support the faith of others, especially through the ministry of the word.

The expository part of the canon flows from the conciliar definition employed in canon 834 (the "exercise of the priestly function of Jesus Christ") and is an assertion of the relation of faith to liturgical celebration: "Before people can come to the liturgy they must be called to faith and to conversion."[49] Not only must the church community proclaim the gospel to non-believers; it must "ever preach faith and penance to believers, prepare them for the sacraments, teach them to observe all that Christ has commanded, and invite them to all the works of charity, worship, and the apostolate."[50] In particular, the chief liturgical celebrations are called "sacraments of faith" because they "not only presuppose faith, but by words and objects they also nourish, strengthen, and express it."[51] In turn, the common priesthood is defined:

> By rebirth and the anointing of the Holy Spirit the baptized are consecrated as a spiritual house and a holy priesthood.... Though they differ from one another in essence and not only in degree, the universal priesthood of believers and the ministerial or hierarchic priesthood are nonetheless interrelated: each of them in its own special way is a sharing in the one priesthood of Christ.[52]

The second element of the canon, and the first explicit norm for conduct in Book IV, is directed to the members of the hierarchic priesthood, the ordained ministers. They are bound to arouse and illumine the faith of the other sharers in the common priesthood, specifically in relation to the liturgical celebrations. A similar conciliar injunction is:

> Pastors must therefore realize that when the liturgy is celebrated something more is required than the mere observance of the laws governing valid and lawful celebration; it is also their duty to ensure that the faithful take part fully aware of what they are doing, actively engaged in the rite, and enriched by its effects.[53]

The reference to the ministry of the word as the special means to stimulate and nourish faith is a specific application, here in the context of the faith needed to exercise the common priesthood, of the many canons of Book III, title I, which speak of the responsibility of the ordained in relation to the word of God.[54] It has particular significance for the liturgy, in which the celebration of the word is intimately and inextricably related to the celebration of the Eucharist and the other sacraments. The liturgical reform itself is based in part on norms derived from the formative (or didactic) nature of the liturgy, in which the ministry of the word of God is to be better integrated, enlarged, and enriched. While the ministry of the word is very evident in the homily, it is exercised in other ways liturgically, both in preparation for the celebration (liturgical catechesis) and in the rites themselves, all in support of the faith that is celebrated. A governing principle of the liturgical reform mandated by the council is this: "In sacred celebrations there is to be more reading from holy Scripture and it is to be more varied and apposite."[55] This norm is the basis for the introduction

[49] SC 9.
[50] Ibid.
[51] SC 59; see c. 840.
[52] LG 10.
[53] SC 11.
[54] See cc. 756–757, 762–764, 767–773, 776–777.
[55] SC 35.

of biblical readings in major rites (confirmation, anointing, penance) and in minor rites (such as blessings and other sacramentals).

A conciliar injunction is related to the present canon:

> Because the spoken word is part of the liturgical service, the best place for it, consistent with the nature of the rite, is to be indicated even in the rubrics; the ministry of preaching is to be fulfilled with exactitude and fidelity. Preaching should draw its content mainly from scriptural and liturgical sources, being a proclamation of God's wonderful works in the history of salvation, the mystery of Christ, ever present and active within us, especially in the celebration of the liturgy.[56]

Common Celebration and Participation

Canon 837 — §1. Liturgical actions are not private actions but celebrations of the Church itself which is the sacrament of unity, that is, a holy people gathered and ordered under the bishops. Liturgical actions therefore belong to the whole body of the Church and manifest and affect it; they touch its individual members in different ways, however, according to the diversity of orders, functions, and actual participation.

§2. Inasmuch as liturgical actions by their nature entail a common celebration, they are to be celebrated with the presence and active participation of the Christian faithful where possible.

The first paragraph is, like canon 834, a description or definition of liturgical celebrations; it is directly quoted from Sacrosanctum Concilium 26, where it introduces the norms for liturgical change which are drawn from the hierarchic and communal nature of the liturgy. In the present context it is the reason for the norm of participation given in paragraph two; in Sacrosanctum Concilium it precedes a series of liturgical principles and/or laws which it was not necessary to include in the canons, although they remain in force: each person should perform his or her own role in the liturgy; those with special liturgical ministries (servers, readers, choir members, etc.) should perform their offices with piety and decorum, be imbued with the spirit of the liturgy, and be properly prepared; the people should take part by acclamations, responses, psalmody, antiphons, and songs, as well as by actions, gestures, postures, and, at proper times, reverent silence, with the various roles of the people spelled out in the liturgical books; only distinctions based upon liturgical function, holy orders, and honor to civil authorities may be attended to in the liturgy.[57]

Unlike paragraph one, which is descriptive and defining, the next paragraph is an explicit norm for conduct; it too is derived from the conciliar decree:

> Whenever rites, according to their specific nature, make provision for communal celebration involving the presence and active participation of the faithful, it is to be stressed that this way of celebrating them is to be preferred, as far as possible, to a celebration that is individual and, so to speak, private. This applies with especial force to the celebration of Mass and the administration of the sacraments, even though every Mass has of itself a public and social character.[58]

The canon expresses the conciliar injunction even more forcefully, but without altering it; the present canonical context does not demand that the public and social character of the so-called Missa privata, auricular confession, or individual praying of the liturgy of the hours be formally defended. The circumstances, whether of sacramental penance or the celebration of a minor sacramental blessing, which may give a quasi-private appearance to an ecclesial rite are acknowledged, but the preference in all cases possible is for communal celebration, with the presence and active participation of the faithful.

[56] SC 35, 2.

[57] SC 26–32.

[58] SC 27.

Moderation of the Liturgy

Direction of the Liturgy

Canon 838 — §1. The direction of the sacred liturgy depends solely on the authority of the Church which resides in the Apostolic See and, according to the norm of law, the diocesan bishop.

As a whole, this fundamental canon is intended to determine the place within the church community where the power to govern, regulate, or moderate the liturgy resides.

